- Laming D 1984 The relativity of 'absolute' judgements. The British Journal of Mathematical and Statistical Psychology 37: 152–83
- Laming D 1986 Sensory Analysis. Academic Press, London
- Laming D 1988 Précis of Sensory Analysis and A re-examination of Sensory Analysis. Behavioral and Brain Sciences 11: 275–96, 316–39
- Laming D 1997 The Measurement of Sensation. Oxford University Press, Oxford, UK
- Michell J 1999 Measurement in Psychology: Critical History of a Methodological Concept. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Neyman J, Pearson E S 1933 On the problem of the most efficient tests of statistical hypotheses. Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society of London 231A: 289–337
- Shannon C E 1949 The mathematical theory of communication. In: Shannon C E, Weaver W (eds.) The Mathematical Theory of Communication. University of Illinois Press, Urbana, IL, pp. 1–91
- Stevens S S 1936 A scale for the measurement of a psychological magnitude: Loudness. Psychological Review 43: 405–16
- Stevens S S 1957 On the psychophysical law. Psychological Review 64: 153–81

- Stevens S S 1975 Psychophysics: Introduction to its Perceptual, Neural, and Social Prospects. Wiley, New York
- Swets J A (ed.) 1964 Signal Detection and Recognition by Human Observers: Contemporary Readings. Wiley, New York
- Tanner W P Jr., Swets J A 1954 A decision-making theory of visual detection. Psychological Review 61: 401–9
- Torgerson W S 1958 Theory and Methods of Scaling. Wiley, New York
- van Nes F L, Bouman M A 1967 Spatial modulation transfer in the human eye. Journal of the Optical Society of America 57: 401–6
- Weber E H [1834, 1846] 1978 The Sense of Touch. Academic Press, London

D. Laming

Psychophysiology

1. Introduction

1.1 What is Psychophysiology?

Psychophysiology, as the term implies, is the study of the interrelationships between mind and body. Although clearly related to behavioral and cognitive neuroscience, psychophysiology differs from traditional neuroscience both methodologically and conceptually. Methodologically, psychophysiolgists study primarily human subjects rather than lower animals, they usually measure physiological responses non-invasively, and the physiological responses are more molar as opposed to molecular. Conceptually, most psychophysiolgists focus primarily on understanding psychological events and secondarily on understanding the underlying physiological events.

1.2 Goals and History of Psychophysiology

The notion that one can understand psychological states and processes by means of observing or measuring physiological changes dates from the origins of the human race (e.g., blushing indicates embarrassment, sweating is associated with fear, etc.). However, it was not until approximately 1960 that psychophysiology was defined as a specific scientific discipline. The Society for Psychophysiological Research was founded in 1960 and the journal Psychophysiology was first published in 1963 under the leadership and vision of Albert Ax. The stated purpose of the society was and continues to be ‘to foster research on the interrelationships between the physiological and psychological aspects of behavior.’ Because only some of the highlights of psychophysiology can be identified here, the reader is referred to an introductory text by Hugdahl (1995), a more advanced handbook edited by Cacioppo et al. (2000), and the journals Psychophysiology and International Journal of Psychophysiology.

1.3 Typical Psychophysiological Measures

A great many physiological responses are used as psychophysiological measures. These fall broadly into four categories. The first, and historically oldest, category includes responses of the autonomic (or involuntary) nervous system (ANS), that branch of the nervous system, which controls the actions of internal organs such as the heart, blood vessels, sweat glands, and digestive organs. It is divided into the sympathetic branch, which mobilizes body resources to prepare the organism to respond to the environment and deal with stressors and threat (e.g., by the increasing heart rate, respiration rate, and palmar sweating), and the parasympathetic branch, which acts to store and conserve energy by reducing heart rate and increasing digestive activity. As can be seen, the ANS controls many aspects of physiological function that serve as indicators of emotion or activation. Thus, a psychophysiolgist might use heart rate or palmar sweating as a measure of how anxious a person felt in a particular social situation, such as having to give a speech to an audience.

The second category of psychophysiological measures reflects the activity of the skeletal nervous system, as indicated by motor activity. Of particular interest have been general measures of overall muscle tension, such as tension in the forearm muscles, which can reflect broad states of arousal and activation, and measures of the activity of facial muscle activity, which can indicate states of emotion.

The third category of psychophysiological measures consists of electrophysiological indices of central nervous system activity, primarily electroencephalogram (EEG) and evoked response potential (ERP) measures. For instance, one might use the amount of alpha (8–12 Hz) rhythm in the EEG as an index of relaxation, or the magnitude of a particular ERP component elicited by a stimulus as a measure of attention to that stimulus. The fourth category of measures is derived from brain scanning techniques, such as positron emission tomography (PET), magnetic resonance imaging, MRI, or functional MRI scans. For example, one could use a PET-derived measure of metabolic activity in the frontal lobes to examine differences in executive function between patients with schizophrenia and normal subjects.

The third and fourth categories of measures are the subjects of individual articles in this encyclopedia (see Event-related/ Evoked Potentials; Electroencephalography: Basic Principles and Applications; MRI (Magnetic Resonance Imaging) in Psychiatry). Therefore, the present discussion is confined to ANS activity and skeletal muscle activity. These measures have been used to investigate long lasting tonic states, transient phasic responses, and individual differences among people.

2. Long-lasting States

2.1 Alertness/Arousal/Activation

The terms alertness, arousal, and activation have a long and useful, albeit a bit checkered, history in psychophysiology. These terms generally denote a continuum of energy mobilization, from the low end of coma or deep sleep to the high end of excitement and extreme agitation. Primary psychophysiological indices of the state of arousal are levels of activity of the ANS, skeletal electromyographic (EMG) tension, and EEG. In keeping with the focus of this chapter, we will limit our discussion to the ANS and EMG measures.

Arousal has been manipulated in psychophysiological laboratories in a variety of ways, including having subjects perform a difficult arithmetic task; be threatened with impending electric shock; blow a balloon to bursting; and hold their hands in extremely cold water. In each of these tasks there is typically a significant increase in activity of the sympathetic division of the ANS (e.g., increased palmar skin conductance and heart rate) and EMG. In more 'real world' situations, arousal has been observed in parachutists just before jumping from an aircraft, and from students just before taking critical exams. Again, there is evidence of increased activity in the sympathetic division of the ANS and EMG.

Some problems with the simple global arousal concept were emphasized by Lacey (1967). Most important for the present discussion, he and his colleagues showed that the various psychophysiological indices of arousal (e.g., skin conductance and heart rate) were often not significantly correlated and, even more embarrassing for a simple arousal concept, these measures would go in opposite directions in many situations. For example, when subjects watched colored lights or listened to tones, skin conductance would increase but heart rate would decrease. Thus, different stimulus situations would reliably produce different patterns of physiological responding ('situational stereotypy' or 'stimulus specificity').

To this day arousal is a useful descriptive concept, but psychophysiolgists remain careful not to over-generalize from one response system to another, or from one stimulus situation to another. There is a far greater degree of specificity of response systems and situational reactions than was recognized by the early global arousal/activation concepts.

2.2 Emotion

The study of emotion has also had a long history in psychology and psychophysiology. Advances with both EMG and ANS measures since the 1960s have shed new light on our understanding of emotions.

Movement of facial muscles is a common way of expressing and communicating emotion and therefore facial EMG offers one measure of emotions. Even small covert changes in facial expression can be detected as small electrical changes with surface EMG recordings from various muscles of the face. Several researchers have found that the muscle that pulls up the corner of the lip as in a smile (zygomaticus major) is more active when subjects report positive emotion, whereas the muscle that pushes the eyebrows together as in a frown (corrugator supercilii) is more active when subjects report negative emotion. Whether facial EMG can distinguish various specific emotions (e.g., anger, fear, jealousy, disgust, etc.) is more controversial. Even more controversial is whether ANS responses can distinguish between different specific emotions. It is generally agreed that ANS activity occurs during emotional states, but the degree of specificity of that activity to different emotions remains an interesting and unsettled issue.

Another specific EMG measure that has proved useful in the study of emotions is the acoustic startle reflex. The acoustic startle response includes a series of involuntary muscle movements following a loud abrupt noise. One of the fastest and more reliable of these movements in humans is the eyeblink reflex. The eyeblink reflex can be measured easily by placing electrodes on the surface of the skin over the orbicularis oculi muscle just below the lower eyelid. For an overview of the methods and many implications associated with this measure, see Dawson et al. (1999). An important characteristic of the eyeblink startle reaction is that its magnitude is enhanced in the presence of unpleasant negative emotions and is diminished in the presence of pleasant positive emotions. This has been demonstrated many times by startling human subjects while they view unpleasant pictures (e.g., mutilated face) or pleasant pictures (attractive nude). It has been shown that changes in the acoustic startle eyeblink reflex can provide valid psychophysiological indices of the emotional state of the individual at the time that the reflex is elicited. A review of this literature and a proposed theoretical account can be found in Bradley et al. (1999).

3. Transient Stimulus-elicited Responses

3.1 Orienting, Defensive, and Startle Responses

Psychophysiolgists who focus on ANS and skeletal motor activity distinguish among three broad types of transient responses seen in reaction to a wide variety of stimuli: the orienting response, the defensive response, and the startle response (Graham 1992). The orienting response is the response to any novel or significant, but non-aversive, stimulus. It is thought to signal a shift of attention to that stimulus and to facilitate stimulus processing. Its components include a transient increase in palmar skin conductance, heart rate deceleration, constriction of the blood vessels in the skin (usually measured in the fingertips), and dilation of the blood vessels of the head. The defensive response is the response to aversive stimuli, including painful or threatening stimuli. Its components include an increase in palmar skin conductance, an increase in heart rate, and vasoconstriction in both the blood vessels of the skin and the head. The startle response is the reaction to unexpected stimuli that are intense and have a rapid onset. While there are ANS components of the startle response, the component that has been most investigated, because of its reliable occurrence and slow habituation, is the startle eyeblink, as discussed above.

3.2 Classical Conditioning

A paradigm in which stimulus-elicited responses are studied that has been of continuing interest to psychophysiologicals is classical conditioning. In paradigms in which the conditioned stimulus (CS) is several seconds long, with the unconditioned stimulus (UCS) occurring at CS offset, the form of the conditioned response (CR) is generally observed to be that of a heightened orienting response to the CS (Hugdahl 1995). A general question frequently investigated has concerned the relationship between classical conditioning, a very simple form of learning, and the more complex forms of learning of which humans are capable, including verbally mediated processes. For instance, Dawson and his colleagues (Dawson and Schell 1985) studied the relationship between acquisition of the conditioned skin conductance response and the human subject's conscious awareness of the relationship between the CS and the UCS, asking whether a person who is unaware of the CS–UCS contingency will show conditioning. In a series of studies in which awareness of the CS–UCS relation was prevented or delayed by a distracting secondary task, they found that a CR was seen only in subjects who became aware of the CS–UCS relation. Moreover, CRs developed only at or after the point in time in a series of CS–UCS trials when subjects indicated awareness. Thus, these results indicate that conscious relational learning is necessary for human classical conditioning of ANS responses with neutral CSs. On the other hand, the relationship between awareness and conditioning may be different with certain paradigms used to establish the skeletal eyeblink conditioned response (Clark and Squire 1999).

In most psychophysiological studies of classical conditioning, the CSs have been fairly neutral stimuli such as simple tones or colored lights. In contrast, Öhman and his colleagues (see Hugdahl 1995) conducted a series of interesting studies of a different class of CSs, those variously characterized as potentially phobic, fear-relevant, or biologically prepared, such as pictures of spiders, snakes, or angry faces. Öhman and his colleagues have found that CRs (usually the conditioned skin conductance response) conditioned to potentially phobic stimuli (a picture of a snake) are harder to extinguish than are CRs conditioned to neutral stimuli (a picture of a flower). They require more non-reinforced presentations of the CS, and are resistant to instructional manipulation. That is, while responses conditioned to neutral stimuli can usually be abolished by instructing the subject that the UCS will no longer be delivered, so that the subject no longer has any cognitive expectancy that the UCS will follow the CS, responses conditioned to potentially phobic stimuli remain after such instructions, even in the absence of conscious expectancy of the UCS. Thus, psychophysiological techniques can be used in the laboratory to study the dynamics of 'irrational' conditioned responses, such as one may encounter in clinical phobias where the patient fears an object while realizing rationally that the object is harmless.

4. Psychopathology

Psychophysiology is particularly useful in the study of psychopathology because it offers nonverbal measures of psychological states and processes. It thus opens a window onto events that psychiatric patients are unlikely to be able to report verbally. Many psychophysiological measures have been studied with psychopathological patients but space limitation requires that we mention briefly only a few measures in schizophrenia and psychopathy. For a general review of a greater variety of measures and a greater variety of psychopathological conditions, see Keller et al. (2000).

4.1 Schizophrenia

Schizophrenia is a psychotic disorder characterized by hallucinations, delusions, and disorganized thinking and behavior. With ANS measures, especially skin conductance activity, there is usually tonic sympathetic hyper-arousal. On the other hand, with phasic orienting response ANS measures, there is usually hypo-reactivity, at least in sizable sub-groups of patients (for a review see Öhman 1981). Among the many unsettled issues is whether these ANS abnormalities are state-related and/or trait related. That is, if ANS abnormalities are present even before the schizophrenia patients show symptoms, and persist after the symptoms disappear, they are considered trait measures. However, if the abnormalities are present only when the patients are exhibiting psychotic symptoms then they are considered state related. Although this issue is still unsettled, preliminary evidence suggests that tonic autonomic hyper-arousal is state related, whereas phasic autonomic hypo-reactivity may be trait related, especially when it is expressed relative to their general arousal state (Dawson et al. 1994). These findings suggest that hypo-reactivity may be related to a continuing vulnerability to schizophrenia, whereas the hyper-arousal may be a separate phase associated with the development of symptoms.

4.2 Psychopathy

Psychopathy is a serious personality disorder characterized by antisocial behavior, untruthfulness, irresponsibility, and lack of remorse or empathy. It has been hypothesized that the psychopath is primarily deficient in fear reactivity, and consistent with this hypothesis is the reliable finding that psychopaths show less fear conditioning as indicated by poor skin conductance classical conditioning (Lykken 1957).

Another psychophysiological measure of fear and negative affect mentioned earlier involves the acoustic startle eyeblink reflex. Recall that normal subjects give enhanced eyeblink startle reactions while observing unpleasant pictures, compared to startle while observing neutral or pleasant pictures. This is not true of psychopaths, or at least of significant subgroups of psychopaths (Patrick et al. 1993). This finding also is consistent with the hypothesized deficit in fear in some types of psychopathy.

5. Applied Psychophysiology

In addition to their use in investigating many questions of broad theoretical interest in behavioral and social sciences, psychophysiological techniques have also been used in a number of ways to deal with specific applied problems. The two most often encountered areas of applied psychophysiology are biofeedback and the detection of deception (lie detection).

5.1 Biofeedback

In the early development of learning theory, it was generally believed that while responses of the skeletal motor system could be instrumentally conditioned, responses of the ANS could only be classically conditioned. Because they were not under conscious, voluntary control, ANS responses would not respond to operant reinforcement contingencies. However, beginning in the early 1960s, investigators such as H. Kimmel, B. Engel, N. Miller, and D. Shapiro began to demonstrate that rewarding organisms, including humans, for specific ANS activity increased the amount of such autonomic activity, and that this could occur whether or not a human subject was aware of the reinforcement contingency. Thus, it was demonstrated that people could learn to increase the size and number of skin conductance responses, or to increase or decrease heart rate or blood pressure, if they were rewarded for doing so by the arrival of pleasant stimuli or the avoidance of unpleasant ones. It was soon discovered that people could learn these things if their only reward was being told that they were acquiring a desired response or performing a task set for them by, for instance, lowering the pitch of a tone that was controlled by their heart rate, or moving the needle on a dial that indicated blood pressure.

These findings were soon applied to treating the symptoms of many psychosomatic disorders. Such disorders typically involve ANS dysfunction (migraine headache, hypertension, Raynaud's syndrome) or loss of control of skeletal muscle tension (tension headache). In clinical biofeedback applications, the patient is given an external stimulus, such as a tone or meter reading, that indicates the level of muscle tension, cerebral vasoconstriction, blood pressure, etc., and the patient's task is to lower the pitch of the tone, move the meter indicator to the left, etc. This approach has been used with varying degrees of success as a therapeutic method in a wide variety of psychosomatic disorders (Carlson et al. 1994), and the training parameters that maximize its effectiveness have been widely studied.

5.2 Detection of Deception

Use of psychophysiological techniques in the detection of deception began in the early part of the twentieth century. There are principally two different techniques in use, each with its strong advocates and critics. Both rely upon the fact that stimuli or information that are of significance or importance to a person will elicit greater ANS activity than will less significant, important stimuli. The Guilty Knowledge Technique, developed by Lykken (see Lykken 1981), relies on there being information known to the guilty person in a crime and to the polygraph examiner, but not to the innocent person. Thus, if a victim were wearing a blue shirt, a guilty person will orient more to the word 'blue' than to other colors when asked the color of the shirt and presented with alternatives, whereas the innocent person will not show differential orienting. The Control Question Technique, first well described by Reid and Inbau (1977) and extensively investigated by Raskin and his colleagues, compares responses to 'critical' questions about a particular crime ('Did you steal that red Porsche last Friday?') with 'control' questions that are presumed to elicit greater arousal among those innocent of that crime, and in fact that are presumed to elicit lying by the innocent, than do the critical questions ('Have you ever stolen anything of value'?). Laboratory investigations with 'mock crimes' have indicated 90 percent or better accuracy rates with these techniques, with the most common error by far being the false guilty finding. However, a number of investigators have raised questions about the accuracy rate in real-world situations, particularly with respect to whether or not adequate control questions could be found when a person is accused of a serious crime.

6. Conclusion

Psychophysiology offers potentially powerful non-verbal, noninvasive, methodologies with which to study psychological processes in real time. Cognitive processes and emotional processes are studied in both normal and abnormal populations using psychophysiological measures and concepts. Thus psychophysiology lies at the interface of cognitive science, clinical science, and neuroscience and offers the capability to bridge these disciplines.

See also: Anxiety and Anxiety Disorders; Anxiety and Fear, Neural Basis of; Autonomic Classical and Operant Conditioning; Classical Conditioning, Neural Basis of; Cognitive Neuropsychology, Methodology of; Electroencephalography: Basic Principles and Applications; Emotion, Neural Basis of; Event-related/Evoked Potentials; Fear: Potentiation of Startle; Magnetoencephalography

Bibliography

- Bradley M M, Cuthbert B N, Lang P J 1999 Affect and the startle reflex. In: Dawson M E, Schell A M, Böhmelt A H (eds.) Startle Modification: Implications for Neuroscience, Cognitive Science, and Clinical Science. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Cacioppo J T, Tassinari L G, Bernston G G 2000 Handbook of Psychophysiology. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Carlson J C, Seifert A R, Birbaumer N 1994 Clinical Applied Psychophysiology. Plenum, New York
- Clark R E, Squire L R 1999 Human eyeblink classical conditioning: Effects of manipulating awareness of the stimulus contingencies. Psychological Science 10: 14–18
- Dawson M E, Nuechterlein K H, Schell A M, Gitlin M, Ventura J 1994 Autonomic abnormalities in schizophrenia: State or trait indicators? Archives of General Psychiatry 51: 813–24
- Dawson M E, Schell A M 1985 Information processing and human autonomic classical conditioning. In: Ackles P K, Jennings J R, Coles M G H (eds.) Advances in Psychophysiology, JAI Press, Greenwich, CT
- Dawson M E, Schell A M, Böhmelt A H 1999 Startle Modification: Implications for Neuroscience, Cognitive Science, and Clinical Science. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Graham F K 1992 Attention: The heartbeat, the blink, and the brain. In: Campbell B A, Hayne H, Richardson R (eds.) Attention and Information Processing in Infants and Adults: Perspectives from Human and Animal Research, Lawrence Erlbaum, Hillsdale, NJ

- Hugdahl K 1995 Psychophysiology: The Mind-Body Perspective. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Keller J, Hicks B D, Miller G A (2000) Psychophysiology in the study of psychopathology. In: Cacioppo J T, Tassinari L G, Bernston G G (eds.) Handbook of Psychophysiology, Cambridge University Press, New York
- Lacey J I 1967 Somatic response patterning and stress: Some revisions of activation theory. In: Appley M H, Trumbull R (eds.) Psychological Stress: Issues in Research, Appleton-Century-Crofts, New York
- Lykken D T 1957 A study of anxiety in the sociopathic personality. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology 55: 6–10
- Lykken D T 1981 A Tremor in the Blood. McGraw-Hill, New York
- Öhman A 1981 Electrodermal activity and vulnerability to schizophrenia: A review. Biological Psychology 12: 87–145
- Patrick C J, Bradley M M, Lang P J 1993 Emotion in the criminal psychopath: Startle reflex modulation. Journal of Abnormal Psychology 102: 82–92
- Reid J E, Inbau F E 1977 Truth and Deception: The Polygraph 'Lie-detector' Technique, 2nd edn. Williams and Wilkins, Baltimore, MD

M. E. Dawson and A. Schell

Psychosomatic Medicine

In its simplest sense, 'psychosomatic medicine' merely indicates that there is a (psyche) mind-body (soma) relationship relevant to human health. Drawing from this, many nonprofessionals believe that it is a medical specialty that concentrates on the psychological influences on disease, particularly certain 'psychosomatic diseases.' Actually, it is a health science that is concerned with the nature of the mind-body relationship, including its clinical applications.

1. Definition

More specifically, psychosomatic medicine is a field of health science based on the concept that the human organism is a psychosomatic unity, that biological and psychological processes are inextricably inter-related aspects of its function. This stands in contrast to the still predominant, traditional biomedical model (see Engel 1977) from the nineteenth century which holds that diseases represent cellular or organ pathology arising from intrinsic defects or external bio-physicochemical agents. Psychosomatic medicine conceptualizes diseases as occurring in persons, not their components, as a consequence of their transactions with an environment that is informational, social, and cultural, as well as bio-physicochemical. It notes that people are not simply biological organisms, but sentient ones with motives, thoughts, feelings, and relationships.

Mind-body unity should not be misunderstood to imply that mental and somatic phenomena cannot be separately studied. Such reductionism is a legitimate tactic that permits the study of scientific questions limited to that system. Each organ or part function merits study by techniques appropriate to it. To understand organismic function, however, requires a perspective that includes data from all body systems, including the psychological. Psychosomatic medicine provides no theories about the nature of the underlying processes. What it provides is its holistic perspective for interpreting them. It draws on the data, theory, and techniques of all other relevant fields, integrating these in unique ways informed by its conceptual base. Thus, contrary to common lay belief, psychosomatic medicine is not a medical specialty. Nor is it a scientific discipline. Its practitioners come from a range of disciplines and clinical specialties.

Some have accused psychosomatic medicine of overweighting the importance of psychosocial factors in disease, trivializing biology. This had legitimacy during the 1940s and 1950s when a prominent segment of the field fell into this trap (see Sect 2.3). If this seems still true, that is because its main effort is directed to clarifying the effects of psychosocial factors on the body. But that emphasis is necessitated by the neglect of this work by the remainder of biomedicine. Psychosomatic medicine is concerned with all mind-body relationships, giving equal importance to biology.

Doubts have been raised about the aptness of the term. To some, the bipartite nature of 'psychosomatic' undermines the intended unity. But it is one, unhyphenated word. Others question the absence of reference to the social, noting that many relevant factors are such. Engel's (1977) alternative, 'biopsychosocial model' was meant to resolve that, as well as to circumvent the residual misinterpretation that biology is devalued. But if social is included, what about cultural? Indeed, the list could include economic and other factors. Moreover, these factors can impinge on the organism only via the psychological apparatus. 'Psychosomatic medicine' also has the virtue of historical continuity that includes a mass of research documentation.

2. History

2.1 Origins

From earliest times, people have been struck by instances in which physical symptoms followed noteworthy life events, and reports of these appear in ancient writings. With the beginnings of medical science, physicians added more such reports as well as describing illness outbreaks during wars and major upheavals. The idea that stressful life experiences caused illness gained wider currency. During the nineteenth century, philosophical conjectures about the holistic quality of human nature developed. This was the period when 'psychosomatic' came into use by physicians, although in a sense partly different from our own.

2.2 Early Twentieth Century

With the turn of the century, Cannon's (1915) studies on the physiology of the emotions added key data revealing how these physiological responses were adaptive to the external threats that had triggered the emotions. Building on Claude Bernard's earlier work, he indicated (1932) how his findings fit into the process by which organisms maintain their integrity by adapting to environmental change via internal responses to maintain internal equilibrium: 'homeostasis.'

Clinical and epidemiological studies of better quality increased. By 1935, (Helen) Flanders Dunbar was able to cite some 2,251 references in her groundbreaking work, Emotions and Bodily Disease, which ushered in the modern, scientific era of psychosomatic medicine.

Further stimulus came from World War II. With astonishing foresight, the (US) National Research Council, anticipating casualties from war stress, convened a series of conferences among psychosomatic experts during the mid-1930s. This kindled additional research which culminated in 1939 with publication of the journal Psychosomatic Medicine, still the pre-eminent periodical in the field. Three years later, the American Psychosomatic Society was founded to foster scientific interchange and education. US military physicians observed how war trauma led to physical as well as mental disorders, and many returned with an interest in psychosomatic medicine. Psychosomatic societies arose in other countries and, later, international meetings began.

Psychoanalysis provided further impetus. Freud and his followers were greatly interested in physical symptoms. Much of their theorizing involved a simplistic transfer of the psychoanalytic psychology of hysterical symptoms, without regard to physiology. Nevertheless, as psychoanalytic activity flourished, it stirred interest among intellectuals, adding to the popularity of psychosomatic medicine. With this came the naive belief that many medical disorders were primarily psychogenic.

2.3 Specificity Theories

Paralleling major biomedical advances that elucidated the etiology and pathogenesis of disease, psychosomatic medicine undertook a search for specific psychological causative factors. Dunbar was a pioneer here too, observing that patients with several medical disorders had distinctive personality traits which she concluded were etiological. Others developed similar formulations. The identified diseases were termed ‘psychosomatic.’ This effort peaked with the contributions of Franz Alexander (1950). As a psychoanalyst, he focused on unconscious processes, but his work was far more elaborate and sophisticated than others. Most importantly and enduringly, he clarified that no purely psychological mechanism could explain the physiological processes of internal organs. Instead, Alexander reported that ‘specific dynamic constellations’ of motivations, defenses, and emotions characterized patients with each of a series of ‘psychosomatic’ diseases, and that life experiences which matched the vulnerabilities inherent in the particular constellation precipitated that illness. He also linked each constellation to specific physiological processes mediated through autonomic neural pathways that plausibly explained the pathogenesis of that disease. The brilliance of this work captured the imagination of many, and it became a major force in psychosomatic medicine. Belief developed that psychotherapy might cure ‘psychosomatic diseases.’

2.4 The Last Third of the Twentieth Century

More careful studies called into question much specificity research, which had been uncontrolled for observer bias, and utilized selected subjects. Skepticism grew and spread from specificity to involve all of psychosomatic medicine. Moreover, remarkable advances in biomedicine made other factors seem irrelevant: ‘With penicillin, who needs psychology?’ The influence of the field on the rest of medical science and practice withered.

Experiencing self-doubt and loss of external support, the field contracted and changed. Grand theories were eschewed. Research focused on better-defined questions and became methodologically tighter. Clinical studies became less common, especially those of therapy. Laboratory projects concentrated on elucidating basic psychophysiological relationships, often in normal subjects or even animals. If less exciting, this shift proved salutary, strengthening the scientific base and the quality of data.

Over time, the field recovered. Increasing studies of clinical problems embodied a new methodological rigor gained from models provided by the continuing basic research. A variety of subgroups within the psychosomatic society grew to a critical size and formed associations of their own, expanding work further. Acceptance by clinical biomedicine grew more slowly, however.

3. Theoretical Models of Mind–Body Relationships

The evidence of correlations between psychological and somatic processes is extensive. But how can this be understood? Five explanatory models can be adduced from scientific reports.

3.1 Concomitant Effects

This model rejects causality in the relationship. It postulates that both the psychological and physical findings are products of another, precedent factor. Commonly, this is said to be genetic. Another explanation draws on the fact that life events often have multiple stimulus properties. Thus, one stimulus is said to cause the psychological findings while another produces the physical one.

3.2 Somato → Psychic Causation

This model posits that the relationship follows entirely from the effects of somatic processes on the mind. This is the traditional biomedical view, which sees all disease as ‘physical’ in nature and origin. In a modification, a feedback loop is added going back from the mind to the body, acknowledging that psychological changes may have physical effects, but only secondarily. (If this is true, why cannot they do so primarily?)

3.3 Psycho → Somatic Causation

This is the counterpart of the preceding. It states that psychological responses to external events cause the somatic changes. Most commonly, stress or strong emotions are invoked as intervening mechanisms. Weiner (1977) noted that it may be the behavioral concomitants of the psychological processes which act on the body: ‘lifestyle factors’ such as smoking or substance abuse. Except for ‘specificity’ theories already described, the ‘choice’ of the resultant disease is usually left to other, biological factors. Again, secondary feedback is often added, bodily changes acting back on the mind.

3.4 Bidirectional Psycho ⇌ Somatic Causality

This is a combination of the last two models, allowing for causation in both directions and the feedback variations of each. Thus, longer causal chains are possible: ... psycho ... somato ... psycho ... somato ... (etc.); but these remain linear.

3.5 The Modern Psychosomatic Model

This is a holistic model that includes all the preceding models and their variants, indicating that each explains some psychosomatic processes. Beyond this, it suggests that several are usually operating simultaneously, and to this adds that there are usually webs of relationships involving multiple stimulus–response linkages. To explain this, it invokes data about the operation of the mechanisms which integrate human function.

4. Integrative Mechanisms

From the biological side, the brain is the organ of the mind; mentation is subject to the same physical influences as all other organ functions. Beyond this, it is the body's chief regulatory and coordinating organ. Inputs to the brain come from both the body and environment. Similarly, its output alters bodily functions and, via behavior, the external world. These inputs from inside and out converge on many of the same brain centers, and the resultant messages alter both psychological and somatic functions.

From a psychological perspective, input consists not merely of sensations but of information organized into meanings. Meanings have individual as well as shared components. The same event or somatic message has different nuances, at least, for each person. The origins of these meanings, as well as those shared in the culture, derive from life experiences: they are learned. Some visceral responses to psychological stimuli also are 'learned,' but the learning that establishes these psychosomatic linkages is not the familiar, conscious process, but conditioning, of both Pavlovian and operant types. Most of this occurs in early life. Manipulations during early development can alter brain anatomy, neurotransmitters, and hormone levels, and modify subsequent stress responses.

When important meanings are attached to inputs, emotions are activated. These further affect body functions. The original response becomes a stimulus, too. In studying organismic function, what is defined as stimulus, and what as response, is arbitrary; it depends on what part of the process is being examined and at what point in time. Nor is this a simple chain of stimulus-response pairs. A network of actions follow, in which some responses affect one organ, some another, and some both, while some of these influences are stimulating and others inhibitory; and the succeeding responses become additional stimuli of the same variegated nature. Because many life events have more than one meaning, several such networks may be in process simultaneously. In most instances, then, a stimulus sets off a transacting web of responses and new stimuli with both psychological and somatic components.

Ordinarily, inhibitory processes finally dominate, and the person returns to a resting state. Sometimes, especially if the stimulus persists, inhibition may fail, so that the reaction continues or recurs. These extended responses are homeostatically maladaptive, and likely to cause organ damage and disease.

The endocrine and immune systems also serve as integrators of organismic function, directly and in their inter-relationships with each other and the brain. Pituitary secretions, which control many other endocrines, are themselves subject to control by hormones and neurotransmitters from the hypothalamus. Psychological stress is associated with stimulation of adrenocortical hormones via the pituitary, as well as neurally mediated adrenaline release from the adrenal medulla. The distinction between neurotransmitters and hormones is blurred: active neuropeptides and neuroamines are present in many peripheral organs. Hormones act back on the brain to inhibit their own overproduction, but also modify cognitive and emotional states.

Stress also affects both cellular and humoral immune functions, partly through the action of adrenal steroids; depression may have especially potent effects. Animals subjected to a variety of psychological stressors have increased morbidity and mortality to injected pathogens along with changes in immune functions. Hypnosis can cure warts and alter the hypersensitivity reaction to injected antigens. The immune system can 'learn' too: immune responses to previously inert substances can be conditioned.

5. Basic Psychosomatic Concepts

5.1 Health and Disease

Psychosomatic medicine rests on the fundamental physiological concept of homeostasis: the human organism exists in a state of constantly dynamic equilibrium subject to both endogenous shifts and perturbations induced by an ever-changing environment. These trigger homeostatic responses which keep the changes from exceeding viable limits, thereby maintaining organismic integrity and permitting continuing function in the environment. If the change is excessive or the compensatory adjustments become so, damage results. When damage significantly impairs adaptation, disease occurs: disease is failure of adaptation. At any given moment, every person is more or less healthy and more or less diseased.

Psychosomatic medicine enhances this concept to take account of our inherent psychological and physiological properties as well as the sociocultural and informational content of the physical world. Moreover, although 'disease' may seem to have a fixed definition, different times, places, and persons have provided differing criteria for deciding what disease exists and whether one is sick at all. (Epilepsy in ancient Egyptian royalty was a manifestation of divinity.)

5.2 The Nature of Disease; 'Psychosomatic Disease'

Many physicians and others dichotomize disease states as 'organic' (physical) or 'psychological' (sometimes extending these, respectively, as 'real' or 'imaginary'). Specificity theorists separated off 'psychosomatic' diseases in which psychogenesis played a uniquely central role. Psychosomatic medicine takes a wholly different view, conceptualizing every disease in every person as physical AND psychological. There are no 'psychosomatic diseases' because all diseases (and health) are psychosomatic.

Even in the simple instance of accidental injury, it is the overall impact of the event on the person, not just the injured part, that defines the illness—including instances where behavioral factors played no causal role and no psychic 'trauma' results. The extent of pain, bleeding, swelling, etc., will be determined not only by the injury but by the victim's entire prior psycho-physiological state; and the victim's reactions to each of these effects, as well as his attitudes about the injured part and its functions, will alter that state. (For example, if anger arises, blood vessels may dilate, increasing bleeding.) The reactions of others, including health care providers, will also affect the psycho-physiological responses, as will the meanings of the treatment given. The somatic problems will be paramount medically, at least until late consequences require chronic care. Conceptually, however, even this extreme example of 'pure physical illness' can be fully understood only from a psychosomatic perspective. Optimal care will result only if health care providers are responsive to psychosocial needs throughout the course of treatment.

5.3 The Etiology of Disease

Similarly, the causes of all diseases are psychosomatic. Take malaria for example. The plasmodium, usually mosquito-borne, is prerequisite. But, what is to be said of the US soldier in the tropics who contracts malaria after failing to take prescribed prophylactic medication or to sleep beneath issued netting, or who fishes in a swamp designated 'off limits.' It is no less valid to categorize such behaviors as causative than the biological factors. Sociocultural factors, even political ones can enter in too. Examples include being a parentless child, or living in a culture ignorant of the mosquito's role or under a political system too poor or uncaring to provide public health programs. Any such factors or other psychological events can be involved in any given person. Often several are.

The choice of an infectious disease was deliberate. Traditional medicine views these as the prototype of external causation. However, as Dubos (1960) indicated, all people are incubators for various micro-organisms growing in their throat, intestine, etc.; and in these circumstances, why are people not sick all the time? The real question is why some people become sick with what they do, when they do. External factors explain only part of this. Host resistance variables, including differences in immunity, are necessarily involved too; and psychosocial factors affect these.

5.4 Pathogenesis; the Onset of Disease

Among the psychosocial causes of illness, stress is the best documented. Selye (1950) demonstrated that the response to any noxious stimulus precipitated a nonspecific 'General Adaptation Syndrome' superimposed on the specific effects of the stimulus. He focused on the adrenocortical response, but it became clear that many other systems are involved in the syndrome, especially other hormones, the cardiovascular system, blood elements, including those active immunologically, and the psychological apparatus. Psychological stressors have proved as potent as physical ones. Indeed, some effects of physical stressors have proved to result from their psychological properties. Multiple clinical studies have documented that a variety of illnesses arise in the context of accumulated life stress.

Specific emotional states seem to operate in some circumstances. Anger and anxiety have been implicated, as well as depression, especially that associated with feelings of helplessness and hopelessness.

But disease is a process with a course that evolves variably, and often preceded by a period in which covert, even undetectable, lesions are developing; and a different superimposed process may be required for the disease to appear. Psychosocial factors have been implicated in each of these phases, but the specifics may differ from one to another, as Reiser (1975) clarified. For example, the gradual accretion of coronary atherosclerosis precedes thrombosis and infarction ('heart attack'). Anger and depression have been implicated in infarction, whereas nonspecific stress has been related to alterations in cholesterol metabolism which can lead to atherosclerosis. Of course, the events that provoke emotions differ among people, depending on their psychological makeup. Research provides the broad possibilities, but only individual study can delineate the pathogenic process in a given person.

The specific 'choice' of illness likely rests in genetic and other purely biological factors in many instances. Individually patterned psychosomatic links may be implicated in others. Either may be responsible for 'response specificity,' the tendency for individuals to have particular somatic responses to a variety of stressors. Moreover, discredited but not disproved psychological 'specificity' remains a possibility. The remarkable consistency among various specificity theorists regarding the psychological characteristics in people with certain disorders remains suggestive. Formidable methodological problems must be overcome to study this adequately, but such research is merited.

6. Clinical Applications

The application of psychosomatic medicine to patient care rests primarily on its basic concepts. As every patient is partly unique, only by identifying the issues specific to that individual can appropriate care be provided. The fundamental need both in diagnosis and treatment is establishing a trusting professional relationship that allows patients to relax defenses and reveal personal information and feelings. Also required are interviewing skills to facilitate patients' communications of their life experiences, along with physical symptoms and the life context of the latter. This must be accompanied by sufficient knowledge of psychology and social science to identify the significance of these communications, and also of major psychosomatic research findings in order to identify correlations likely to be significant.

Treatment requires the ability to utilize this understanding of the patient in order to select the biological therapies that are most suitable for the individual, and to provide this in a manner that helps that patient use it best. On the psychological side, the need is to quantify and facilitate the extent of emotional release most helpful and tolerable to that patient, as well as the level of insight to pursue the relevant psychosomatic correlations.

All this seems complex, and it is. But the knowledge and skills can be acquired in the course of existing professional education, provided that psychosomatic medicine is integrated throughout. This is true for all clinical specialties. As noted initially, there is no specialty of psychosomatic medicine.

At the height of interest in psychosomatic medicine, a cadre of experts began to serve as educators of physicians, medical students, and others in academic health centers. Most were psychiatrists, although some internists and other specialists participated. This became a new subspecialty, named 'Consultation-Liaison Psychiatry,' as the service function became melded with education (see Liaison and Consultation Psychiatry). In the late twentieth-century, however, as psychiatry became more biological and positioned within the biomedical model, the psychosomatic element diminished. Given the widespread public dissatisfaction with the 'over(bio)scientific,' 'dehumanized' quality of medical care, this has been a significant loss.

But clinical psychosomatic medicine should not be confused with humanism or doing 'good'; it is applied science. Although its clinical practitioners act in a decent, humane fashion, it is not this but their skills and knowledge as applied scientists that make them effective.

7. Recent Developments

Substantial research has flourished under the rubrics of 'health psychology,' 'behavioral medicine,' and 'behavioral psychology' as well as psychosomatic medicine itself. Consequently, high-quality research has been advancing vigorously. Psychophysiological studies have begun to use highly sophisticated probe techniques to measure meaningful physiological parameters. A particularly new and useful approach involves the application of randomized clinical trials that elucidate both causal factors and the effectiveness of interventions in a number of diseases. New research designs have incorporated more real-life situations, particularly in research on stress. Information particularly relevant to actual clinical and life situations has emerged, giving meaningful promise for the future.

Bibliography

- Alexander F 1950 Psychosomatic Medicine. Norton, New York
- Anderson N B, Armstead C A 1995 Toward understanding the association between socioeconomic status and health: A new challenge for the biopsychosocial approach. Psychosomatic Medicine 57: 213–25
- Cannon W B 1915 Bodily Changes in Pain, Hunger, Fear and Rage, 2nd edn. Appleton, New York
- Cannon W B 1932 The Wisdom of the Body. Norton, New York
- Cobb S 1976 Social support as a moderator of life stress. Psychosomatic Medicine 38: 300–14
- Dubos R 1960 The Mirage of Health. Allen and Unwin, London
- Dunbar H F 1935 Emotions and Bodily Change. Columbia University Press, New York (see also the 4th edn., 1954)
- Engel G L 1962 Psychological Development in Health and Disease. Saunders, Philadelphia, PA
- Engel G L 1977 The need for a new medical model: A challenge for biomedicine. Science 196: 129–36
- Grinker R R 1953 Psychosomatic Research. Norton, New York
- Kiecolt-Glaser J K, Glaser R 1988 Methodological issues in behavioral immunology research with humans. Brain Behavior and Immunology 2: 67–78
- Kleinman A, Becker A E 1993 'Sociosomatics': The contributions of anthropology to psychosomatic medicine. Psychosomatic Medicine 60: 389–93
- Lazarus R S 1993 Coping theory and research: Past present and future. Psychosomatic Medicine 55: 234–47
- Mason J W 1968 Organization of psychoendocrine mechanisms. Psychosomatic Medicine 30(Suppl.): 365–808
- McEwen B S 1998 Protective and damaging effects of stress mediators. New England Journal of Medicine 338: 171–9
- Moynihan J A, Ader R 1996 Psychoneuroimmunology: Animal models of disease. Psychosomatic Medicine 58: 546–58
- Oken D 1989 Current theoretical concepts in psychosomatic medicine. In: Kaplan H I, Sadock B J (eds.) Comprehensive Textbook of Psychiatry/V, 5th edn. Williams and Wilkins, Baltimore, MD, Chap. 25.2
- Reiser M F 1975 Changing theoretical concepts in psychosomatic medicine. In: Reiser M F (ed.) American Handbook of Psychiatry, Volume 4, 2nd edn. Basic Books, New York
- Reiser M F 1984 Mind, Brain, Body: Toward a Convergence of Psychoanalysis and Neurobiology. Basic Books, New York
- Selye H 1950 Stress. Acta, Montreal, Canada
- Stainbrook E 1952 Psychosomatic medicine in the 19th century. Psychosomatic Medicine 14: 211–27
- Weiner H 1977 Psychobiology and Human Disease. Elsevier, New York
- Weiner H, Hofer M A, Stunkard A J (eds.) 1981 Brain, Behavior and Bodily Disease. Raven Press, New York

D. Oken

Copyright © 2001 Elsevier Science Ltd.
All rights reserved.

12457

Psychotherapy and Hermeneutics

Well into the 1970s the atmosphere in the field of psychotherapy was characterized by a war of the schools. Psychoanalysis in its various forms, the humanistic movement, behaviorism, and cognitive therapy were the major players in a battle that included an ever growing number of contenders. The main assumption was that one theory was right and all the others were wrong; the question was which one would carry the day.

The statistical meta-analyses of psychotherapy outcome studies produced a result that called this basic assumption into question. It turned out that by and large all psychotherapeutic methods were helpful, and that the theory and technique applied was a very poor predictor of outcome. The question therefore became what metatheoretical framework could make sense of what seemed a conundrum: It simply didn't seem to matter how you worked. If anything it was important that client and therapist had a good rapport, and that the therapist had some convincing narrative framework that made sense of the client's suffering and problems (e.g., Orlinsky and Howard 1986).

This in turn squared well with positions taken by anthropologist Claude Lévi-Strauss ([1949] 1963) and psychiatrist Jerome Frank (1963). Both claimed that twentieth century Western psychotherapy was just a subcase of practices that were to be found in almost every existing culture. Lévi-Strauss's classic paper argued that the shamanic healer and the psychoanalyst did essentially the same thing: They integrated meaningless and therefore frightening phenomena into a symbolic system. Frank's model was that psychotherapy included three factors: a socially established status of healer, a myth or narrative that was applied to the patient's condition, and a ritual that structured the application of the myth to the patient's condition. Essentially the difference between Western and other forms of therapy only concerned the institutions that conferred status of healership, the myths that were applied, and the rituals that were enacted. These theoretical positions foreshadowed the empirical result of psychotherapy research. It turned out that a hermeneutic understanding of psychotherapy was one of the better candidates to present the profession with a new self-understanding.

1. The Nature and History of Hermeneutics

Hermeneutics originally denoted the discipline of interpreting texts. The place of origin of hermeneutics was the interpretation of the holy scriptures of the various religions, which entailed a variety of problems: how to derive laws from texts, and how to find out what the—presumably divine—intention behind the text was. There were several attempts to codify hermeneutic rules that were guided by specific religious, political, and social needs. The assumption of classical hermeneutics was that there was one right interpretation; the question was how to reach it.

It was in the nineteenth century, with the rise of philology and the Geisteswissenschaften as academic disciplines that methodological self-reflection of hermeneutics achieved a different turn. The sharpening of historical consciousness made it evident that the model of the one meaning behind the text (determined by the author's intention) was problematic. Furthermore it became evident that interpretation varied according to the historical position of the interpreter.

In the twentieth century the groundwork for philosophical hermeneutics was laid by Martin Heidegger's Being and Time ([1927] 1962). In it Heidegger claimed that the idea of the human subject as a mind contemplating the world was flawed and misleading. Human beings were primarily involved in what he called 'being-in-the-world.' This mode of being involved a pre-reflective interpretation of the world within which subjects projected themselves into a future on the basis of an understanding of their past.

Interpretation was therefore not an activity confined to the reading of texts, but was essential to the human condition as such. There could be no such thing as meeting an object (or another subject) outside an interpretive framework. This preunderstanding was not created by individual subjects through conscious intention. Instead it was the horizon within which all action and understanding took place.

Heidegger's student Hans-Georg Gadamer can be credited with having written the major text of philosophical hermeneutics, Truth and Method ([1960] 1975), taking Heidegger's ideas as its foundation. Gadamer claimed that human beings always lived within a horizon of intelligibility, a preunderstanding that guided their whole mode of being. The understanding of texts was just a special case of the activity of understanding essential to human life.

The question of interpretation did not arise if two subjects moved in the same horizon of intelligibility. Understanding each other was then a matter of course as in everyday interactions with people and texts (like newspapers or bank statements). Interpretation becomes problematic only when the speaker's (or author's) and the listener's (or reader's) horizon or intelligibility diverges.

If they did, the reader needed to integrate the text into his or her own horizon of intelligibility, as there can be no understanding outside this context. But in doing so, the reader expands this very horizon of intelligibility. If for example contemporary readers try to understand a Platonic dialogue, they may find out that their horizon of intelligibility simply does not fit some of the assumptions needed to make the Platonic text intelligible. They may therefore try to reconstruct the horizon of intelligibility implicit in the Platonic text.

By doing so, they may come to the point of understanding Plato better than Plato understood himself. Plato (like any one of us) could not be fully aware of the horizons of intelligibility, the pre-understanding of the world that made his world and his life meaningful. Human beings are never completely transparent to themselves, as we are embedded in historical contexts that are not fully understood.

Historical distance therefore creates both the necessity for interpretation and the perspective that allows the interpreter to understand aspects of meaning that were not accessible to the author. At the same time the activity of interpretation also changes the interpreter. The integration of historically (or culturally) distant horizons of intelligibility makes the interpreter more conscious of his or her own point of view, and thus changes and widens it.

Philosophical hermeneutics provided an interpretive frame that made it clear why there could never be a final understanding of any text. Every historical period, and every cultural position, needs to integrate texts and cultural practices that are historically or culturally distant into its own horizons. The interpretive act is therefore much closer to a dialog between interpreter and text (or cultural practice) than to the unearthing of a pre-existing meaning.

2. Hermeneutics and Psychotherapy

The hermeneutic approach to psychopathology and psychiatry was already introduced at the beginning of the twentieth century primarily through Karl Jaspers (1913) and the existential school of psychotherapy. The latter (Ellenberger and May 1958) was primarily based on the direct application of Heidegger's philosophy to the understanding of psychopathology. Psychotherapy was essentially viewed as the elucidation of the patient's modes of being-in-the-world. The point of psychotherapy was therefore to interpret and change the patients' interpretation of their Lebenswelt.

The European existentialist tradition in psychotherapy lost its cohesiveness as a movement, and philosophical hermeneutics began to be reapplied to psychotherapy within psychoanalysis first in Europe: Paul Ricoeur ([1965] 1970) in France, Jürgen Habermas (1971) in Germany, and then in the USA, Donald Spence (1981) and Roy Schafer (1983). Their common denominator was to argue that psychoanalysis had misunderstood its own nature by formulating itself in terms of a natural science model.

Psychoanalysis, they argued, was not a theory that discovered causal laws that connected between childhood events and psychopathological symptoms. It was the activity of helping patients to make themselves intelligible to themselves (Strenger 1991).

Schafer and Spence used literary theory in addition to hermeneutics in their attempt to clarify the nature of psychoanalysis (see Psychoanalysis in Clinical Psychology). In Schafer's model patients are seen as those whose narrative of themselves is overly narrow, simplified, and closed. This narrative (the term would correspond to Gadamer's 'preunderstanding') narrows down the patient's options of living, because life, human encounters, and actions are interpreted in overly rigid terms (e.g., 'every interaction is a power-struggle').

Psychoanalytic interpretation in this view is not the uncovering of a historical cause or pre-existing unconscious wish. It is the making explicit of the patients' interpretation of their world, their mind, and their interpersonal relationships. In other words: The object of psychoanalytic interpretation is the patient's self-interpretation. Its goal is to change this interpretation by making it conscious. The very act of making it conscious will lead to a change of the patient's self-interpretation.

In this manner Schafer achieved two objectives: first he freed psychoanalysis from the need of extraclinical validation of causal claims (e.g., unresolved Oedipal issues lead to psychoneurotic symptoms). Second, he made it possible to understand why analysts of different theoretical orientations would come to interpret the patient's mental life in different terms. In Gadamer's terms the analyst could only work from a particular horizon of intelligibility. Understanding the patient always meant the integration of the patient's self-understanding into a new horizon of intelligibility.

Quite quickly the application of the hermeneutic point of view began to spread to other psychotherapeutic approaches. Collections like Hermeneutics and Psychological Theory (Messer et al. 1988) showed that the hermeneutic point of view was, in fact, fruitfully applicable to almost every discipline in psychology. Anything from behavioral-cognitive through family therapy to social psychology could be reinterpreted in hermeneutic terms.

Since the 1990s the term 'hermeneutics' has not often been used explicitly in the psychotherapeutic literature. Nevertheless it could be said that its tenets have turned into something like a metatheoretical implicit consensus in the field. Most authors implicitly or explicitly assume that psychotherapy intervenes in the patient's meaning system. Furthermore it has become something like an implicit orthodoxy to accept that there are always many ways to construe the patient's experience.

The hermeneutic understanding of psychotherapy tends to go along with a constructivist understanding of psychotherapeutic activity: Psychotherapy does not uncover (or change) the single cause of symptoms, maladaptive character traits, feeling states, etc. It reinterprets the patient's actions, thoughts, and emotions in new terms. It is taken to be a matter of course that it is conceptually impossible to specify one correct such construal, since construals of the world are always perspectival (cf. Stolorow et al. 1987).

There are two major beneficial implications of the hermeneutic understanding of psychotherapy: first, it has led to a more ecumenical atmosphere in the field. The wars of the schools are largely over, and instead different approaches can enter fruitful dialogs. Second, it has led to greater sensitivity to the patient's right to a subjectivity of his or her own. If all psychotherapy is hermeneutic construction, it is not fruitful and legitimate to impose such construal on the patient. Current writers (e.g., Aron 1996, Strenger 1998) emphasize the necessity of turning the psychotherapeutic interaction into a more egalitarian and dialogical activity.

Meanwhile there have been extensive efforts to detect trends that favor some forms of therapy for particular disturbances (e.g., Roth and Fonagy 1996) that seem to reverse the original verdict that theory and technique do not make any difference whatsoever (e.g., obsessive-compulsive disorder favors a combination between cognitive-behavioral therapy and antidepressant medication; generalized, nonspecific character disorders favor interpersonal and psychodynamic approaches; see Psychological Treatments, Empirically Supported). Nevertheless these efforts have maintained the ecumenical trend in psychotherapy. The hermeneutic understanding of the nature of psychotherapy as an activity that generates meaning might well continue to serve as a framework that will enable the continuation of this discussion under the aegis of cooperation rather than competition between schools.

See also: Constructivist Psychotherapies; Hermeneutics, History of

Bibliography

- Aron L 1996 A Meeting of Minds. Mutuality in Psychoanalysis. Analytic Press, Hillsdale, NJ
- Ellenberger H, May R (eds.) 1958 Existence. Basic Books, New York
- Frank J D 1963 Persuasion and Healing. Johns Hopkins University Press, Baltimore, MD
- Gadamer H-G 1960 1975 Truth and Method. Seabury Press, New York
- Habermas J 1971 Knowledge and Human Interest. Beacon Press, Boston
- Heidegger M 1927 1962 Being and Time. Harper and Row, New York
- Jaspers K 1913 Allgemeine Psychopathologie. J. Springer, Berlin
- Lévi-Strauss C 1949 1963 The effectiveness of symbols. In: Structural Anthropology. Basic Books, New York, Vol. 1
- Messer S B, Sass L A, Woolfolk R L (eds.) 1988 Hermeneutics and Psychological Theory. Rutgers University Press, New Brunswick, NJ
- Orlinsky D E, Howard K I 1986 Process and outcome in psychotherapy. In: Garfield S L, Bergin A E (eds.) Handbook of Psychotherapy and Behavior Change, 3rd edn. Wiley, New York, pp. 311–84

- Ricoeur P 1970 Freud and Philosophy. Yale University Press, New Haven, CT
- Roth A, Fonagy P 1996 What Works for Whom. Guilford Press, New York
- Schafer R 1983 The Analytic Attitude. Basic Books, New York
- Spence D P 1981 Narrative Truth and Historical Truth, 1st edn. Norton, New York
- Stolorow R D, Brandchaft B, Atwood G E 1987 Psychoanalytic Treatment, An Intersubjective Approach. Analytic Press, Hillsdale, NJ
- Strenger C 1991 Between Hermeneutics and Science. An Essay on the Epistemology of Psychoanalysis. International Universities Press, Madison, WI
- Strenger C 1998 Individuality, the Impossible Project: Psychoanalysis and Self Creation. International Universities Press, Madison, WI

C. Strenger

Psychotherapy and Pharmacotherapy, Combined

1. Background and Introduction

Combined psychopharmacology and psychotherapy is a treatment form quite accepted and ubiquitous in modern psychiatric practice (Beitman 1983). It may have its origins in the writings of Fromm-Reichman wherein the role and responsibilities of the analytic treating therapist were differentiated from the managerial therapist, a feature of long-term psychotherapy in the 1940s (Fromm-Reichman 1947). Further explicated by Firman, the rationale of this division of labor was based on analytic principles: the 'psychotherapist' should ideally not be in any managerial relationship with respect to the patient so that the patient's fantasies about the therapist could be viewed and analyzed as material emanating from the patient's own self (Firman 1982). According to Firman, the usefulness of this relationship is two fold: the 'outsider' (managerial) therapist can serve as a negative split object upon whom the patient can focus her own negative features. This serves to allow the tenuous whole-object relationship with the treatment therapist to proceed without jeopardy. Firman viewed the splitting that would occur in such collaborative relationships to be in a therapeutic setting and thus under better and safer control for the patient (Balon 1999, Firman 1982).

Since then, the techniques used in analytic practice and with patients in long-term psychotherapy have been transferred to almost all types of psychotherapy. Fueling this have been newer and simpler types of psychotropic medication which physicians, other than psychiatrists, feel comfortable prescribing (Horgan 1985, Regier et al. 1978, Schurman et al. 1985) and systems of care which have advocated for lower costs for patient care. Additionally, numerous research studies confirm that the combination of psychopharmacology and psychotherapy treatments are more effective than each alone (Goldsmith et al. 1999, Karasu 1992, Koenigsberg 1994, Manning et al. 1992) adding incentives for therapists to seek consultation for their patients from physicians regarding medication.

In modern psychiatry, collaborative treatment wherein a psychiatrist or other physician provides the medication and manages medical issues while a non-physician therapist provides the psychotherapy is a common and growing treatment modality. While the field has not definitively defined this paradigm, the American Psychiatric Association published guidelines describing the responsibilities in a collaborative relationship, noting that the psychiatrist and therapist share responsibility for the care of the patient in accordance with the qualifications and limitations of each person's discipline and abilities (American Psychiatric Association 1980). Various terms have been used in the literature and in clinical care to describe this practice which include medication backup; split treatment; combined treatment; medical management; co-treatment; triangular treatment; collaborative treatment; medical backup, and parallel treatment. For the purposes of this section we will call this practice 'collaborative treatment.'

What has not been definitively researched, however, are the best methods for providing collaborative treatment. Recognizing the cognitive and emotional problems for all parties, Goldsmith and co-workers and others have sought to better explicate the potential difficulties and sources of conflict (Berg 1986, Bradley 1990, Chiles et al. 1984, Goldsmith et al. 1999, Kingsbury 1987). Others have described the positive aspects of this form of treatment (Balon 1999, Michels 1995).

The remainder of this article will focus on some of the highlights of collaborative treatment: the positive and negative aspects, legal and ethical issues, and suggestions for maximizing the collaborative process.

2. Positive and Negative Aspects of Collaborative Treatment

The combination of psychopharmacology and psychotherapy, or collaborative treatment, has some positive and negative aspects. As noted by Beitman (1983), collaborative treatment is based on a triangular relationship between psychiatrists, patients, and nonmedical therapists. In an ideal world, such a triangle should have just positive aspects, e.g., utilization of special talents. Triangular relationships, however, could also be a breeding ground for difficulties or negative aspects, such as splitting. The negative aspects of collaborative treatment do not arise only from patients' pathology. As Brill (1977) pointed out, 'More and more nonmedical mental health professionals began to resist and resent working under the direction of a psychiatrist. They believe that their own professions and therapeutic skills have advanced to the point that independence and self-determination were justified.' He emphasized the emergence of territorial conflicts arising in collaborative 'team' treatment. The territorial or turf conflicts and concerns are a bilateral issue—psychiatrists, as much as nonmedical therapists, frequently view the 'other side' as a competitor rather than a collaborator.

Collaborative treatment could benefit the patient only if it is truly collaborative, when positive aspects are maximized and negative aspects minimized. Awareness of the possible positive and negative aspects of collaborative treatment is the first step in maximizing the collaborative relationship (see below).

2.1 Positive Aspects of Collaborative Treatment

2.1.1 Utilization of special talents of both therapist and psychiatrists. As Balon (1999) pointed out, both professionals may possess expertise in special areas, e.g., mood disorders, eating disorders. Firman (1982) also pointed out that a psychiatrist who is a skillful psychotherapist could also serve as a second therapist, or a negative split object, on whom the patient focuses many of his/her own disowned negative features.

2.1.2 Cost-effective utilization of all resources. This is an issue especially important to patients. Due to various economic pressures, most patients cannot afford psychotherapy by psychiatrists unless they have good mental health care benefits. In many cases, insurance companies either do not cover psychotherapy by psychiatrists or pay an amount that is not acceptable by psychiatrists. Psychotherapy provided by nonmedical psychotherapists is considered cheaper (a contentious issue; see Goldman et al. 1998) and frequently is covered by insurance companies. Most patients thus can still benefit from the combination of pharmacotherapy and psychotherapy.

2.1.3 Better opportunity for patient to select therapist with similar ethnic and/or gender background. Some authors (e.g., Foulks and Pena 1995) have advocated that matching a patient with a therapist or physician of a similar ethnic or cultural background may facilitate the process of psychotherapy or pharmacotherapy. Others (Yamamoto et al. 1993) have warned that this matching could have its pitfalls and could be discriminatory at times. Nadelson and Zimmerman (1993) have recommended that a patient's request for a therapist or psychiatrist of a specific gender, ethnicity, or race or a patient's uneasiness with a particular therapist's or psychiatrist's gender, ethnicity, or race should be an issue explored and addressed in therapy.

2.1.4 Increased time and resources available for patients. The combination of a 20-minute medication review and 50-minute therapy session represent more resources than just one of these modalities and is an unquestionable benefit. The combination of resources is also advantageous during the temporary absence of a psychiatrist or therapist.

2.1.5 Increased amount of clinical information. There may be information that the patient feels more comfortable sharing with their therapist and vice versa. Thus, psychiatrist and therapist should set time aside to share information, impressions, and concerns and to support each other in their efforts to help patients (Pilette 1988).

2.1.6 Enhancement of compliance. As Paykel (1995) pointed out, psychotherapy may assist or possibly hinder, medication compliance. Similarly, collaborative treatment may also increase compliance with psychotherapy.

2.1.7 Professional and emotional support for both therapist and psychiatrist. As Pilette (1988) pointed out, such support is especially important when the patient is difficult to treat and also during times of crisis.

2.2 Negative Aspects of Collaborative Treatment

2.2.1 Inappropriate prescribing decisions without knowledge of the content of therapy. The prescribing psychiatrist may not always be aware of all the inner conflicts or external pressures felt by the patient. For instance, the psychiatrist may prescribe medication for anxiety that arose after an important intrapsychic conflict was addressed in therapy with the non-medical therapist.

2.2.2 Potentially discrepant information given by the patient to each clinician. Frequently, the discrepant information provided by the patient to both treating professionals could lead to decisions with serious consequences. This issue is directly related to the next one—splitting.

2.2.3 Splitting of clinicians. This is probably the most frequently discussed negative aspect of collaborative treatment. Treatment provided by two persons provides a fertile ground for a patient to develop negative transference, to introduce problematic countertransference and to split the prescribing psychiatrist and therapist. Splitting may lead to non-compliance with any of the treatments.

2.2.4 Unclear confidentiality. As Pilette (1988) pointed out, is the collaborative treatment an occasion for free communication between a therapist and psychiatrist without the patient's consent? What if the patient asks that some important information not be related to the other treating professional? These issues are complicated and need to be discussed and resolved.

2.2.5 Clouded legal and clinical responsibility. It is not always clear who is legally responsible for various aspects of collaborative treatment. It is rather safe to assume, however, that the psychiatrist will most likely be found legally responsible for all aspects of clinical care including inappropriate or negligent supervision (Balon 1999).

2.2.6 Lack of reimbursement for collaboration. The fact that third party payors do not reimburse for collaboration somewhat hinders the collaborative treatment.

2.2.7 Various misconceptions of patient, therapist, and psychiatrist. These include issues such as therapists and psychiatrists ignoring the psychological meaning of medication, psychiatrists' belief that therapists should always agree with and support physicians' decisions, and patients' common perception that psychiatrists are only interested in prescribing medication (Goldsmith et al. 1999).

This is only a brief summary of positive and negative aspects of collaborative treatment. More thorough discussion of both positive and negative aspects is provided in the two introductory chapters of Psychopharmacology and Psychotherapy. A Collaborative Approach (Goldsmith et al. 1999, Riba and Balon 1999).

3. Legal and Ethical Issues

3.1 Legal

The major worry in collaborative treatment is that with two clinicians delivering the care, there will be a loss of information or understanding of what may be occurring for the patient. There are currently no standards in place for how frequently or for how long patients should be seen by physicians if collaborative treatment is provided. There is, therefore, a broad range of frequency of visits and communication patterns between the patient, therapist, and physician, which range from ideal to inadequate. Because medications are involved in collaborative treatment and historically have been the source of significant legal exposure, the issue of medical practice is an important topic for discussion. Negligence underlying malpractice liability is of two types: (a) carelessness in gathering necessary data about a patient and (b) negligence in assessing that information in determining appropriate treatment modalities, interventions, providing precautions, etc. (Macbeth 1999). Psychiatric medications, like all medications, are associated with side effects. Physicians who prescribe medications become liable if there is a deviation in the accepted uses of the medications and there results harm to the patient. It is critical for physicians to obtain informed consent from patients when prescribing medication and also to ascertain liability for patient suicide.

If patients are going to be seen infrequently by the prescribing physician, there must be a way for the physician to set up a communication pattern where side effects and suicidality are made known, to the extent possible, to the physician, on a regular basis. For example, if a patient were being seen by the physician every six months but the therapist is seeing the patient weekly, then the therapist and physician must discuss how issues and developments about the patient can be communicated.

In collaborative treatment, it must be determined how the treatment plan is shared between the clinicians; how emergencies including hospitalization will be managed; and who is directing the psychotherapy. The setting may play a large role in the extent to which the physician, therapist, and patient communicate. In many public settings, for example, the psychiatrist only sees the patient infrequently. The patient, however, has a case manager whose job it is to communicate to the various clinicians about the patient. In managed care settings, psychiatrists may find themselves in relationships with therapists whom they don't know and who are unaware of their skills, talents, experience, etc. There may be disincentives for the physician to see the patient often, even when more psychosocial problems accumulate for the patient. In collaborative treatment in certain settings, patients sometimes don't even know who the doctor is and often the physician has not had the chance or taken the opportunity to meet with the patient's family, since others (therapists, case managers, nurses, a previous physician) might have already done so.

There is, therefore, a range of potential legal problems for physicians who engage in collaborative treatment. Physicians are usually viewed as 'the deep pocket' when there is a lawsuit regarding a patient's treatment. The physician usually carries more insurance than the nonphysician therapist and is viewed by juries as 'being in charge' by virtue of education and experience. Even if the plaintiff's attorney does not believe that the psychiatrist was central to the matter, it is often likely that the psychiatrist will be part of the suit to extend the limits of insurance and to try to reach 'the deep pocket.' There is also the problem that occurs when there is more than one defendant. One defendant can try to make their case stronger by blaming the other defendant, thereby turning against one another. Another problem is that even if medications or the medical management provided by the physician is of minor importance to the reason for the suit, regardless of the realities, the physician is often viewed as being in charge while the therapist is viewed as subordinate to the physician.

Finally, physicians are increasingly signing contracts to provide services for patients in managed care. These contracts are usually written by the companies themselves and the fine print is not read carefully by the physician, causing them to be implicitly involved in relationships with therapists that are not collaborative in nature but more supervisory. This practice, therefore, often puts the physician at further risk.

There are some suggestions for clinicians to heed in order to decrease legal risk in collaborative treatment:

(a) Clinicians should understand the settings they are practicing in, including its operations and routines.

(b) Care should not be compromised because of the setting or because the patient is being treated in a collaborative model.

(c) Use good communication techniques with professionals with whom you are sharing responsibility for the patient. Document these discussions.

(d) If supervision is part of the collaborative relationship, then set regular supervision times and amend depending on the patient's condition and needs.

(e) Read the fine print in all managed care and other contracts that are signed.

For a more thorough discussion of these issues, please see the work of Macbeth (1999).

3.2 Ethical

When patients receive collaborative treatment because that is what is deemed best for their care, then there is not an ethical problem. An ethical and clinical dilemma however, may exist if such care is provided because of cost considerations (Lazarus 1999). While some patients clearly benefit from team approaches to care, others do not. Research is starting to help us discriminate between such patients and determine mental health outcomes in different practice and fee arrangements (Rogers et al. 1993, Wells et al. 1992). Goldman et al. (1998), for example, has shown that for many patients, psychotherapy and psychopharmacology provided by a psychiatrist alone is as effective and less costly than collaborative treatment.

There are four bioethical principles that need to be considered when one is providing collaborative treatment (Beauchamp and Childress 1994):

- (a) Beneficence: the covenant between professional and patient to do what is in the patient's best interest;
- (b) Nonmaleficence: the principle of doing no harm;
- (c) Autonomy: respect for the individual rights of patients, especially in the area of informed consent and treatment refusal; and
- (d) Justice: the fair treatment of patients.

As noted by Lazarus, when determining ethical dilemmas related to collaborative treatment, any two or more of the above principles may be compromised or in conflict (Lazarus 1999). In this era of cost containment and lack of standards regarding collaborative treatment, all of these principles are being tested. The American Psychiatric Association (APA 1993) and the American Medical Association (AMA 1994) have addressed ethical principles and have recognized the importance of collaborative treatment. Section 5 of the AMA principles states: 'A physician shall continue to study, apply and advance scientific knowledge, make relevant information available to patients, colleagues, and the public, obtain consultation, and use the talents of other health professionals when indicated' (AMA 1994).

It is a complex area where psychiatrists and other mental health professionals engaged in collaborative treatment can find themselves in ethical dilemmas. Some of this has to do with the settings and the rules within those settings; physician-therapist relationships that should be modified because of the patient's condition but may not be; need for differential types of supervision and monitoring between therapist and physician but which are not taken into consideration; fee schedules that cause disincentives for providers to see patients more often, even when needed; lack of understanding by the patient of the nature of the collaborative relationship between the providers; etc.

In order for health professionals to provide psychotherapy and psychopharmacology in an ethical manner, Lazarus (1999) suggests:

(a) The physician and therapist keep themselves adequately and appropriately informed of the nature of the treatment and the progress of those patients cared for in this type of treatment.

(b) The physician and therapist assure themselves that the treatment is being carried out competently and adequately.

(c) The physician and therapist provide enough supervision, consultation, or collaboration to ensure that their ethical, medical, and legal responsibilities towards the patient are satisfied.

(d) The collaborative treatment is consistent with any local, state or national guidelines outlining psychiatrists' responsibilities to patients and in conformity with licensure requirements and the scope of practice of all the healthcare professionals involved.

4. Maximizing the Collaborative Relationship

Providing combined psychopharmacology and psychotherapy is a complex enterprise, much more difficult than a single therapist providing either the psychotherapy; psychotherapy and pharmacotherapy; or pharmacotherapy. There are, therefore, some general suggestions offered that might be useful.

It is incumbent upon the clinicians and patients involved in such treatment to be aware of the complicated nature of this form of care. While combining psychopharmacology and psychotherapy offers distinct and unique advantages, there are problems, as noted in the above section. Time and attention must, therefore, be given to the process of treatment as well as the content. Written contracts between clinicians have even been suggested as a way to delineate the specific duties and responsibilities of providers (Appelbaum 1991). Other authors have suggested that the patient be part of the three way contract and so be asked to sign such agreements for care (Chiles et al. 1984, Woodward et al. 1993). Specific guidelines for combined care based on the phases of treatment (initial, mid, termination) have been described by Rand (1999). Kahn (1990) has delineated the ideological differences that the psychotherapist and psychopharmacologist often have and the identified roles they must play in order to provide such treatment.

It is probably prudent for clinicians, both physicians and nonphysician therapists, to review their case mix from time to time. Goals would be to limit the numbers of such collaborative treatments based on the amount of time it takes to speak with other therapists; review and develop joint treatment plans; read other clinicians' notes; determine the background and treatment orientation of the clinicians who are collaborating on patient care; work with patients' families and significant others; develop vacation and coverage schedules with collaborating clinicians; discuss such arrangements with patients; etc. Such thoughtful processes may lead to a decrease in malpractice exposure and ultimately more efficient and useful clinical care.

Attention must be paid carefully to the issue of confidentiality and communication between clinicians and with the patient. Consent to discuss treatment plans as well as content of sessions must be clarified. Since it is impossible to initially predict what will be important or relevant, the patient must be cognizant of these communication patterns and provide consent to clinicians at the beginning of treatment. Any barriers to such communication should be discussed with the patient as well as any relevant family members. It should be determined how the information will be transmitted, that is by telephone, electronic communication, mail, in person, etc. and how often. Communication must be regular, not just when there is a crisis (Vasile and Gutheil 1979). It is critical that the patient understands which type of problems should be discussed with which clinician. Further, patients should not be placed in the position of needing to relay information between clinician and the other.

Even with that said, it will sometimes be difficult to sort out. As an example, often what seems like uncomfortable medication side effects could be resistance to taking medications. What seems like a dynamic issue in therapy could in fact be a medical problem. Clinicians need to be supportive of the treatment plan; listen for resistances to either psychotherapy or pharmacotherapy; try to delineate the boundary of the treatment being provided by the individual clinician; and talk regularly with one another about the patient's progress. Because of financial remuneration patterns and modern contractual agreements between clinicians and payers, it is easier than ever for a clinician to find themselves responsible for large numbers of patients, many of whom are not being seen frequently or regularly. This can lead to problems with the inherent doctor-patient relationship that is the hallmark of providing care, whether it is pharmacotherapy, psychotherapy, or both. The clinician is well advised to review the ethical boundaries of the work situation and the nature of the tasks required.

Certain patient populations may be at higher risk in such combined therapies. For example, patients with personality disorders are notoriously difficult to treat given their problems with interpersonal relationships. As summarized by Silk (1999) and others, patients with Cluster B diagnoses are prone to splitting (Kernberg 1975); often do not tell the entire story equally to all clinicians (Main 1957); and tend to externalize problems (Silk et al. 1995). When there is concomitant substance abuse, emotional lability, and self-mutilating behaviors, combined treatment with more than one clinician can be enormously difficult and complex.

Finally, psychiatry residency training programs and graduate programs in social work and psychology must develop education and training in the specific area of combined treatment. Teaching psychopharmacology alone or psychotherapy without integrated pharmacotherapy is no longer sufficient. There needs to be curricula developed and teachers who are trained themselves in how to deliver such care with emphasis on learning to communicate clearly with other professionals; thinking clearly about diagnosis and treatment strategies; and developing leadership abilities (Spitz et al. 1999).

5. Conclusion

Providing combined pharmacotherapy and psychotherapy is a growing and important part of psychiatric care. It is a complex dynamic treatment, fraught with potential pitfalls but offering many advantages. Importantly, it offers a unique opportunity for a biopsychosocial and fiscal model of care and interesting areas for future research and clinical development.

Bibliography

- American Medical Association Council on Ethical and Judicial Affairs 1994 Code of Medical Ethics: Current Opinions with Annotations. American Medical Association, Chicago, IL
- American Psychiatric Association 1980 Guidelines for psychiatrists in consultative, supervisory, or collaborative relationships with nonmedical therapists. American Journal of Psychiatry 137: 1489-91
- American Psychiatric Association 1993 The Principles of Medical Ethics with Annotations Especially Applicable to Psychiatry. American Psychiatric Association, Washington, DC
- Appelbaum P S 1991 General guidelines for psychiatrists who prescribe medication for patients treated by nonmedical psychotherapists. Hospital and Community Psychiatry 42: 281-2
- Balon R 1999 Positive aspects of collaborative treatment. In: Riba M B, Balon R (eds.) Psychopharmacology and Psychotherapy: A Collaborative Approach. American Psychiatric Press, Washington, DC, pp. 1-31
- Beauchamp T L, Childress J F 1994 Principles of Biomedical Ethics. Oxford University Press, New York
- Beitman B D 1983 The demographics of American psychotherapists: A pilot study. American Journal of Psychotherapy 37: 37-48
- Berg M 1986 Toward a diagnostic alliance between psychiatrist and psychologist. American Psychology 41: 52-9
- Bradley S S 1990 Nonphysician psychotherapist-physician pharmacotherapist: A new model for concurrent treatment. Psychiatric Clinics of North America 13: 307-22
- Brill N Q 1977 Delineating the role of the psychiatrist on the psychiatric team. Hospital and Community Psychiatry 28: 542-4

- Chiles J A, Carlin A S, Beitman B D 1984 A physician, a nonmedical psychotherapist, and a patient: The pharmacotherapy-psychotherapy triangle. In: Beitman B D, Klerman G L (eds.) Combining Psychotherapy and Drug Therapy in Clinical Practice. SP Medical and Scientific Books, New York, pp. 89–101
- Firman G J 1982 The psychiatrist-nonmedical psychotherapy team: Opportunities for a therapeutic synergy. Journal of Operational Psychiatry 13: 32–6
- Foulks E F, Pena J M 1995 Ethnicity and pharmacotherapy: a component in the treatment of cocaine addiction in African Americans. Psychiatric Clinics of North America 18: 607–20
- Fromm-Reichman F 1947 Problems of therapeutic management in a psychoanalytic hospital. Psychoanalysis Quarterly 16: 325–56
- Goldman W, McCulloch J, Cuffel B et al. 1998 Outpatient utilization patterns of integrated and split psychotherapy and pharmacotherapy for depression. Psychiatric Services 49: 477–82
- Goldsmith R J, Paris M, Riba M B 1999 Negative aspects of collaborative treatment. In: Riba M B, Balon R (eds.) Psychopharmacology and Psychotherapy: A Collaborative Approach. American Psychiatric Press, Washington, DC, pp. 33–63
- Horgan C M 1985 Specialty and general ambulatory mental health services: Comparison of utilization and expenditures. Archives of General Psychiatry 42: 565–72
- Kahn D A 1990 The dichotomy of drugs and psychotherapy. Psychiatric Clinics of North America 13: 197–208
- Karasu T B 1992 The worst of times, the best of times: Psychotherapy in the 1990s. Journal of Psychotherapy Practical Research 1: 2–15
- Kernberg O F 1975 Borderline Conditions and Pathological Narcissism. Jason Aronson, New York
- Kingsbury S J 1987 Cognitive differences between clinical psychologists and psychiatrists. American Psychology 42: 152–6
- Koenigsberg H W 1994 The combination of psychotherapy and pharmacotherapy in the treatment of borderline patients. Journal of Psychotherapy Practical Research 3: 93–107
- Lazarus J 1999 Ethical issues in collaborative or divided treatment. Risk. In: Riba M B, Balon R (eds.) Psychopharmacology and Psychotherapy: A Collaborative Approach. American Psychiatric Press, Washington, DC, pp. 159–77
- MacBeth J E 1999 Divided treatment: Legal implications and risk. In: Riba M B, Balon R (eds.) Psychopharmacology and Psychotherapy: A Collaborative Approach. American Psychiatric Press, Washington, DC, pp. 111–58
- Main T F 1957 The ailment. British Journal of Medical Psychology 30: 129–45
- Manning D W, Markowitz J C, Frances A J 1992 A review of combined psychotherapy and pharmacotherapy in the treatment of depression. Journal of Psychotherapy Practical Research 1: 103–16
- Michels R 1995 Commentary: Medication use during psychoanalysis: A survey. Journal of Clinical Psychiatry 56: 179
- Nadelson C C, Zimmerman V 1993 Culture and psychiatric care of women. In: Gow A C (ed.) Culture, Ethnicity and Mental Illness. American Psychiatric Press, Washington, DC, pp. 501–15
- Paykel E L 1995 Psychotherapy, medication combinations, and compliance. Journal of Clinical Psychiatry 56(Suppl. 1): 29–30
- Pilette W L 1988 The rise of trepany treatment relationships. Psychotherapy 25: 420–3
- Rand E H 1999 Guidelines to maximize the process of collaborative treatment. In: Riba M B, Balon R (eds.) Psychopharmacology and Psychotherapy: A Collaborative Approach. American Psychiatric Press, Washington, DC, pp. 353–80
- Regier D A, Goldberg I D, Taube C A 1978 The de facto US mental health services system: A public health perspective. Archives of General Psychiatry 35: 685–93
- Riba M B, Balon R (eds.) 1999 Psychopharmacology and Psychotherapy: A Collaborative Approach. American Psychiatric Press, Washington, DC
- Rogers W H, Wells K B, Meredith L S et al. 1993 Outcomes for adult outpatients with depression under prepaid or fee-for-service financing. Archives of General Psychiatry 50: 517–25
- Schurman R A, Kramer P D, Mitchell J B 1985 The hidden mental health network: Treatment of mental illness by nonpsychiatrist physicians. Archives of General Psychiatry 42: 89–94
- Silk K R 1999 Collaborative treatment: Personality disorder patients. In: Riba M B, Balon R (eds.) Psychopharmacology and Psychotherapy: A Collaborative Approach. American Psychiatric Press, Washington, DC, pp. 221–77
- Silk K R, Lee S, Hill E M et al. 1995 Borderline personality-disorder symptoms and severity of sexual abuse. American Journal of Psychiatry 152: 1059–64
- Spitz D, Hansen-Grant S, Riba M B 1999 Residency training issues in collaborative treatment. In: Riba M B, Balon R (eds.) Psychopharmacology and Psychotherapy: A Collaborative Approach. American Psychiatric Press, Washington, DC, pp. 279–306
- Vasile R G, Gutheil T G 1979 The psychiatrist as medical backup: Ambiguity in the delegation of clinical responsibility. American Journal of Psychiatry 136: 1292–6
- Wells K B, Burnam M A, Rogers W H et al. 1992 The course of depression in adult outpatients: Results from the medical outcomes study. Archives of General Psychiatry 49: 788–94
- Woodward B, Duckworth K S, Gutheil T G 1993 The pharmacotherapist-psychotherapist collaboration. In: Oldham J M, Riba M B, Tasman A (eds.) American Psychiatric Press Review of Psychiatry, Vol. 12. American Psychiatric Press, Washington, DC, pp. 631–39
- Yamamoto J, Silva J A, Justice L R et al. 1993 Cross-cultural psychotherapy. In: Gow A C (ed.) Culture, Ethnicity and Mental Illness. American Psychiatric Press, Washington, DC, pp. 101–24

M. B. Riba and R. Balon

Psychotherapy and Religion

It has been suggested that the reason psychotherapy is consistently linked with medicine and a medical model is an artifact of Freud's profession as a neurologist. Had he come from another discipline, what is considered to be therapeutic might be altogether different. If, for example, he had been a member of the clergy then perhaps the relationship between psychotherapy and religion that has persisted in the twentieth century might be less adversarial. The politics, economics, and social forces that have been behind the formation of the relationship between religion and psychotherapy are beyond the scope of this article. The intent here is to present the parallel paths of religion, particularly that with Judeo-Christian roots, and psychotherapy as it has developed in the industrialized West. We will consider at which points these paths have crossed, where they have diverged, and, ultimately, what effect this has had on the practice of psychotherapy as it is understood at the beginning of the twenty-first century.

1. Establishing Common Language

Prior to our exploration of the paths of religion and psychotherapy, a common language for health and pathology must be established in order to accurately read the road markers. Miller and Thoresen (Miller 1999) have proposed a construct of health that includes the domains of suffering, function, and coherence. As they point out, suffering is a state that can be understood as a 'form of unhealth and a common reason for seeking help, from either spiritual or psychological professionals.' Second, functional ability also is a term that is understood in either discipline. Third, the domain of coherence or inner peace is also defined in the language of both disciplines, although perhaps more subjective and less easily observed than the other two.

Due to a lack of specific focus on behavior, these overlapping domains often add more confusion than clarity, as in the case of certain extreme behaviors diagnosed as psychotic when considered from a therapeutic standpoint. Within this context, this cluster of behaviors suggests that an individual's normal affective and cognitive functions have gone awry. Common manifestations include audio and/or visual hallucinations, delusions that may appear grandiose or paranoid in nature, hypersensitivity, and an apparent disregard for those personal care habits consistently linked with health. However, these same behaviors in the context of religious tradition might be deemed a mystical experience or even the pinnacle of spiritual health. William James conceptualized the mystical state as merely another form of consciousness, albeit rare, that could be stimulated either by internal states or external substance. This mirrors Hunt's (1985) sentiment that mysticism is a direct manifestation of normal but usually inaccessible semantic operations. Therefore, it would appear then that specific target behaviors are unlikely to be the most fruitful ground for establishing common definitions for health and pathology. Perhaps a more useful approach would focus not on the specific behavior itself, but on the individual's experience of it, which is completely in line with the Miller and Thoresen (Miller 1999) domains.

James described four aspects of the truly mystical experience that appear to be rare in the experience of psychosis. The first is presentience. Mystical transcendence is more similar with an intuitive sense of knowing than it is with knowledge derived from either thought or sensation. Additionally, this transcendental experience affords the individual a new awareness of 'self' and 'other.' Armstrong (1989) adds that true mystics then demonstrate that this inner identity has come to fruition in outer world behavior. In other words, to be 'an integrated inner person is to be a productive outer person,' which is rarely the experience of the person in the midst of a psychotic episode. The second characteristic has been termed a noetic quality, or that of a being knowing about itself. This knowledge can be similar to a successful outcome in psychotherapy, but rarely of the psychotic experience. The third quality is that the mystical experience is usually transient, even in the most devout and saintly. It apparently is impossible to hold on to the presence of the Absolute for any length of time. The final characteristic of the mystical that was suggested by James was that of passivity. While an individual can dispose oneself to incorporate a deeper understanding and knowledge of the Divine, this wisdom cannot be called up like a specter. James noted that it was not uncommon for mystical union to be methodically cultivated as an element of religious life, similar to the actions of medieval mystics. But, he added, it is possible to stumble into the mystical, perhaps if one is inherently of the appropriate nature. What is also important in this regard, is that both Eastern and Western traditions have suggested that the mystical experience is not pure if the person is unprepared for or unwilling to lead a better life based on the knowledge imparted. This is a vital distinction given the common and profound sense of unpreparedness of persons experiencing severe psychopathology.

As has been previously suggested, when these four attributes of the mystical are compared to psychotic experiences, one may find some common observable traits. However, in studies comparing the experiences of people with schizophrenia and mystics, Buckley (1981) found that while both share a sense of noesis, heightened perceptual abilities, communication with the divine, and exultation, only in psychosis was there the experience of thought disruption, and therefore an inability to incorporate the knowledge in an effective way. It is also true that individuals with schizophrenia can go for extended periods of time without any relief from these experiences, where the mystic, as noted above, sustains this experience only briefly. And, in spiritual people, mystical experiences correlate significantly with psychological well-being, self-actualization, and optimism. Conversely, psychotic episodes tend to be marked with more negative emotional affect.

To summarize, what is aberrant and what is healthy, regardless of whether one is following a psychological or religious model, is not so much the events themselves but the experience of the events. Although psychospiritual experiences can be present in many different contexts, it would seem that both psychotherapists and religious practitioners can agree on an optimally healthy state for any individual. While cultural variation will no doubt exist, this target state would allow the person to function, for the most part, within the affective and cognitive norm, supported by and supportive of a community that could foster these goals. This common definition of health will allow better exploration of the paths of religion and psychotherapeutic practice, regardless of psychological sophistication or religious beliefs.

2. Historical Perspective

In the late 1800s there was little divergence in the paths of religion and psychotherapy. The period was replete with schools of thought that outlined methods generally considered to be faith healing or mind cures. These approaches had strong support from some of the most influential writers of the time, such as Alcott, Emerson, and Thoreau. Overwhelmingly positive in their beliefs about an individual's potential for rekindling the divine spark believed by some to be inherent in all of us, one can well imagine their appeal when contrasted to the methods and practices common to the nascent psychiatric science of the time. These approaches held that illness, whether mental or physical, was the direct result of one being out of sync with some universal law. In contrast, the faith healing interventions, whether called down by external sources or fostered through self-help, merely required the realignment of one's beliefs and actions to be more attuned with the ultimate reality and truth. The writings of William James, the Mental Hygiene movement, and the resurgence of interest in the use of the group as an optimal setting for the healing of the individual all were well in line with religious beliefs of the day. However, this openly parallel course did not last.

By the early century, psychoanalytic and behavioral theories of the time seemed to suggest that humans were either unsuspecting victims of various drive states or unformed blocks to be molded by external cues or forces. Humans had lost their status as the pinnacle of creation. In retrospect, it is interesting to note that this portrait of human beings as rather hapless characters, lacking control over some of their most basic qualities, was not so different from some of Fundamentalism's tenets about the inherent evilness of humankind in the absence of God's grace.

Convergence began again toward the middle of the twentieth century. In response to the effects of the Second World War and the coming of the nuclear age, Western thinkers, both religious and psychotherapeutic, again began to re-evaluate the nature of humankind, its inherent qualities, and its potential for change. Important to both was a movement toward a more positive view of human nature with less of the pessimism that had marked some of psychotherapy's models in recent history. The existential shift that had affected so much of the Western world was incorporated into current thought. The nationalism that underlay much of the global conflict gave way to greater acceptance of 'that which is different' as being something other than 'that which is worse.' Prevalent again was the idea that humans were capable of virtuous acts, but this time the element of choice was worked strongly into the equation. And, while a number of religious leaders appeared to have understood that religion and psychotherapy were moving toward another confluence, many of today's psychotherapists question whether religion and psychotherapy can be reconciled. It is on this discrepancy that we now focus.

3. Current Perspective

The tradition of professional detachment regarding the spiritual beliefs of patients is reflected in current survey data indicating a profound disconnection between the religious beliefs and desires of the general population and mental health providers. For example, while 72 percent of the population view religion as an important influence on their lives, only 33 percent of psychologists respond similarly. In academic settings, psychologists are twice as likely as physicians to report that they have no religious preference (Shafranske 1996). Clinically, the issue of client religious beliefs typically is ignored or may be viewed as pathological. In contrast, survey data consistently reveal that religious beliefs are important to the general population, those presumably treated by mental health practitioners. Over 86 percent claim that they believe in God and 70 percent believe in a God who answers prayer (Barna 1992). Importantly, over half of responders state that they would prefer religious to secular mental healthcare regarding certain issues, especially marital and family problems (Privette et al. 1994).

There is reason to believe, however, that mainstream professional indifference to religious beliefs in psychotherapy has been overestimated. While mental health providers are less likely to report that religious beliefs are a major influence on their lives, 77 percent of them do claim to try to live their lives according to religious beliefs, which closely mirrors the general population (Bergin and Jensen 1990, p. 5). According to Miller and Thoreson, there is a growing recognition in the mental health field that religious beliefs in clients are correlated with longer life, and lower incidence of suicide, divorce, and alcohol abuse (Miller 1999). When the impact of religious beliefs is measured upon 'hard' variables, meaning those that are observable and easily measured such as longevity, the correlation almost always indicates a protective effect of such beliefs. When the impact of religious variables is measured upon 'soft' variables, those that are not observable and easily measured such as rigidity, the results are mixed. Several researchers have noted that the anti-religious bias of mental health providers may lead to a lack of attention to the obvious benefits conferred by religious beliefs in important domains of human functioning, while overemphasizing the negative effects of religious beliefs in intrapsychic domains (Bergin et al. 1996).

Mental health providers clearly are moving toward a more egalitarian approach to the spiritual and religious beliefs of their clients, with momentum. For example, in 1992 the American Psychological Association included religious beliefs among the spectrum of diversity which is to be protected by psychologists, who are expressly forbidden to discriminate or tolerate discrimination on the basis of religious beliefs (Bergin et al. 1996). Additionally, a suggestion to add a new code to the DSM diagnostic formulation to indicate psychoreligious or psychospiritual problems (Lukoff et al. 1992) has been accepted. Perhaps more importantly, psychologists and other mental health providers are beginning to examine empirically the impact of religious beliefs upon the process of psychotherapy. Initial findings indicate that integrating religious beliefs into psychological treatments may offer superior results for anxiety (Propst et al. 1992) and depression (Razali et al. 1998) in controlled studies with random assignment, for clients with religious beliefs. The impact of incorporating a spiritual dimension to psychotherapy is perhaps nowhere more visible than in the treatment of addictions. The long tradition of incorporating spiritual renewal found in the 12-step approach has received empirical support in a growing number of correlational studies (Miller 1999) and rigorous research studies (Project MATCH 1997), regardless of client's pre-existing religious beliefs.

Another factor that may be influencing psychology's consideration of religious beliefs and practices is the large number of assessment instruments, with psychometric validation, currently available for the measurement of a wide variety of religious and spiritual constructs (see Hill et al. 1999). Many of these are relatively brief, but provide useful information on such topics as coherence, purpose in life, and spiritual well-being. The work of Pargament and Brant (1998) has addressed systematically an individual's coping strategies, their roots in either religious or spiritual beliefs, and where they are related to negative or positive health outcomes.

It appears, therefore, that the roads have once again begun to converge and that more practitioners of psychotherapy are recognizing the potential importance of assessing religious beliefs and incorporating them into practice. This is a marked change from the belief that client's spiritual beliefs are pathological, irrelevant, or damaging to the therapeutic process (Shafranske 1996).

4. Future Directions

Ultimately, however, if the relationship between religion and psychotherapy is to continue to grow, there are several areas that will continue to challenge us. First, it is no longer the case that the vast majority of persons in industrialized Western countries are descendent from Anglo-European lineage. By the middle of this new century it is estimated that Whites will be a racial minority in the United States. Subsequently, both psychology and religion will have to incorporate this divergence. This will mean that the concepts of health and spiritual well-being probably will come to include philosophies prominent in Asian and African cultures and religions. These cultures have often looked at the inherent value of a single human being, the role of suffering, and the connection with the environment in a manner not typical of current psychological and Judeo-Christian tenets. Second, the role of women has changed radically since the early days of both Judeo-Christian religions and psychotherapy. In this case, feminist voices from both disciplines are likely to continue to express conflict with the goals of therapeutic intervention and mechanisms of change. Last, as scientific understanding of the working of the human brain and nervous system continues to progress, it will be important for both psychotherapy and religion to remain flexible enough to incorporate this new knowledge.

See also: Clinical Psychology in Europe, History of; Counseling and Psychotherapy: Ethnic and Cultural Differences; Psychotherapy: Ethical Issues; Psychotherapy, History of: Psychiatric Aspects; Psychotherapy Integration; Religion and Health; Religion: Psychiatric Aspects; Religion, Psychology of; Religiosity: Modern; Religiosity, Sociology of

Bibliography

- Armstrong R 1989 The psychology of inner and outer space. Pastoral Psychology 37: 161-4
- Barna G 1992 What Americans Believe: An Annual Survey of Values and Religious Views in the United States. Regal Books, Ventura, CA
- Bergin A E, Jensen J P 1990 Religiosity of psychotherapists: A national survey. Psychotherapy 27(1): 3-7
- Bergin A E, Payne I R, Richards P S 1996 Values in psychotherapy. In: Shafranske E (ed.) Religion and the Clinical Practice of Psychology. American Psychological Association, Washington, DC
- Buckley P 1981 Mystical experience and schizophrenia. Schizophrenia Bulletin 7: 516-21
- Hill P, Butman R, Hood R 1999 Measures of Religiosity. Religious Education Press, Birmingham, AL

- Hunt H 1985 Relations between the phenomena of religious mysticism (altered states of consciousness) and the psychology of thought: A cognitive psychology of states of consciousness and the necessity of subjective states for cognitive theory. Perceptual and Motor Skills 61: 911–61
- Lukoff D, Lu F, Turner R 1992 Toward a more culturally sensitive DSM-IV. Psychoreligious and psychospiritual problems. Journal of Nervous and Mental Disease 180(11): 673–82
- Miller W R (ed.) 1999 Integrating Spirituality into Treatment: Resources for Practitioners. American Psychological Association, Washington, DC, pp. 3–18
- Pargament K I, Brant C R 1998 Religion and coping. In: Koenig H G (ed.) Handbook of Religion and Mental Health. Academic Press, San Diego, CA, pp. 112–28
- Privette G, Quackenbos S, Bundrick C M 1994 Preferences for religious or non-religious counseling and psychotherapy. Psychological Reports 1(2): 539–40
- Project MATCH Research Group 1997 Project MATCH secondary a priori hypotheses. Addiction 92(12): 1671–98
- Propst R L, Ostrom R, Watkins P, Dean T, Mashburn D 1992 Comparative efficacy of religious and nonreligious cognitive-behavioral therapy for the treatment of clinical depression in religious individuals. Journal of Clinical and Consulting Psychology 60: 94–103
- Razali S M, Hasanah C I, Aminah K, Subramaniam M 1998 Religious-sociocultural psychotherapy in patients with anxiety and depression. Australia and New Zealand Journal of Psychiatry 32(6): 867–72
- Shafranske E P 1996 Religious beliefs, affiliations and practices of clinical psychologists. In: Shafranske E (ed.) Religion and the Clinical Practice of Psychology. American Psychological Association, Washington, DC, p. 52

V. A. Waldorf and T. B. Moyers

Psychotherapy, Brief Psychodynamic

Brief psychodynamic psychotherapy (BPP) describes a 'family' of psychotherapeutic interventions that share in common a short-term adaptation of psychoanalytically inspired psychotherapy. Other terms such as time-limited dynamic psychotherapy and short-term dynamic psychotherapy have also been used to describe this approach to treatment (Crits-Christoph and Barber 1991, Messer and Warren 1995).

The number of psychotherapies classified as brief psychodynamic has increased remarkably in recent years. As these numbers continue to grow, the clarity of features that constitute a psychotherapeutic system as brief dynamic becomes blurred. In an effort to provide a prototypical definition of BPP, we have gathered criteria from various authors, including those presented by Crits-Christoph et al. (1991), as follows.

(a) The theory of psychopathology explaining the cause and maintenance of a psychological disorder has a psychoanalytical basis (and thereby makes use of concepts related to such theories as Freudian, neo-Freudian, interpersonal, object relations, and self-psychology). Among the most important constructs one should include unconscious motivations, the formative role of early years on character formation, the tendency to repeat early behavior, the pervasiveness of transference, the importance of anxiety as a signal of underlying conflict, and the role of defenses.

(b) The main treatment techniques employed by the psychotherapist are those described in the psychoanalytic literature such as making clarifications, interpretations, and confrontations and noting transference and countertransference. Despite sharing these techniques, most authors do not consider BPP a brief or condensed form of analysis but rather a distinct treatment of its own. In general, the use of advice and homework, often practiced in behavioral and cognitive psychotherapies, is not recommended.

(c) The length of treatment is planned, often predetermined, and always time-limited. It usually lasts from 12 to 40 sessions depending on the patient's problems.

(d) Because of its brevity, patients are selected for BPP. Patients have to be screened to ensure that they meet at least some of the requirements for this form of treatment. In the literature, the following requirements have often been mentioned: psychological mindedness, recognition that present problems are in part of a psychological nature, willingness to change, existence in the present or past of at least one good quality interpersonal relationship, the ability to circumscribe present complaints to one symptom, the capacity to interact flexibly with the interviewer, and adequate ego strength (including the ability to tolerate frustration and ambivalence, adequate reality testing, and the use of neurotic but not psychotic defenses).

(e) In order to maintain brevity, a focus for treatment is implemented, and issues not related to the focal point or central conflict are often considered as having secondary priority. In general, the focus of treatment is developed collaboratively either before therapy starts or immediately following the initiation of therapy. The therapist actively works to maintain the treatment focus on the agreed upon core issue.

(f) BPP is intended to alleviate specific symptoms and provide limited personality or character change. This is in contrast to psychoanalysis and long-term dynamic therapy where the goal is typically pervasive character change.

Because most brief dynamic psychotherapies do not fulfill all of the aforementioned requirements, these criteria cannot be considered necessary. However, the criteria can and should be viewed as a prototypic definition whereby the more criteria a therapy meets, the more likely it will be designated as brief psychodynamic psychotherapy.

1. Historical Background

Modern psychotherapy can be traced to Sigmund Freud's work that began in the late nineteenth century.

During that time, Freud developed a way to investigate the mind that ultimately evolved into a psychological intervention known as psychoanalysis. In psychoanalysis, the analyst attempts to bring repressed unconscious conflicts to the patient's awareness. In other words, by providing patients an understanding ('insight') of the unconscious aspects of their problems, patients have the opportunity to work them through and subsequently master these difficulties. Although Freud originally worked with patients for a small number of sessions, psychoanalytic treatment became increasingly longer over the years. Gradually, psychodynamically oriented psychotherapy, also referred to as psychoanalytically inspired psychotherapy, emerged from the modified use of psychoanalytic principles and therapeutic techniques.

Similar to psychoanalysts, long-term psychodynamic psychotherapists tend to be quiet, waiting for patients to free associate and observing how the patient-therapist relationship (or transference) develops, rather than actively pursuing psychologically meaningful material and addressing transferential material early in the treatment. Despite this similarity, however, psychodynamically oriented psychotherapy differs from traditional psychoanalysis in significant ways. For example, in contrast to psychoanalysts who see patients on the couch four to five times a week, long-term dynamic psychotherapists generally see patients face to face once or twice a week. Nevertheless, consistent with psychoanalysis, psychoanalytically inspired psychotherapy has tended to be a long-term therapy.

In addition to the long-term approach to dynamic therapy, there has also been a small group of therapists who have attempted to keep psychoanalytically inspired psychotherapy brief and concise. These clinicians continued the work originated by Ferenczi (1950), Rank (1936), and Alexander and French (1946), who recommended the maintenance of an active stance in therapy to hasten the exploration of unconscious material. In spite of their efforts, however, most psychodynamic clinicians continued to view brief dynamic therapy as inferior to the lengthier psychoanalytic treatment. It was not until Malan (1976) Mann (1973), Sifneos (1979), and Davanloo (1980) that brief psychodynamic psychotherapy was deemed a valuable treatment option. Malan's emphasis on the importance of careful patient selection through the screening of inappropriate referrals and through trial interpretations attuned therapists to the fact that BPP can be effective for a subset of the patient population. Malan and Sifneos were also among the first to stress the significance of defining and maintaining a therapeutic focus and the relevance of such focus for being an appropriate candidate for BPP. Malan explicitly illustrated some of the cornerstones of psychodynamic treatment through the descriptions of two triangles. The first triangle is the 'triangle of conflict.' Its apexes correspond to the labels 'defense,'

'anxiety,' and 'underlying feeling or impulse.' The second triangle is the 'triangle of person' and has the labels of 'relationships with current figures,' 'relationship with the therapist (representing transference),' and 'relationships with important figures from the past' (e.g., parents) for its apexes. According to Malan, the therapist's task is to expose the underlying feelings and impulses that the patient has been protecting via defense mechanisms and to elucidate the role of the defenses in reducing the anxiety that the feelings create. He posited that the patient's hidden feelings were originally experienced in relation to the parental figures at some time in the past and since then have frequently recurred with other significant figures in the patient's life including the therapist. During therapy, the patient must understand the hidden impulses underlying each of the relationships described in the triangle of person. Typically, insight into a current relationship (either with a significant other or the therapist) is achieved first and is then related back to the parental figures. Today, the writings of Malan (1976), Mann (1973), Sifneos (1979), and Davanloo (1980) are considered the four 'traditional' approaches to brief dynamic therapy (Crits-Christoph et al. 1991). Their work was the initial driving force for the development of modern BPP and fueled the debate that brief therapy can be as successful as longer-term therapies.

In the last 20 years, a new generation of brief dynamic therapists appeared on the clinical scene. Among the most important are Luborsky (1984), Horowitz et al. (1984), Strupp and Binder (1984), and Weiss et al. (1986). This new group of brief dynamic therapists can be distinguished from previous generations by their interest in the empirical status of their treatment approaches. Perhaps resulting from their interest in research, this new generation has written intricately detailed descriptions of their clinical approaches that are very helpful for training and monitoring clinicians in the adequate use of their techniques. In fact, many of these books are considered treatment manuals and have been used in empirical research addressing the efficacy of these therapeutic methods.

2. Efficacy of BPP

During the 1980s, researchers began to explore the efficacy of BPP relative to that of other psychotherapies. Representing the trend toward methodological rigor that has prevailed throughout the 1980s and 1990s, manualized BPPs have slowly been incorporated into research studies to provide the standardization of treatment that is needed for the studies to be credible (see Psychological Treatment, Effectiveness of). Despite this methodological improvement, very few high quality studies have been conducted to examine the efficacy of BPP.

Anderson and Lambert (1995) published a comprehensive meta-analysis of 26 BPP efficacy studies that indicated that although BPP is more effective than minimal or no treatment, it is neither superior nor inferior to other forms of therapy. In spite of the fact that these data indicate that BPP is an effective treatment, it is not often recognized as such. One possible reason for the lack of recognition is the small number of studies that have examined the efficacy of BPP for specific disorders. For example, only one study has examined the efficacy of BPP for depression (Gallagher and Thompson 1982) and that study only included elderly depressed patients in its subject pool. Hence it is hardly surprising that many therapists do not find the data supporting the efficacy of BPP sufficiently convincing.

In addition to the interest in examining the efficacy of brief dynamic therapy, researchers and clinicians have consistently been curious about the processes of change underlying BPP. Strong findings in the literature on process research indicate that both non-specific therapeutic factors, such as a positive therapeutic alliance, and specific therapeutic factors, such as accurate interpretations of the patient's core interpersonal conflicts, are associated with good therapeutic outcome.

3. The Future of BPP

During the last two decades, the popularity of BPP has grown. This shift can be attributed to the increased financial pressure from managed health care to shorten the average number of sessions in a treatment program, the patients' wish to receive help only for their specific complaints rather than for changing their personality, and the patients' wish to save money.

There is little reason to believe that the multiple causes influencing the trend in the late 1990s toward increased implementation of brief treatments including BPP will subside any time in the early part of the twenty-first century. Rather, it seems that efficiency and empirically demonstrated efficacy define future ideals. Consequently, it is likely that therapists will see an even larger increase in the use of brief therapy. In order to ensure that BPP will be one of the modalities recommended by the various governmental, insurance, and professional entities that are 'certifying' treatment modalities, there is an need for evidence of its efficacy for specific psychiatric disorders.

Without a doubt, ensuring that the quality of psychotherapy remains high is a major objective of all psychotherapists; however, other factors must also be considered with regard to the future status of brief dynamic psychotherapy. First, a large proportion of the training of psychiatrists and psychologists remains in the realm of long-term psychotherapy, although the trend toward training psychotherapists for short-term interventions might be occurring. Nevertheless, increased training of clinicians in the domain of brief therapy is required for patients to receive maximum benefit from this form of treatment. Also, psychotherapists should strive to implement the BPPs designed for specific diagnostic patient populations in their treatment of these patients. This task may prove to be especially difficult since the descriptions of symptoms and syndromes of particular disorders according to psychodynamic theory do not always correspond to those listed in the most recent version of the American Psychiatric Association's Diagnostic and Statistical Manual (DSM) of Mental Disorders.

Modern psychotherapy, including BPP, is becoming increasingly more integrative and eclectic in its treatment approach (see Eclectic Psychotherapy: Psychological Perspectives). As a result of this greater eclecticism, examining the efficacy of the actual treatments used in clinical settings and defining a given treatment delivered by a specific clinician as BPP are becoming perpetually more difficult tasks. Psychotherapy, including BPP, must constantly evolve to fit with the fast paced nature and current trends of the modern world. Thus, maybe future practice of BPP will include more components from other psychotherapies.

See also: Eclectic Psychotherapy: Psychological Perspectives; Psychoanalysis: Current Status; Psychoanalysis in Clinical Psychology; Psychoanalysis: Overview; Psychological Treatment, Effectiveness of; Transference in Psychoanalysis

Bibliography

- Alexander F, French T M 1946 Psychoanalytic Therapy. Ronald Press, New York
- Anderson E M, Lambert M J 1995 Short-term dynamically oriented psychotherapies: a review and meta-analysis. Clinical Psychology Review 15: 503–14
- Crits-Christoph P, Barber J P (eds.) 1991 Handbook of Short-term Dynamic Psychotherapies. Basic Books, New York
- Crits-Christoph P, Barber J P, Kurcias J S 1991 Historical background of short-term dynamic therapy. In: Crits-Christoph P, Barber J P (eds.) Handbook of Short-term Dynamic Psychotherapy. Basic Books, New York pp. 1–16
- Davanloo H (ed.) 1980 Short-term Dynamic Psychotherapy. Jason Aronson, New York
- Ferenczi S 1950 The further development of an active therapy in psychoanalysis. In: Ferenczi S, Suttie J I (trans.) Further Contributions to the Theory and Technique of Psychoanalysis 2nd edn. Hogarth Press, London, pp. 198–217 (original work published 1926)
- Gallagher D E, Thompson L W 1982 Treatment of major depressive disorder in older adult outpatients with brief psychotherapies. Psychotherapy: Theory, Research and Practice. 19: 482–90
- Horowitz M, Marmar C, Krupnick J, Kaltreider N, Wallerstein R, Wilner N 1984 Personality Styles and Brief Psychotherapy. Basic Books, New York

- Luborsky L 1984 Principles of Psychoanalytic Psychotherapy: a Manual for Supportive-Expressive (SE) Treatment. Basic Books, New York
- Malan D H 1976 The Frontier of Brief Psychotherapy. Plenum, New York
- Mann J 1973 Time-limited Psychotherapy. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Messer S B, Warren C S 1995 Models of Brief Psychodynamic Therapy: a Comparative Approach. Guilford Press, New York
- Rank O 1936 Will Therapy. Knopf, New York
- Sifneos P 1979 Short-term Dynamic Psychotherapy: Evaluation and Technique. Plenum Medical Book Co., New York
- Strupp H S, Binder J L 1984 Psychotherapy in a New Key: a Guide to Time-limited Dynamic Psychotherapy. Basic Books, New York
- Weiss J, Sampson H, Mount Zion Psychotherapy Research Group 1986 The Psychoanalytic Process: Theory, Clinical Observation and Empirical Research. Guilford Press, New York

J. P. Barber and R. Stratt

Psychotherapy: Case Study

'Case study' typically refers to the investigation of the onset and course of a disorder on the basis of personal reports. Frequently used synonyms are case study methodology, case study research, case report, and case description. The acronym ' $N = 1$ ' also pertains to case studies. Case study terminology is applied in an array of very different methodological approaches, ranging from nonstructured explorations to experimental testing of single-case hypotheses.

Description, documentation, and evaluation of a particular therapy are elements of 'controlled practice' (Petermann and Müller 2001), which in turn is based on patient-centered assessments made throughout the duration of therapy and on a well-organized documentation system. This approach allows for continuing control and optimization of the treatment process.

1. Example of a Case Study Within 'Controlled Practice'

At the outset of therapy the psychotherapist questions the patient in such areas as biography, current life situation, known problems, former experiences with psychotherapy, and the demand for therapy. The therapist documents answers by recording audiotapes and taking notes. A structured clinical interview for the purpose of classifying the disorder forms the foundation of the diagnosis. The client's current problems and therapeutic aims are organized in what is called a functional analysis. The therapist devises a written plan for the therapy detailing, for example, time frame and partial goals. The patient and therapist then sign a contract outlining rules and guidelines to remain in effect throughout the therapy. Prior to the actual onset of therapy, psychotherapist and patient negotiate the benchmarks and indicators for a successful outcome, for instance, how frequently undesirable behaviors may occur on a daily basis. Throughout the course of therapy the patient is asked regularly to fill in a brief questionnaire on major outcome variables. Direct observation by the therapist accompanies the written information. Finally, all collected documents, including the final interview, are summarized, discussed, and reviewed in cooperation with the patient. The psychotherapist's appraisal of the intervention and its outcome is based on comparisons of several case studies, thus allowing for continuous improvement in clinical decision making.

2. Single-case: Different Methodological Approaches

Yin (1994) distinguishes between descriptive, exploratory, and explanatory case studies. Typically, in case studies questions concerning the 'why' and 'how' dominate over questions that address the 'what,' 'who,' and 'where.'

2.1 Descriptive Case Studies

Descriptive case studies contain descriptions of individual cases but dispense with interpretation. Indications for psychotherapy, the course of therapy, and its outcomes are summarized in descriptive case studies in a verbal format—case reports—which have important documentation and communication functions for therapists. The lucidity of descriptive case studies, in contrast to abstract theory, makes them particularly useful in psychotherapy education. A variant of the descriptive case study yields a detailed description of the therapeutic process. Documentation of crucial outcome parameters is a necessary condition for process monitoring and has practical implications for optimization of therapy. If documentation is kept in the foreground of therapy reporting, treatment integrity can be better controlled. 'Treatment integrity' refers to the degree to which actual therapeutic work is concordant with the therapeutic method chosen (e.g., psychoanalysis, behavioral therapy). The more precisely the method of treatment can be defined, for example as a manual (see Clinical Psychology: Manual-based Treatment), the more exactly the degree of concordance can be assessed.

2.2 Explanatory Case Studies

Explanatory case studies attempt to explain observable therapy-induced changes in behavior. Critical life events in the patient's biography and experimentally varied factors may serve as explanations. In general, planned (prospective) case studies must be distinguished from unplanned (mostly retrospective) case studies. Planned case studies require a clear design, standardized and replicable data collection, and statistical methods of analysis. These studies are time-consuming and labor-intensive and consequently are not used very often. This type of process research addresses the decisive procedural mechanisms in effect during psychotherapy (see Psychotherapy Process Research). Experimental designs are strictly controlled types of prospective analysis allowing for comparisons between suggested causes in a systematic manner (see Single-case Experimental Designs in Clinical Settings).

2.3 Exploratory Case Studies

Exploratory case studies are used to receive one's first impression and to generate hypotheses. Data are collected in interviews or from biographical material. Hypotheses are derived from data of the individual by developing a model of the causal and sustaining factors pertinent to a particular individual's behavior ('functional behavior analysis,' see Behavior Analysis, Applied). Functional analyzes may be classified as exploratory or explanatory case studies. They contain descriptions of the patient's problem(s) and statements concerning factors that trigger and maintain problem behavior(s).

3. History of the Single-case Methodology

In the early days of modern psychology, when Edward Bradford Titchener, William James, and Wilhelm Wundt rose to prominence, single-case analysis was a well-respected research strategy. Not uncommonly the researchers chose themselves as the subjects for investigation. Introspection and single-case experiments largely dominated psychological research in those pioneering times. The German philosopher Karl Jaspers introduced a special form of case study, called Biografik (biographic), which focused primarily on the course of individuals' lives. With the introduction of what were considered more objective data sources and analytical methods, introspection and single-case experiments—and, as a consequence, the single-case approach—were sidelined and eventually replaced. The reasons were many (Danzinger 1990). Psychology as a new field of research had to gain ground and hold out against well-established traditional disciplines such as medicine, physics, and biology. The decision to adopt an experimental methodology was made in the hope of enhancing the reputation of psychological research. The questionnaire as an economic data collection tool was also making inroads into psychology. This methodology, adopted from the social sciences, allowed for the collection and analysis of large, standardized samples. Experiments could now be carried out involving substantial numbers of people.

The case study underwent a renaissance in the 1960s and 1970s. Awareness had arisen in psychotherapy research that certain questions could no longer be answered properly using group-based studies. Zubin (1950) had blamed the dire situation in clinical research on the lack of appropriate statistical tools for single cases, and called for the individual to be viewed as a distinctive universe. Kiesler (1966) complained about the absence of adequate research strategies in clinical psychology. He also challenged certain myths, including the 'patient uniformity assumption' (i.e., at the outset of therapy patients tend to be similar rather than different from one another) and the 'therapy uniformity assumption' (i.e., therapists treat individuals uniformly rather than variably).

New methods for the collection and analysis of data were developed in the 1960s. Goal-attainment scaling (Kiresuk and Sherman 1968), for example, opened up the possibility of collecting data that reflected individually defined outcomes. Innovations in statistics (e.g., Markoff chains and ARIMA models) now allowed for the analysis of data sampled from repeated measurements. Once again the case study was on its way to reclaim its reputation as a scientifically sound and respected methodology.

4. Single-case and Psychotherapy Research

Eysenck's (1952) provocative conclusion linking positive outcomes in the treatment of neurosis to spontaneous remissions sparked fervent clinical research seeking to prove the effectiveness of different treatments. The 'Dodo Verdict' (so called from the Dodo in Alice in Wonderland), according to which all therapies are equally successful, concluded the first phase of psychotherapy research. This view came under scrutiny during the second phase, when more differentiated analyzes were employed and differences in the indications for psychotherapy could be found for certain disorders. At the end of the second phase, knowledge of the actual mechanisms at work during different psychological therapies was still poor, a fact that eventually led to the third phase of clinical research, known as microanalysis. In microanalysis the interaction between therapist and patient became the primary focus. In an analogy to the use of a microscope, crucial moments during the therapy sessions were scanned with 'high methodological resolution' in order to uncover the crucial therapeutic mechanisms at work.

Gradually clinical practice research moved from a primary focus on outcomes to the model of process research. With each increase in the 'microscopic' resolution of details, single-case methodology gained in significance. Yet despite the fact that the theoretical rationale behind single-case study methodology was widely accepted in the 1980s, its impact on clinical practice remained limited. Not surprisingly, experts concluded: 'At present, clinical research has little or no influence on clinical practice' (Barlow 1981, p. 147).

5. Criticism of Single-case Methodology

Single-case methodology has always drawn criticism from different quarters. Some investigators felt that the presentation of qualitative case studies was too arbitrary; others have remained skeptical of the methodology in its entirety. Several problem areas with regard to case study research must be addressed:

- (a) objectivity in the collection of data,
- (b) degree of rigor in attempts to prove cause and effect, and
- (c) interpretation and generalizability of outcomes.

Case studies in clinical research usually deal with personal experiences (e.g., quality of life, well-being), which can be evaluated solely by means of self-reports. However, assessment of self-reported experience is problematic since any subjective report automatically compromises an assessment's validity. On the other hand, standardized measures are of limited use when tapping into a patient's subjective appraisals. This problem of control in clinical practice remains unresolved.

The validity of causality statements depends primarily on the degree to which contextual factors in data collection remain constant. Causal relationships are determined by testing hypotheses while excluding factors that may serve as alternative explanations. It is a classical problem of empirical research, however, that alternative influences can never be ruled out entirely in data analysis. While controlling for several potentially confounding variables increases internal validity on the one hand, it limits the generalizability of findings on the other. This problem is reflected in research terminology: the term 'proof' is avoided, while 'evidence' or 'tendency' are preferred, thus allowing for case-specific statements about a treatment's effectiveness while avoiding statements of more general applicability.

Given these factors, the following prerequisites must be met in order to appraise the quality of a case study:

- (a) Only validated or previously tested assessment tools should be employed,
- (b) The decision to use prospective vs. retrospective data collection must be explained, and
- (c) It must be decided to what extent contextual factors need to be controlled.

The accuracy of statements will increase with the precision and replicability of the data analysis as well as with the amount of detail provided on factors that may compromise findings.

6. Integrating Case Study and Evidence-based Clinical Practice

Legal and economic considerations increasingly require therapists to provide documentation of their interventions. Scientific evaluation is increasingly less limited to demonstrating the efficacy of certain therapeutic strategies and now must also show the effectiveness of the process of clinical practice as a whole.

The optimization of therapy serves both economic and humanitarian goals, as it is of utilitarian value for both patients and society in its entirety. In future the case study approach will form an integral part of what is known as 'evidence-based practice.' Particular difficulties include the problem of objectivity with regard to data collection and analysis, pressure on therapists to organize their interventions, and the integration of results with daily clinical practice. These demands on clinical practice control (see Managed Care and Psychotherapy in the United States) can only be met if data are analyzed in an exact and economical fashion. Recent software innovations may accelerate this trend.

See also: Single-case Experimental Designs in Clinical Settings

Bibliography

- Barlow D H 1981 On the relation of clinical research to clinical practice. Current issues, new directions. Journal of Consulting and Clinical Psychology 43: 147–55
- Danzinger K 1990 Constructing the Subject. Historical Origins of Psychological Research. Cambridge University Press, New York
- Eysenck H J 1952 The effects of psychotherapy: An evaluation. Journal of Consulting Psychology 16: 319–24
- Kiesler D J 1966 Some myths of psychotherapy research and the search for a paradigm. Psychological Bulletin 65: 110–36
- Kiresuk T J, Sherman R E 1968 Goal attainment scaling. A general method for evaluating comprehensive community mental health programs. Community Mental Health Journal 4: 443–53
- Petermann F, Müller J M 2001 Clinical Psychology and Single Case Evidence. A Practical Approach to Treatment Planning and Evaluation. Wiley, Chichester, UK
- Yin R K 1994 Case Study Research. Design and Methods. Sage Publications, Thousand Oaks, California
- Zubin J 1950 Symposium on statistics for the clinician. Journal of Clinical Psychology 6: 1–6

F. Petermann and J. M. Müller

Copyright © 2001 Elsevier Science Ltd. 12475
All rights reserved.

Psychotherapy: Clinical Practice Guidelines

Since 1994, the process of delivering health and behavioral healthcare has been dramatically reshaped by the 'managed care revolution' (Strosahl 1994, 1995, see also Managed Care and Psychotherapy in the United States; Managed Care). Concerned by steadily escalating health care costs in the absence of convincing cost effectiveness data, both federal policy makers and the purchasers of health care have developed a variety of methods for containing health care costs. Most of these strategies (i.e., utilization review, precertification, case rates, capitation based financing) have focused on shifting the financial risk to vendors and providers, with the effect of restricting the services that are offered to consumers (Strosahl 1994). At the same time, health care reform has evolved from an overemphasis on supply side strategies (i.e., restricting access to services) to a cost and quality-oriented movement. This has stimulated a wide variety of system-level strategies for improving the quality of care while either reducing costs or holding them steady. Clinical practice guidelines evolved as one such strategy for quality improvement (Noonan et al. 1998). This article will examine the genesis of the practice guideline movement and different types of guidelines, discuss current parameters for evaluating the quality of guidelines, illustrate some of the major shortcomings of contemporary guidelines, and evaluate the empirical literature concerning the dissemination and impact of clinical guidelines.

1. The History and Context of Practice Guidelines

The most commonly accepted definition of a practice guideline is 'systematically developed statements to assist practitioners and patients make decisions about appropriate health care for specific clinical circumstances,' (Noonan et al. 1998). In this sense, practice guidelines have been developed and implemented informally at the agency and clinic level for years. Names such as treatment algorithms, clinical protocols, and practice standards have been used to describe such efforts. In contrast to contemporary practice guidelines, these early efforts were highly localized, often relied on clinical lore or the influence of a few key opinion leaders, did not systematically incorporate scientific evidence about the efficacy of clinical interventions, and addressed only the most controversial/problematic aspects of treating a patient with a particular condition. For example, many agencies and clinics have guidelines for assessing an acutely suicidal patient during the index crisis, primarily for the purpose of managing risk. At the same time, few guidelines have ever been developed for treating suicidal behavior when it is not of crisis proportions, even though the bulk of outpatient treatment occurs with less acutely suicidal patients. Due to their parochial nature, early practice guidelines—some developed only miles apart and for the same clinical condition—differed markedly in their emphasis and clinical recommendations.

The resurgence of interest in practice guideline stems from the growing influence of outcomes-based medicine and the associated philosophies of population and evidence-based care (Noonan et al. 1998, Strosahl 1994). Based on a public health model, population-based care is concerned with the health status of the entire population, not just those patients with current psychological disorders. The goal is to build consistent processes of care that reduce variation in clinical outcomes for the population served, thereby increasing the cost effectiveness of the overall system of care. A major area of concern with both medicine and behavioral health services is that systems of care vary wildly in the types of services available and the services rendered to treat a particular condition. The goal of population care is to narrow this variability across systems and providers, ensuring better access to, and quality of, care for consumers.

The related notion of evidence-based care is noteworthy because it suggests that the best outcomes across a population are achieved by the consistent use of interventions that have been shown to work in randomized clinical trials (see Psychological Treatments: Randomized Controlled Clinical Trials). Many clinical experts and the purchasers of health services argue that there is excessive variation among behavioral health providers in the types and amounts of treatment that are delivered for common psychological problems. In discussing the decision-making behavior of physicians, it has been suggested that only 25 percent of health services are objectively based upon the medical status of the patient. Primary nonmedical factors related to health services include availability of needed services, patient's beliefs and preferences and the physician-patient relationship. Most providers are ill-equipped to meet the diverse array of psychosocial and medical needs posed by their patients. This 'mismatch' between what the provider can offer and what the patient expects is a major source of cost overruns in both health and behavioral health.

2. Types of Guidelines

Broadly conceived, there are two types of practice guidelines. The system guideline is widely used (Noonan et al. 1998). It addresses the parameters of population-based care by specifying who is eligible to enter the system of care (i.e., medically necessary treatment), what setting of care is appropriate (i.e., inpatient, residential, partial hospital, out-patient) and the program to which a patient with a particular set of symptoms and functioning should be assigned (i.e., vocational rehabilitation, drugs and alcohol, dual diagnosis). Note that a system guideline functions to define who is eligible to receive services and what level of care is appropriate to address the patient's condition. It does not attempt to guide the decision making or practice patterns of providers within that level of care. However, system guidelines can and should be evidence based, evolving from the scientific literature concerning the type and intensity of treatment mostly likely to work for a patient with a given set of symptoms and specified functional status. System guidelines are currently the focus of a major developmental initiative by the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration of the United States Government. System guidelines can promote the goals of population-based care by specifying and 'minimum services menu' that is needed to properly address the diverse mental health needs of a population. System guidelines help identify gaps in programs or facilities that can then be brought to the attention of policy makers, funding agencies, and foundations. One of the chief criticisms of clinical practice guidelines by providers is that they recommend settings of care or types of programs that are not accessible. While system guidelines often receive less discussion, they are a critical component of a comprehensive population care system.

Clinical practice guidelines are a second and more widely discussed entity. Ideally, they weave scientific evidence into clinical practice (Clinton et al. 1994). There has been an unprecedented proliferation of clinical practice guidelines in the beginning of the twenty-first century. Some are discipline specific such as the series of practice guidelines published by the American Psychiatric Association (Herz et al. 1997). Others, such as the Agency for Health Care Policy Research Guideline for Treating Depression in Primary Care, focus on treatment recommendations for a particular care setting, such as primary care (Depression Guideline Panel 1993). Some guidelines, such as those published by the Academy of Adolescent and Child Psychiatry are cross-disciplinary and designed to be applied across settings (Bernstein et al. 1997). Managed behavioral health care companies have also developed proprietary guidelines as a mechanism for supporting utilization reviewers. Finally, there are a growing number of 'off the shelf' guideline packages that have been developed privately and marketed to the provider community. The promulgation of clinical practice guidelines is promising in that it testifies to the growing conviction among policy makers, administrators, and clinicians that using scientific evidence to guide clinical practice is the only way to assure consistent quality. However, there is growing concern that many existing practice guidelines are biased toward truncating care, promoting guild interests, or simply lacking scientific validity (Nathan 1998).

3. Functions of a Clinical Practice Guideline

Properly constructed, a practice guideline should provide easily accessed, scientifically and clinically sound decision support that can aid the provider and the consumer at key decision points in the assessment and treatment process (Practice Guideline Coalition 1997), including:

- (a) critical symptoms and/or functional attributes that make a patient eligible to be served under that guideline (i.e., diagnostic guidelines) and severity criteria that determine suitability for service setting (i.e., levels of care guidelines);
- (b) conditions and/or syndromes that have similar symptom patterns and methods for distinguishing these conditions (differential diagnostic guidelines);
- (c) relevant epidemiological and demographic information that helps providers identify different forms of clinical presentation related to geographic, racial, ethnic, or cultural factors;
- (d) clinical procedures shown to be effective with the condition, rates of remission when such procedures are properly administered, comparative effectiveness of different treatments, treatment side effects, and other known risks as well as the expected time frame for clinical/functional response;
- (e) commonly available and easily used self-report and/or interview methods for assessing clinical response, criteria for determining whether a procedure(s) is working and, if not, guidance in selecting an alternative procedure or treatment; and
- (f) relapse rates and maximum relapse risk periods, effective maintenance, and relapse prevention strategies.

Note that the concept of assisting the provider and consumer in selecting an appropriate intervention for a specific condition suggests that guidelines need to exist in a format that can support use by both the provider and consumer. In addition to the core clinical function of improving the quality and appropriateness of care to the individual consumer, the Institute of Medicine (Field and Lohr 1990) has identified other guideline functions, including:

- (a) decrease service costs produced by the provision of ineffective and/or unnecessary services,
- (b) assist consumers and their families in advocacy efforts,
- (c) assist payers in establishing rates and mechanisms for reimbursement,
- (d) encourage the collection of standardized data for the purpose of 'validating' a guideline, and
- (e) improve formal and post-graduate clinical training.

4. Methods for Constructing Practice Guidelines

As mentioned previously, early methods for constructing practice guidelines used either an informal or formal consensus method. Whereas informal consensus might involve a group of providers agreeing to a care protocol at a lunchtime meeting, formal consensus methods require a structured development and ratification process (Woolf 1992). In the Delphi method, guideline development representatives determine rules about collecting and analyzing opinions from experts and distilling results into a set of recommendations. In iterative fashion, experts provide their opinions, then respond to the opinions of other experts until a convergence of opinion is obtained. In the Nominal Process method, a facilitator systematically elicits opinions from each group participant about the most important recommendations on each participant's list. This process continues until all recommendations from all lists have been cataloged, at which point the recommendations are distilled into a composite list. Each participant then rates this list in terms of priority, areas of maximum agreement are identified, and the resulting 'consensus' is put back to the group for ratification. The primary advantage of consensus-based methods is that guidelines can be rapidly generated, often ahead of the existing science. Innovations in clinical practice that have not been scientifically tested are more likely to be incorporated. The major, and often fatal, drawbacks are that the quality of consensus guidelines are entirely tied to the professional skills, qualifications, and biases of the group, tend to omit controversial topics where clinicians need the most guidance, produce bland recommendations that provide no advancement in clinical practice, or institutionalize locally favored practices that in fact are scientifically unsound. One of the best-known consensus-based guideline projects is the Expert Consensus Consortium, which has used the Delphi method to develop a wide variety of practice guidelines that are available nationally.

The limitations in consensus models for building guidelines have created a corresponding interest in using more objective, data-based methods. In contrast to consensus models, empirically-based methods stress that the quality of a guideline is directly related to its scientific underpinnings. For many years, the US Preventive Services Task Force has used the evidence-based guideline method. This approach involves conducting a comprehensive review of all scientific studies and reports pertaining to the condition under consideration, rating the amount and quality of the evidence, and then producing graded recommendations based upon the strength of the underlying scientific evidence. A 'Grade A' recommendation is based upon a number of well-conducted studies that meet specific and rigorous methodological criteria (i.e., sample size, randomization, well-specified, replicable interventions). In contrast, a 'Grade C' recommendation would have only limited evidence to support it, but still be seen as clinically important. Strict adherence to evidence-based methods tends to produce many fewer recommendations that are based on 'expert opinion.' However, providers and consumers can be left with no guidance in very core areas because the science is not available, and this may limit the clinical usefulness of the resulting product. Another frequent criticism of evidence-based methods is that cutting-edge innovations in clinical practice are left out of guidelines because scientific validation of effective procedures may lag years behind the introduction of new procedures in a field.

Eddy (1996) proposed an Explicit Guideline Development method that involves conducting an analysis of condition base rates within a system of care, along with costs and outcomes associated with existing care processes. Using cost modeling data derived from a review of scientific data regarding alternative procedures, a balance sheet is created which outlines the projected clinical benefits, costs, and potential risks associated with implementing a guideline. Generally, this approach is designed to identify conditions that occur with a high enough frequency and/or associated cost to justify changes in a whole system of care. In essence, this method helps one determine whether a particular condition is appropriate for a clinical practice guideline. Normally, systems and agencies that employ the initial decision-making method will employ an evidence-based method for constructing the actual guideline.

5. Criticisms of Practice Guidelines

Considering that guidelines vary greatly in both structure and content, it is interesting that a consistent set of criticisms have been forthcoming from key stakeholders (Noonan et al. 1998, Practice Guideline Coalition 1997).

Consumers have expressed concerns that guidelines are used to artificially limit care, are developed with little or no consumer involvement, ignore, and/or minimize consumer preferences and limit consumer access to information critical to the treatment decision-making process.

Clinicians complain that guidelines are rigidly applied to limit services and reimbursement, are too complicated to be useful in daily practice, recommend procedures or services that the provider is not trained to administer, neglect the important role of clinical judgment, function to suppress innovative clinical practices, and promote guild or discipline specific interests.

Scientists claim many guidelines incorporate unsubstantiated expert opinion, improperly characterize or ignore the scientific literature, recommend cost-oriented interventions that produce short-term benefits only, and are not kept current with recent advances in science.

Managed health care executives complain that guidelines cost too much and take too long to develop, exceed the skill and training level of most providers, are too guild oriented, are not 'user friendly' in daily practice, and ignore the issue of cost effectiveness.

Concerns about the varying quality of practice guidelines have led to several efforts to identify criteria for judging the quality of a guideline. The American Psychological Association (1995) has developed standards for evaluating the validity of guidelines. Generally, these standards require that guidelines incorporate valid and reproducible scientific data, be written clearly, recommend procedures that have proven clinical effectiveness in the field, allow for flexible decision making, provide clear and precise recommendations, and be 'refreshed' regularly to keep up with changes in the scientific literature. In addition, the guideline development process should be multidisciplinary and well documented.

6. Impact of Practice Guidelines

At this point in time, there are few scientific studies concerning the impact of clinical practice guidelines for behavioral health conditions. Most reports are anecdotal and suggest that properly implemented, guidelines can alter the process of delivering care particularly if provider involvement is sought. Much less is known, even at the case report level, about the extent to which practice guidelines improve clinical outcomes.

Studies of practice guidelines for physicians have shown that dissemination of a guideline is not an end in itself. Training in use of the guideline is often required, as is the 'translation' of the guideline to fit local resource and practice realities. In addition, physicians may benefit from concurrent feedback and enforcement mechanisms. Even under the best of implementation circumstances, physicians may show enhanced awareness of the guideline, yet fail to modify their medical practices (Lomas et al. 1989). In essence, medical practice guidelines have not been consistently shown to alter the process of care, improve health outcomes, or improve consumer satisfaction (Grimshaw and Russell 1993). This may be due to variations in the quality of practice guidelines, differences in dissemination and training methods, or reflect the immediate financial incentives influencing physician behavior.

7. Future Developments

It is clear that the next generation of practice guidelines will need to be less cumbersome to use, less expensive and time consuming to develop, and reflect a consensus of all the key stakeholders as to what constitutes scientifically sound, feasible, cost-effective treatment. The Practice Guideline Coalition (PGC) represents one such effort to bring the key stakeholders together to form scientifically sound, user-friendly practice guidelines. The PGC is a coalition of approximately 80 scientific, clinical, managed care, and consumer groups, who have developed a common framework for the development, evaluation, and dissemination of practice guidelines. PGC guidelines have a very short development cycle, incorporate the views of scientists, clinicians, managed care representatives, and consumers, focus on core procedures that can be delivered by any qualified mental health provider and are designed for easy access in the context of daily practice (PGC 1997).

A second future theme will be the development of empirically validated methods for disseminating guidelines to the practitioner community. This very likely will involve the creation of training methods that are affordable and incorporate the results of early studies of guideline dissemination. The existing literature clearly suggests that it is one thing to put a guideline in front of a practitioner. It is quite another to have it impact the process or outcome of care. Dissemination and training represents perhaps the greatest challenge to the success of practice guidelines as a quality improvement tool.

Finally, there will be increasing pressure to scientifically validate practice guidelines in the field. The assumption underpinning interest in practice guidelines is that they will reduce unexplainable variations in the type of behavioral health care that is delivered, thus improving the overall quality. As suggested in the previous section, the evidence supporting this assumption is mixed, although the conceptual stance is intuitively appealing. Nevertheless, guidelines must be evaluated in field-based randomized studies that examine their impact on both processes and outcomes of behavioral health care. There is a need to demonstrate that guidelines produce their intended impact. Otherwise, the behavioral health community may be compelled to look for other methods for improving the quality of their care.

See also: Clinical Psychology: Manual-based Treatment; Managed Care; Managed Care and Psychotherapy in the United States; Medical Experiments: Ethical Aspects; Pecuniary Issues in Medical Services: Ethical Aspects; Psychological Treatments, Empirically Supported; Psychological Treatments: Randomized Controlled Clinical Trials; Psychotherapy: Ethical Issues; Psychotherapy: Legal Issues (United States)

Bibliography

American Psychological Association Task Force 1995 Template for Developing Practice Guidelines: Interventions for Mental Disorders and Psychological Aspects of Physical Disorders. American Psychological Association, Washington, DC

- Bernstein G A, Shaw K, Dunne J E 1997 Practice parameters for the assessment and treatment of children and adolescents with anxiety disorders. Journal of The American Academy of Child Psychology 36: S49–S84
- Clinton J J, McCormick K, Besteman J 1994 Enhancing clinical practice: The role of practice guidelines. American Psychologist 49: 30–3
- Depression Guideline Panel 1993 Depression in Primary Care: Detection, diagnosis and treatment. (Clinical practice guideline No. 5, AHCPR publication No. 93–0553.) US Department of Health and Human Services. US Public Health Service. Agency for Health Care Policy and Research, Rockville, MD
- Field M, Lohr K (eds.) 1990 Guidelines for Clinical Practice: From Development to Use. Institute of Medicine Committee on Clinical Practice Guidelines. National Academy Press, Washington, DC
- Eddy D 1996 Clinical Decision Making: From Theory to Practice. A collection of Essays from SAMAs. Jones & Bartlett, Boston
- Grimshaw J M, Russell I T 1993 Effect of clinical guidelines on medical practice: A systematic review of rigorous evaluations. Lancet 342: 1317–22
- Herz M I, Liberman R P, Liberman J A 1997 Practice guideline for the treatment of patients with schizophrenia. American Journal of Psychiatry 154(4): 1–63
- Lomas J, Anderson G M, Dominick-Pierre K, Vayda E, Enkin M, Hannah W 1989 Do practice guidelines guide practice? The effect of a consensus statement on the practice of physicians. New England Journal of Medicine 321: 1306–11
- Nathan P E 1998 Practice guidelines: Not yet ideal. American Psychologist 55: 290–9
- Noonan D, Coursey R, Edwards J, Frances A, Fritz T, Henderson M, Krauss A, Leibfried T, Manderscheid R, Minden S, Strosahl K 1998 Clinical practice guidelines. Journal of the Washington Academy of Sciences 85: 114–12
- Practice Guideline Coalition 1997 Mission Statement and Framework for Developing Practice Guidelines. Available from Practice Guideline Coalition, Department of Psychology/296, University of Nevada-Reno, Reno, NV. 89557
- Strosahl K 1994 Entering the new frontier of managed health care: Gold mines and land mines. Cognitive and Behavioral Practice 1: 5–23
- Strosahl K 1995 Three ‘gold-mine land-mine’ themes in generation of managed care. Behavior Therapist 18: 52–54
- Woolf S H 1992 Practice guidelines: A new reality in medicine, Part II. Methods of developing guidelines. Archives of Internal Medicine 152: 946–52

K. Strosahl and P. Robinson

Psychotherapy: Ethical Issues

When attempting to survey the landscape of ethical standards designed to deal with the practice of psychotherapy, one quickly encounters a plethora of formal codes fraught with, what at least initially appears to be, unrelated design, length, and content. Each of these codes reflects the official position taken by a professional body regarding ethical conduct on the part of the membership of their respective organizations (psychologists, psychiatrists, social workers, etc.). These differences, however, often create confusion among psychotherapists regarding just what is right or what is ethical. The problems created by these inconsistencies only become more serious when one is searching for ethical guidance on how to behave when dealing with ethical problems. Because of the inherent confusion that can frequently come from these codes, and the laws that come from them, perhaps the best way to address the topic of ethics in psychotherapy would be by turning away from the specific codes themselves to a study of the fundamental principles that form the foundation for ethical conduct in healthcare. Then, with an improved understanding of ethical theory one can move to a review of how these principles are applied to the practice of psychotherapy and to how they can give ethical guidance to the individual psychotherapist (Eberlein 1987).

A good source for information regarding ethical issues in healthcare can be found in the Principles of Biomedical Ethics, by Beauchamp and Childress (1994). These authors take the position that all ethical conduct in healthcare is based upon what they call a four-principled approach to biomedical ethics. They believe that the four primary moral principles that drive ethics in healthcare are: respect for autonomy, beneficence, non maleficence, and justice. Simply put, healthcare professionals are ethically bound to try to help those they treat (beneficence) while avoiding making things worse (non maleficence). In addition, healthcare practitioners should have a fundamental respect for the patient’s right to choose (autonomy) and should practice their profession in a system that is equitable and fair (justice). Other authors have argued for the addition of a fifth principle, that of fidelity, to this list (Kitchener 1984; Koocher and Keith-Spiegel 1999). As applied to healthcare, fidelity deals with the healthcare provider’s obligation to act in good faith, be honest, keep promises and to fulfill obligations to those they treat. Since these five fundamental principles are generally thought to compose the foundation of ethics in healthcare, they warrant closer scrutiny.

1. Respect for Autonomy

Respect for autonomy is tied to the belief that people have a right to hold views and make choices that reflect their own beliefs and that these beliefs do not need to be shared with, or approved of by, others. Thus, autonomy is a fundamental component of the concept of freedom and, as applied to healthcare, this freedom allows the patient, and not the provider, to control treatment.

Perhaps the best place to find evidence of the principle of autonomy as applied to the practice of psychotherapy is with informed consent to treatment. In its basic form, informed consent requires that the provider tell the patient about the risks and benefits of a specific treatment prior to commencing the treatment itself. In addition, the person consenting must have the capacity to consent and must do so freely (Stromberg et al. 1992). In application, appropriate informed consent serves to level the field in treatment, and allows the patient to become the decision-maker when dealing with his or her well-being. It also places the obligation to fulfill the spirit of autonomy in psychotherapy upon the therapist, who must make sure the decision-maker has enough information to make an informed choice that is free from coercion.

Many authors have argued that good informed consent is not just limited to an exchange that occurs at the outset of therapy but is actually a concept that is applied throughout the treatment process (Pope and Vasquez 1998, Younggren 2000). That is, individuals who find themselves in therapy have a right to understand their treatment, its direction and any changes that occur in its direction. So as the direction of therapy shifts and as the types of interventions used change, the therapist must make sure the patient understands and agrees to these changes. Once again, it is the patient who must be in control of the decision-making process.

Satisfying the requirements of informed consent does not end with fulfilling these obligations to the patient. A good informed consent additionally requires honesty on the part of the psychotherapist regarding comprehensive treatment issues and related matters. If the information shared with the patient is not truthful or complete, then the whole structure of informed consent is threatened since one could not consent to engage in treatment without an honest explanation of that treatment by the therapist.

The requirement of honesty in informed consent raises a number of interesting questions for providers who work in today's complex healthcare system. For example, a therapist may work with a managed care company whose contract, in application, is more limited than the patient believes. Would it be ethical for this therapist not to inform his or her patients of that reality? Are not a patient's rights compromised by a therapist's decision to not tell the patient of the limitations of that insurance when, in fact, the patient might truly not choose to proceed under such circumstances? Is this purposeful lack of clarity unethical? It is clear that the principle of autonomy requires that the patient understand these types of realities prior to commencing treatment. However, fulfilling this requirement can create serious conflicts of interest for the psychotherapist because the detailed explanation of insurance limitations may be frowned upon by some managed care companies who see such conduct as noncooperative. It goes without saying the providers who are viewed as not being cooperative with the expectations of a managed care company run the risk of losing their provider contracts. All the same the ethical reality remains, that purposefully keeping realities about therapy away from a patient truly violates one of the fundamental tenets of informed consent and that this conduct is unethical. Thus, to conform with the standards of good ethical conduct, therapists must engage in a description of psychotherapy with their patients that is not only detailed, understandable, and noncoercive, but also open, honest and free from conflicts of interest.

Also inherent in the principle of autonomy is a respect for the rights of patients to control the exchange of private information about themselves and to understand the limitations of that control. Once again, patients must, as a part of informed consent, understand how the psychotherapist is going to deal with their personal and, frequently, very private information. This includes an explanation of what information will be shared with insurance companies, other professionals and other family members, to name a few. The spirit of this principle even extends to minors whose rights, in reality, are limited legally. Psychotherapists who work with children have an ethical obligation to make sure that those children understand what is going to be shared with others and what their legal rights are. While children may not be of the legal age to consent, the philosophy of informed consent clearly demands that minors are asked to give age-appropriate informed consent and the child therapist who fails to fulfill this obligation with his or her patients violates the minor's autonomy rights.

Interestingly, the implementation of the principle of autonomy in the practice of psychotherapy does not allow the therapist to condone destructive behaviour that may result from patients' expressing their autonomy. Rights to autonomy exist in balance with other moral principles. Thus, ethical mental health professionals understand that destructive choices that damage oneself, like suicide, or damage another, like homicide or child abuse, become expressed exceptions to autonomy rights. In addition, there are settings, like prisons, where individuals have by definition had their freedom of choice restricted and, consequently, these individuals may not be allowed the full benefit of the principles of autonomy. Regardless of these types of exceptions, the general exceptions to autonomy should be clearly understood by all patients prior to beginning psychotherapy.

2. Beneficence

Fundamental to all healthcare is a belief that the provider is attempting to improve the patient's condition through the delivery of a professional service. This belief is also key to the practice of psychotherapy. Upon first assessment, the value of this principle seems so obvious that some would say it should stand without explanation. However, when applied to the psychotherapy loosely and without being carefully defined, the implementation of beneficence as a principle can become confusing and complex and can raise many questions. These questions include the following: Is it an expression of beneficence to help a patient gain insight into a very painful, historical reality consistent with an insight-oriented model of therapy, with a risk that such insight will result in psychological distress? Where is beneficence found in an extensive, analytically-oriented psychotherapy that can have no concrete or well-defined goal? Is beneficence evident when the therapist's intentions are good but when the model of intervention has no scientific merit? The answers to the question are elusive and frequently cause extensive, passionate debate among professionals. Psychotherapists should, at a minimum, have a theoretical rationale that answers these and related questions.

Theoretical debates aside, there are some aspects of beneficence that should universally be found in the ethical practice of psychotherapy. Ethically-based psychotherapists who practice with an eye toward beneficence, practice therapies that are, at a minimum, arguably good treatments for the problems their patients bring to them. This type of therapist does not do the same type of therapy with each person who comes through the door. Implied in this is the corollary that the ethical therapist does not see the same problem in every patient he or she treats. The ethical psychotherapist plans therapy with a respect for the empirical and theoretical support that exists, showing that a specific intervention is the right thing to do for the specific problem being addressed.

Respect for beneficence also requires that the therapist engage in activities that improve the quality of their treatments. That is, they engage in consultation, continuing education and literature reviewing in order to stay current with the changing status of their profession. The ethical therapist also constantly combines the law, current literature, and community standards in using a model of intervention that has the highest probability of success and the ethical therapist is secure in his or her ability to justify their professional conduct. This style of practice assures the ethical psychotherapist that the intervention in a specific case is both consistent with the standard of care for a psychotherapist and in the best interests of the patient.

It goes without saying that practicing an outmoded model of intervention, in the face of clear evidence that another treatment could be more effective, would likely be a violation of the principle of beneficence in psychotherapy. There is little justification for a psychotherapist to apply a model of intervention that is less efficient, more costly and less likely to be successful when compared with another treatment, without a clear understanding or rationale for doing so. Once again, the reality of managed care constraints lends itself well to a discussion of the application of the ethical principle of beneficence to psychotherapy. That is, ethical psychotherapists do not allow the constraints placed upon them by insurance benefits or managed care contracts to lead them away from what they believe would be the most effective intervention. The ethical therapist, at a minimum, must make sure that both the patient and the insurance company know that effectiveness of therapy is being administratively threatened by insurance constraints and all parties must know what the recommended treatment is. Most importantly, the ethical psychotherapist attempts to resolve any administrative insurance conflicts with a constant eye toward what is in the patient's best interest.

Finally, the ethical psychotherapist does not continue a treatment that is no longer benefiting the patient. When faced with an intervention that is leading nowhere, ethical constraints would demand a change in direction that would result in either a change in the type of therapy or, if absolutely necessary, the termination of treatment. To do otherwise is potentially exploitive of the patient, and denies the patient access to other, potentially more effective interventions: a clear violation of the principle of beneficence.

3. Non Malfeasance

It comes as no surprise that ethical psychotherapists are supposed to avoid doing bad or destructive things to and with their patients. In today's litigious society this has become a very powerful principle and is felt by some authors to take precedence over all other ethical principles (Marsh 1997, Harris 2000). It is obvious that therapy is not supposed to be a damaging process and it is the responsibility of the ethical therapist to minimize risk in order to avoid, at all costs, engaging in a process that is destructive. This prohibition against doing destructive things is very broad and not only applies specifically to the treatment aspects of psychotherapy but can also include administrative aspects of the treatment relationship.

Once again defining exactly what is destructive and damaging about psychotherapy can be quite subtle and elusive. As pointed out earlier, risk can frequently become a matter of theoretical debate among mental health professionals from differing theoretical orientations. Regardless of this lack of consistency and conceptual clarity, in general, therapists should constantly evaluate whether their interventions are potentially damaging to their patients. This is not only in the patient's best interests but also protects the therapist. However, this does not mean that ethical therapy must be void of risk, since there is probably some degree of risk in all treatments. What it does mean is that therapists do not engage in delivering treatments to patients that have risk without the patient understanding, as much as possible, the nature of those risks. If the term 'risk' comes from controversy in the field, and/or the lack of strong empirical support, it becomes all the more important that the patient receive a detailed explanation of these issues.

Non malfeasance principles would also prevent a therapist from engaging in extratherapeutic conduct with a patient that has no theoretical or empirical treatment value whatsoever, or that has even been shown to be potentially destructive. For example, a patient could never give informed consent to have sex with a therapist because research has already shown such conduct to be potentially very destructive to patients and to be of no treatment value. Even if the therapist informed the patient of these risks, agreement on the part of the patient would not reduce the serious nature of this type of ethical violation. A patient also could never give consent to allow the therapist to serve conflicting roles in a case regardless of the rationale for so doing. This prohibition against engaging in anything that is potentially destructive in psychotherapy includes patient exploitation, physical abuse, boundary violations, multiple relationships, and more. The seriousness of these types of violations is only made more obvious by the reality that this type of potentially dangerous conduct usually has nothing to do with psychotherapy and that it is frequently the result of designing the treatment relationship to meet the needs of the therapist, and not the patient.

4. Justice

The ethical principle of justice is the foundation for other very valuable healthcare concepts like fairness and equality. Justice should be evident whenever persons are due benefits from others because of their particular circumstance, as when they are ill or when they are struggling emotionally. The fulfillment of this principle is based upon the professional's respect for the fair and equal distribution of services regardless of societal differences like race, status, religious orientation, etc. (Kitchener 1984).

The principle of justice, as a concept applied to psychotherapy, takes on differing forms depending upon circumstance. Limited assets, limited time, limited staffing all are variables that have direct impact upon the implementation of justice in a treatment setting. Under some circumstances the lack of justice in the provision of professional services becomes clear; however, in others, it becomes clouded. For example, it would be obvious to most that a therapist who changes services based upon a patient's race would be unethical. In this circumstance, the lack of justice is easy to evaluate. However, what about when people cannot afford care because of poverty, societal unfairness or when benefits are limited or simply not available? How does the ethical psychotherapist pursue justice under these circumstances? Or, is the ethical therapist even responsible for addressing these types of issues when delivering care? Under these types of circumstances true justice becomes quite difficult to pursue.

In reality, things are not often just, and inequality is a part of the human circumstance. Suffice it to say that ethical psychotherapists are those who work toward justice in treatment but are realistic in so doing. That is, they aim to do the best they can in psychotherapy, to be fairest to the persons they are treating. In fact, this is the psychotherapist's fiduciary obligation in psychotherapy.

In application, the ethical psychotherapist might pursue justice in therapy by providing a few extra termination sessions to the patient who has lost insurance benefits. He or she could offer a few pro bono visits to the patient who does not have the financial means to continue treatment or the fee for therapy could be reduced so that the patient could afford it. Or he or she could also volunteer to give time to those who do not have the means to pay for the services they receive. Regardless of the actual case, the ethical psychotherapist pursues justice in treatment and makes this one of the key principles in ethical decision-making.

5. Fidelity

The final principle of ethical decision-making is that of fidelity. Fidelity addresses a person's responsibility to be loyal and truthful in their relationships with others. It also includes promise keeping, fulfilling commitments, and trustworthiness (Welfel and Kitchener 1992). In healthcare, however, the implementation of this principle extends beyond the regular responsibilities of business or contractual fulfillment to the creation of relationship based upon trust: the trust the patient has that the professional will always operate in the patient's best interests and will always fulfill their professional obligations to operate in his or her best interests. Some authors have taken the position that fidelity, along with non maleficence, are the most legally salient moral principles (Bersoff and Koeppel 1993).

As applied to psychotherapy, fidelity forces the professional to orient toward the patient's needs and not his or her own. Thus, the therapist who allows a sexual relationship to develop in treatment would be violating this principle. Clearly such a relationship is designed to meet the therapist's needs and becomes exploitive. This principle also applies to patient abandonment since such conduct would violate the trust the patient places in the psychotherapist, trust that the therapist will see the patient through the treatment process. Finally, fidelity also applies to circumstances where professionals allow administrative factors, like benefits limitations, fee capitation, and contractual rebates to affect their treatment decisions.

Fidelity, as applied to healthcare, is a dynamic process: and the way in which a therapist maintains fidelity in treatment changes as treatment changes. Fidelity also blends with the other principles of ethical decision-making to require that the therapist be open and honest in the treatment relationship and to make sure that the patient's expectations are consistent with what the therapist can provide. Fidelity requires psychotherapists to make the best choices they can for those that they treat.

6. Summary

The ethical psychotherapist is one who understands the fundamentals of ethical philosophy and knows how to apply them to individual cases. If a psychotherapist is capable of viewing ethical dilemmas from the perspective of ethical philosophy, decisions regarding the correct choice, if you will, become much easier to find. This approach is much more effective than a rule-based system. Rule-based guidance will never give the psychotherapist ethical security because the profession is complex and is fraught with theoretical debate and inconsistency. The search for rules, versus an understanding of principles that generate those rules, will only create a complex, awkward, and laboriously large system that would truly obscure a professional's ability to evaluate problems and to then choose the best course of action. Therefore, the answers to ethical questions can be found in the thoughtful implementation of the five principles of autonomy, beneficence, non maleficence, fidelity, and justice in psychotherapy.

See also: Assessment and Application of Therapeutic Effectiveness, Ethical Implications of; Ethics and Psychiatry; Ethics in Organizations, Psychology of

Bibliography

- American Psychological Association 1992 Ethical principles of psychologists and code of conduct. American Psychologist 47: 1597–611
- Beauchamp T L, Childress J F 1994 Principles of Biomedical Ethics, 4th edn. Oxford University Press, New York
- Bersoff D N, Koepl P M 1993 Ethics and Behavior 3: 345–57
- Eberlein L 1987 Introducing ethics to beginning psychologists: A problem solving approach. Professional Psychology: Research and Practice 18: 353–59
- Harris E 2000 Ethical Decision Making and Risk Management in Clinical Practice. A workshop presented by the American Psychological Association Insurance Trust at the meeting of the American Psychological Association, Washington, DC
- Kitchener, K S 1984 Intuition, critical evaluation, and ethical principles: The foundations for ethical decisions in counseling psychology. The Counseling Psychologist 12(3): 43–55
- Koocher G P, Keith-Spiegel P 1998 Ethics in Psychology, 2nd edn. Random House, New York
- Marsh, D T 1997 Ethical issues in professional practice with families. In: Marsh D T and Magee R D (eds.), Ethical and Legal Issues in Professional Practice with families, pp. 3–26 John Wiley, New York
- Pope, K S, Vasquez M J T 1998 Ethics in psychotherapy and Counseling, 2nd edn. Jossey-Bass, San Francisco

- Stromberg C D, Haggarty D J, Leibenluft R F, McMillan M H, Mishkin B, Rubin B L, Trilling H R 1988 The Psychologist's Legal Handbook. The Council for the National Register of Health Service Providers in Psychology, Washington, DC
- Welfel E, Kitchener K 1992 Introduction to the special section: Ethics education—an agenda for the 90s. Professional Psychology: Research and Practice 23: 179–81
- Younggren J N 2000 Is managed care really just another unethical Model T? The Counseling Psychologist 28(2): 253–62

J. Younggren

Psychotherapy, History of: Psychiatric Aspects

Psychotherapy—the systematic application of psychological principles to accomplish symptomatic or more substantial personality change—has its origins in two healing traditions—the magico-religious and the medico-scientific (Bromberg 1959). The idea that human experience is influenced by supernatural forces and that certain people have the power to intercede with these forces dates back to antiquity. Shamans and sorcerers have resorted to amulets, magical potions, and incantations for centuries. They have also conducted exorcism and induced altered states of consciousness.

With the Age of Reason, interest was aroused in the newly discovered phenomena of electricity and magnetism. Anton Mesmer (1734–1815), a brash physician, drew on the latter when propounding his theory of animal magnetism. Since the body contained 'magnetic fluid,' and this could become disturbed, by applying magnets to various parts a patient could be relieved of pain and other ailments. While Mesmer's work was ultimately denounced by a Royal Commission and he was forgotten, the observation that his methods appeared to help patients continued to attract attention. James Braid (1795–1860), a Manchester doctor, noted that he could induce a similar trance-like state by getting people to fix their gaze on a luminous object. Labeling the phenomenon hypnosis, he proceeded to demonstrate its effectiveness in treating a range of conditions.

The doyen of French neurology, Jean Martin Charcot (1835–93), considered hypnosis a neuro-physiological process, and set about its study in states like somnambulism and hysteria. His pupil Pierre Janet (1859–1947) suggested that the latter was brought about by weakening of a higher brain function, resulting in a constriction of consciousness. In this 'dissociated' state thoughts could not be integrated, and symptoms were beyond the reach of consciousness.

In an alternative explanation, Ambroise Liebeault (1823–1904), and Hippolyte Bernheim (1840–1919) in France posited a narrowing of attention in hypnosis which rendered the patient vulnerable to the therapist's influence by suggestion. Far from invalidating hypnosis, the power of suggestion could be investigated scientifically and accepted as a bona fide therapy.

Freud (1856–1939) had studied briefly with Charcot in 1885–6 and became enthusiastic about new possible treatments for hysteria. Freud's mentor, a respected Viennese physician, Josef Breuer (1842–1925), had described the treatment of a young woman who suffered from an array of marked hysterical symptoms. Instead of suggesting disappearance of the symptoms, Breuer had encouraged Anna O (the pseudonym given to her) to talk freely about her life under hypnosis. She did so and over time began to share memories about her father's illness. Breuer noted that after each session, his patient became less distressed and her symptoms improved. Anna herself referred to this approach as her 'talking cure' or 'chimney sweeping'; Breuer termed it 'catharsis.' Whereas Charcot had described physically traumatic events as possibly causal, in his hysterical patients, Breuer and Freud's interest focused on psychological trauma such as humiliation and loss. Freud also became less keen on applying hypnosis.

Their volume, Studies in Hysteria, which included the case of Anna O, and four others treated by Freud himself, also contained ideas on defense mechanisms and an account of various techniques including suggestion, hypnosis, and catharsis. Most importantly, however, was the new concept of 'free-association': the patient was instructed to disclose whatever came into their mind, without any censoring, while the analyst adopted an attitude of 'evenly-suspended attention' in listening to and interpreting the material.

On the basis of his subsequent self-analysis and further clinical experience, Freud elaborated his theory of infantile sexuality. Sexual fantasies in young children centered around the triangular relationships of love and rivalry with their parents (the Oedipal complex). Promoting free association of this theme, as well as of dreams, slips of the tongue, and other unconsciously-based thoughts, feelings, and fantasies, Freud emphasized the centrality of the complex in the neuroses. While catharsis and insight (making the unconscious conscious) seemed pivotal to therapy, Freud soon realized that other factors also operated, particularly the role of transference, i.e., how feelings, thoughts, and fantasies stemming from childhood experiences and revived in current relationships are 'transferred' onto the analyst.

Interpretations were directed at this threefold nature of the analytic experience. The therapist's response to transference (countertransference) led to analysts having their own personal therapy, the aim being to minimize it, and thus to be thoroughly objective in attending to the patient's disclosures (Ellenberger 1970).

In summary then, psychoanalytic psychotherapy elaborated the following processes: the patient's unbridled disclosure of whatever enters his or her mind—free association; the transference of infantile and childlike feelings and attitudes to the therapist which were previously directed to key figures in the patient's earlier life; interpretation of the transference as well as of defenses the patient applies to protect him/herself and the resistance he/she manifests to self-exploration; and finally, the repeated working through of the discoveries made in treatment. The ultimate aim is insight with translation into corresponding change in behavior and personality.

1. Variations on a Theme

Freud revised his theories at numerous points in his long professional life. In addition, many colleagues extended the boundaries of psychoanalytic thinking. But differences of opinion soon surfaced, some radical. The nature of psychoanalysis then, especially Freud's intolerance of dissent, led notable figures to leave the fold and to evolve their own models on which corresponding schools of therapy were established. Jung and Adler were two foremost European dissidents; Karen Horney, Erich Fromm, and H. S. Sullivan were pioneering neo-Freudians in the US; and W. D. Winnicott and Melanie Klein were prominent in Britain (Mitchell and Black 1995).

Carl Gustav Jung is perhaps the most critical dissenter since he was clearly being groomed to take over leadership of the psychoanalytic movement. But he was also celebrated because of his own contribution. Specifically with regard to psychotherapy, he advanced the notion of 'individuation'—the aim was to discover all parts of oneself and one's creative potential. Jung was less concerned than Freud with the biological roots of behavior, especially infantile sexual development, but rather emphasized social and cultural factors. The role of transference was replaced by a more adult type of collaboration.

Furthermore, the unconscious for Jung is not merely the repository of the individual's history but also a wider social history, a phenomenon Jung labeled the collective unconscious. He arrived at this notion through a study of myths, legends, and symbols in different cultures, in different epochs. That these are shared by a variety of cultures is not fortuitous but reflects cosmic mythical themes or archetypes, a salient feature of man's collective history.

Alfred Adler (1870–1937), a Viennese physician, was like Jung a prominent dissenter. Adler joined Freud's circle in 1902 but broke away to form his own school of 'individual psychology' after nine years. An important tenet concerns individual development. We begin life in a state of inferiority, weak, and defenseless, for which we compensate by striving for power and by evolving a lifestyle to make our lives purposeful. The pattern that emerges varies and may include such goals as acquisition of money, procreation, high ambition, or creativity. The drive for power and choice of lifestyle may, however, go awry in which case a neurosis results. A path is followed which leads to ineffective efforts to cope with the feeling of inferiority and assumption of a facade or false self.

Adler regarded therapy as a re-educative process in which the therapist, who serves as model and source of encouragement, engages in a warm relationship with the patient and enables him or her to understand the lifestyle he/she has assumed. Unconscious determinants of behavior are less crucial than conscious ones and the term 'unconscious' is used only descriptively to refer to aspects of the person that are not understood by him.

Freud's insistence on innate drives and infantile sexuality not only led to the schisms with Jung and Adler but also spurred a new generation of analytically oriented analysts to concentrate on interpersonal aspects of psychological experience. In the US, Sullivan pioneered the school of 'interpersonal psychiatry,' in which the therapist adopted the role of participant observer in treatment, the transference providing one opportunity to explore communication and its breakdown in the patient's interpersonal world.

We can consider the chief features in the approach of the neo-Freudians by looking briefly at Karen Horney (1885–1952). She became disenchanted with Freud's rigid focus on instinctual biological factors, arguing that cultural factors were more salient, as reflected in the differences in psychological development and behavior among different sociocultural groups. Indeed, behavior regarded as normal in one culture could be viewed as neurotic in another.

In line with her emphasis on culture, Horney advanced the role of parental love in the life of a young child. Children typically suffer anxiety, a consequence of feeling helpless in a threatening world. The child reared in a loving atmosphere succeeds in overcoming basic anxiety. By contrast, the deprived child comes to view the world as cruel and hazardous. An inevitable result is low self-esteem.

The task of therapy is to examine the patient's defective patterns in relating to others. In part this is achieved through study of what transpires between patient and therapist. But there is no emphasis on transference as occurs in Freudian analysis. Therapy aims to enable the patient to move with others, by engaging in relationships which are reciprocal and mutual. Another goal is greater self-realization, with freedom from determined modes of thought and action.

While the neo-Freudians were establishing a new pathway for psychoanalysis, a group was equally innovative in the UK and France. In the UK, Melanie Klein (1882–1960), a physician hailing from Berlin, concluded from her study of children's play that the Oedipal complex, as described by Freud, was a late expression of primitive unconscious anxieties which children experienced in the first 18 months of life. Given that these states could be reactivated in adult life, Klein labeled them 'positions' rather than stages of psychological development. She also supported the move away from Freud's formulation of instincts and psychosexual energy toward one of object relations, namely the representations of the perception and experience of significant others. Similarly, transference was to be understood not only as a repetition of past or current relationships, but as evidence of relational patterns in the patient's current internal world.

In tandem with Klein, other analysts in Britain proposed ways in which significant early relationships, particularly between infant or young child and its mother, exerted a formative influence on the developing psyche. John Bowlby (1907–90), in particular, observed that children who had suffered a prolonged separation from their mother underwent a grief experience which predisposed them to a range of psychopathology in later life. Donald Winnicott (1896–1971), a pediatrician and analyst, proposed that a mother's attunement to her child, enabling him to feel psychologically 'held' and understood, was an essential ingredient for a stable sense of self. The American psychoanalyst Heinz Kohut advanced a similar concept, but highlighted the place of empathy whereby the mother functions as a 'self object' for the child.

Wilfred Bion, a student of Klein, suggested that the analyst functions as a 'container' into whom the patient projects their 'unprocessed' feelings and experiences; the analyst returns them later in a form accessible to him to work on. This experience is deemed to be crucial to the development of a person's ability to examine his or her own state of mind and that of others.

Michael Balint, an analyst at the Tavistock Clinic, worked along similar lines to Winnicott, focusing on the opportunity for the patient to 'regress' in the safety of the therapeutic relationship to a state of mind in which differentiating between patient and therapist may blur. The features of the encounter—its regularity, predictability, and the therapist's empathic attitude—creates circumstances for such regression which can then be used to examine and alter defense mechanisms.

These models have implications for practice in that the therapist expresses moment-to-moment empathic understanding of the patient's inner experiences and as this is repeated time and again the process promotes the evolution of a coherent identity.

Jacques Lacan (1901–81), the maverick French analyst, claimed a 'return to Freud,' his early work in particular, but through the prisms of semiotics and linguistics. These disciplines, he contended, do not see language as a value-free means to express ideas and convey meaning but as a system of signs that communicate symbolically tacit rules and power arrangements. Language imposes on the child awareness of a separateness from its mother who represents a fantasized internal object (the imaginary mother), in whose eyes the child mirrors itself in an attempt to achieve a state of psychological unity. Lacan's controversial proposals regarding variable duration of treatment and trainees themselves determining their competence to qualify as psychoanalysts led to his expulsion from the International Psychoanalytic Association, albeit with a dedicated following.

Humanistic experientially oriented schools of therapy became popular in the 1960s and 1970s, mainly in the US. Their chief features were: challenging patients with the way they avoid emotionally significant matters in the 'here-and-now'; increasing awareness of nonverbal aspects of communication; facilitating emotional arousal; and providing a forum in which patients were encouraged to experiment with new behaviors.

Some of these schools have incorporated aspects of psychoanalytic theory. Transactional analysis, for instance, makes playful use of the concept of ego states, represented as parent, adult, and child; primal scream therapy is predicated on heightened arousal of the purported emotional trauma of birth; and psychodrama encourages people to enact their conflicts by personifying various roles in their psychological lives.

The most influential humanistic school has been the client-centered therapy of Carl Rogers, although it has been absorbed into psychotherapy generally and not always with appropriate acknowledgment. Its premise is that if the therapist creates an atmosphere that is nonjudgmental, empathic, and warm, people can realize their potential for self-expression and self-fulfillment.

Feminist-based psychotherapies, still evolving since the 1980s, reflect a range of opinion from those which condemn Freud as a misogynist who deliberately recanted his discovery of the actuality of childhood sexual abuse, to those who appreciate his linkage of life experience, innate drives, and corresponding defense mechanisms in influencing vulnerability to psychopathology (Elliot 1991, Appignanesi and Forrester 1992). The latter point of view, echoing a broader debate within psychoanalysis of the respective roles of internal and external reality, has led some feminist therapists to stress social reality, and others to stress physical reality.

2. The Development of Other Modes of Psychotherapy

Our focus, hitherto, has been on psychotherapy of the individual patient. The second half of the twentieth century saw the evolution of treatments conducted with more than one person: groups of strangers and families. In this section, we provide a brief account of the development of these two modes.

Although therapy of stranger groups was experimented on early in the century, it was not until World War II that major developments ensued. The exigencies of war were the spur in that the group format proved highly economical for dealing with huge numbers of soldier-patients. The Northfield Military Hospital in the UK was a center of remarkable innovation, led by psychoanalytically oriented therapists like Wilfred Bion and S. N. Foulkes. Bion's (1961) influence pervaded subsequent work at the Tavistock Clinic, while Foulkes (1965) was the founding father of the Institute of Group Analysis (both in London).

In the US, the move to the study of group process was spearheaded by social psychologists, particularly Kurt Lewin. A national center was established to train people in human relations and group dynamics. Participants from diverse backgrounds studied group functioning in order to act more effectively in their own work settings. Paralleling the human potential movement in the 1960s, the group movement transferred its focus from group to personal dynamics, and before long the encounter group movement had evolved with its thrust of promoting greater self-awareness and personal growth. Encounter groups became widespread during the 1960s and 1970s but after an initial fervor, declined both in terms of membership and appeal.

Formal group therapy under professional leadership then assumed a more prominent role. The most popular model was fathered by Irvin Yalom who drew upon an interpersonalist approach, one originally molded by Harry Stack Sullivan who proposed that personality is chiefly the product of a person's interaction with other significant people. Yalom pioneered the study of therapeutic factors specific to the group rather than following the pattern of transposing psychoanalytic or other theories from the individual setting. His Theory and Practice of Group Psychotherapy (Yalom 1995) became exceedingly influential, attested to by the appearance of four editions.

Constrained perhaps by Western medicine's focus on the individual patient, psychiatry was slow to develop an interest in the family (Gurman and Kniskern 1991). Scattered through Freud's writings are interesting comments about family relationships and their possible roles in both individual development and psychopathology. His description of processes like introjection, projection, and identification explained how individual experiences could be transmitted across the generations in a family. Influenced by the work in the UK of Anna Freud, Melanie Klein, and Donald Winnicott, the child guidance movement developed a model of one therapist working with a disturbed child and another with the parents, most often the mother on her own. The two clinicians collaborated in order to recognize how the mother's anxieties distorted her perception and handling of her child, which were added to the child's own anxieties.

Things took a different turn in the US. There, Ackerman (1958) introduced the idea of working with the family of a disturbed child using psychoanalytic methods in the 1950s. An interest in working with the family, including two or more generations, arose concurrently. Thus, Murray Bowen (1971) found that the capacity of psychotic children to differentiate themselves emotionally from their families was impaired by the consequences of unresolved losses, trauma, and other upheavals in the lives of parental and grand-parental generations.

Boszormenyi-Nagy and Spark (1984) also addressed this transgenerational theme by describing how family relationships were organized around a ledger of entitlements and obligations which conferred upon each participant a sense of justice about their position. This, in turn, reflected the experience in childhood of neglect or sacrifices for which redress was sought in adult life.

Bowen also introduced the principles of Systems Theory into his work but it was Salvador Minuchin, working with delinquent youth in New York, who highlighted the relevance of systems thinking to their interventions. The youngsters often came from emotionally deprived families, headed by a demoralized single parent (most often the mother) who alternated between excessive discipline and helpless delegation of family responsibilities to a child. Minuchin's Structural Family Therapy deploys a series of action-oriented techniques and powerful verbal metaphors which enable the therapist to join the family, and to re-establish an appropriate hierarchy and generational boundaries between the family subsystems (marital, parent/child, siblings).

Another major development took place in Palo Alto, California, where a group of clinicians gathered around the anthropologist Gregory Bateson (1972) in the 1950s. They noted that implicit in communication were meta-communications, which defined the relationship between the participants. Any contradiction or incongruence carried great persuasive, moral, or coercive force and formed part of what they labeled a 'double-bind'; they proposed this as a basis for schizophrenic thinking.

All these system-oriented views assume that the family is a system observed by the therapist. However, therapists are not value-neutral. They may take an active role in orchestrating change in accordance with a model of family functioning. Yet these models ignore therapists' biases as well as the relevance of their relationships with families. This probably reflected the determination of some American family therapists to distance themselves from psychoanalytic theory, and also led them to neglect the family's history, how it changed throughout the lifecycle, and the significance of past traumatic and other notable life events.

In response to these criticisms there was a move away from the problem-focused approach which had characterized most behavioral and communication views of psychopathology. The Milan school (1980) whose founders were psychoanalysts developed a new method of interviewing families in conjunction with observers behind a one-way screen formulating and then presenting to the family and therapist hypotheses about 'their' system.

Family therapists also began to consider that families might be constrained from experimenting with new solutions because of the way they had interpreted their past experiences or internalized explanatory narratives of their family, the expert's, or society at large. This led to a shift from considering the family as a social to a linguistic system.

The narrative a family conveys about their lives is a construction which organizes past experience in particular ways; other narratives are excluded. When a family with an ill member talks to a professional, conversations are inevitably about problems (a problem-saturated description). The participants ignore times when problems were absent or minimal, or when they successfully confined problems to manageable proportions. A different story might be told if they were to examine the context that might have led, or could still lead, to better outcomes.

A number of narrative approaches have applied these concepts. Philosophically, they align themselves with postmodernism, which challenges the notion of a basic truth known only by an expert.

Many criticisms of systems approaches have been leveled including:

(a) Disregard of the subjective and intersubjective experiences of family members.

(b) Neglect of their history.

(c) Denial of unconscious motives which affect relationships.

(d) Although family members are reciprocally connected, the power they exert on one another is not equal; this is highlighted in the violence against women and in child abuse.

(e) Inequality and other forms of injustice based on societal attitudes toward differences in gender, ethnicity, class, and the like, are uncritically accepted as 'givens'.

(f) Minimizing the role of the therapeutic relationship, including attitudes members develop toward the therapist and her feelings toward them.

This critique has led to growing interest in integrating systems-oriented and psychoanalytic ideas, particularly those derived from object-relations theory. One variant is John Byng-Hall's (1995) synthesis of attachment theory, systems-thinking, and a narrative approach.

A further criticism of systems-oriented approaches is that they minimize the impact of external reality such as physical disability or biological factors, in the etiology of mental illness, and sociopolitical phenomena like unemployment, racism, and poverty. One result is the 'psycho-educational' approach, which has evolved in the context of the burden schizophrenia places on the family and the potential for its members to influence its course. This has led to a series of interventions including educating the family about the nature, causes, course, and treatment of schizophrenia; providing them with opportunities to discuss their difficulties in caring for the patient, and to devise appropriate strategies; and helping them to resolve conflict related to the illness, which may be aggravated by the demands of caring for a chronically ill person.

3. The Scientific Era

Systematic research in the psychotherapies was a low priority for many decades; instead, practitioners' interests focused on theory and technique. Investigation of the subject only took off in earnest in the early 1950s. A notable impetus was the critique by H. J. Eysenck (1952) in which he argued that the treatment of neurotic patients was no more effective than no treatment at all. Two-thirds of both groups showed improvement with time. In later reviews, Eysenck was even more damning: the effects of psychoanalysis in particular were minuscule. The attack led to much rancor and an extended battle between the psychoanalytic and behavioral camps (Eysenck featured prominently in the latter). Fortunately, a positive repercussion was the sense of challenge experienced by the analytic group. They had been riding high for several years, particularly in the US, and barely questioned whether their concepts and practice required scientific appraisal. Thus, although Eysenck's interpretation of the research literature was flawed and biased, he had stirred a hornet's nest.

Since the 1950s research has burgeoned and yielded much knowledge about whether psychotherapy works (outcome research) and how it works (process research). These developments were not without incident. Many therapists challenged the relevance of conventional research methodology to psychotherapy. A key argument was that the encounter between therapist and patient is unique, involving two people in a complex collaborative venture, and cannot be subject to the same form of scrutiny as occurs in the natural sciences. Moreover, the latter approach is necessarily mechanistic and reductionistic.

There is merit to the argument but actual research practice reveals that methodology can accommodate, at least in part, respect for the highly personal nature of psychological treatment. Sophisticated statistical procedures can also contribute to maintaining an appreciation that many characteristics in both patient and therapist are relevant, and they cannot be viewed as homogeneous groups. An illustration is the multidimensional measurement of outcome. Instead of restricting this to one or two variables only, several can be examined concurrently which together encompass the patients' internal and interpersonal world, e.g., quality of life, self-awareness, authenticity, self-esteem, target problems, and social adjustment.

Another criticism of outcome research is examining effectiveness without adequate treatment being given. Duration of research-bound therapy in fact is often much briefer than in customary practice because of funding constraints. A similar objection relates to the follow-up period usually set. A robust test of effectiveness entails examining outcome one or more years following the end of therapy in order to judge clinical projects independent of the therapist.

4. The Effectiveness of Psychotherapy

Several reviews have been conducted since the 1970s. A sophisticated method—meta-analysis—which relies on a rigorous statistical approach, points to psychotherapy overall generating benefits for patients who have been suitably selected. Encouragingly, better designed studies show positive results more commonly than inadequate ones. In one trail-blazing meta-analysis, levels of effectiveness were computed from 375 studies in which some 25,000 experimental and 25,000 controlled patients were tested (Smith et al. 1980). The average patient receiving psychological treatment of one kind or another was better off than 75 percent of those who were untreated—a clear demonstration of the beneficial effects of treatment in general.

With tens of 'schools' available, many of them claiming a distinctive approach, the obvious question arises as to whether some are superior in producing benefit. This question of comparative effectiveness is complicated in that not only may 'schools' be compared but also specific procedures such as setting a time limit or not or conducting therapy individually or within a group. Notwithstanding these difficulties, considering research on comparative effectiveness is worthwhile. Several reviews show a consistent pattern—that 'everyone has won and must have prizes.' This was of course the judgment of a race handed down by the dodo bird in Alice in Wonderland. In the psychotherapy stakes, it appears that everyone has won too, a finding probably attributable to factors common to all therapeutic approaches. These factors, set out originally by Jerome Frank (1973), include a confiding relationship with a helping person, a rationale which provides an account of the patient's problems and of the methods for remedying them, instillation of hope for change, opportunity for 'success experiences' during treatment, facilitating emotion in the patient, and providing new knowledge, so promoting self-awareness. These 'nonspecific' factors comprise a significant theme in psychotherapy; they probably serve as a platform for benefits from all treatments.

Any consideration of effectiveness brings up the issue of harm. In other words, treatment may be for better or for worse. After a long gestation, the concept of a 'negative effect' attracted widespread attention from the 1970s (Hadley and Strupp 1976). A growing sense of confidence perhaps permitted therapists to be more open to a potential harmful impact.

To distinguish between a patient becoming worse because of their intrinsic condition or following an adverse life event, a negative effect has been defined as deterioration directly attributable to treatment itself. Such a causal link is difficult to prove but genuine negative effects certainly do occur. The definitional difficulty, however, leads to estimates of prevalence ranging from rare to common. The type of therapy appears to influence the rate. Evidence points to worsening in about 5–10 percent of cases in psychotherapy generally. The reasons for deterioration are not well established although a common view is that patient factors probably contribute, particularly selecting people for treatments for which they are unsuited. In this situation, refining assessment, thus enhancing clinicians' ability to predict response to specific treatments, is deemed as helpful to reduce the casualty rate.

Another obvious facet is the therapist and/or technique. Here, inadequate training has emerged as salient, with poor judgment leading to inappropriate interventions. It has also been recognized that a proportion of therapists perform poorly because of their personality traits, no matter what their level of training or experience. In other words, the role of therapist does not suit all those who wish to practice. In a noteworthy study of different forms of encounter group, a substantial percentage of 'casualties' were produced by four leaders, who typically pummeled members to disclose personal information and express intense emotion.

During the half century of systematic research, attention has also been devoted to the processes that take place in the therapeutic encounter.

Process and outcome research are inevitably linked. If we can identify factors that promote or hinder effectiveness, we may be able to modify these and then note the result. The advent of recording techniques such as audio and video has facilitated studies of process and a wide range of observations of both verbal and non-verbal behavior, in both therapist and patient and their interaction, have been made. One illustration is the premise that a necessary condition for effective group therapy is group cohesiveness. It follows that anything enhancing cohesiveness could be advantageous. Compatibility between members has been proposed as pertinent and indeed been shown to relate to cohesiveness. Group therapy therefore could conceivably be more effective if, in selecting members, compatibility were taken into account. For example, a patient incompatible with all his peers would presumably not be placed in that group.

Research on process has been shown to be as salient as that on outcome since only with the study of what occurs in treatment can therapists appreciate its inherent nature and the factors for optimal improvement of participants. Diligent process research has provided solid foundations for establishing hypotheses about outcome.

We have dealt in general terms with the theme of psychotherapy research. The second half of the twentieth century has been a fertile period and seen much achieved; to do it justice is beyond our remit. The interested reader is recommended to consult the four editions of the Handbook of Psychotherapy and Behavior Change (Bergin and Garfield 1994) which has served the field in distilling work done and providing a critique of its quality.

See also: Bowlby, John (1907–90); Freud, Sigmund (1856–1939); Janet, Pierre (1859–1947); Jung, Carl Gustav (1875–1961); Klein, Melanie (1882–1960); Psychiatry, History of; Psychoanalysis, History of; Psychological Treatment, Effectiveness of; Psychological Treatments, Empirically Supported; Psychotherapy and Religion

Bibliography

- Ackerman N W 1958 The Psychodynamics of Family Life. Basic Books, New York
- Appignanesi L, Forrester J 1992 Freud's Women. Basic Books, New York
- Bateson G 1972 Steps to An Ecology of Mind. Chandler Publishing Co., San Francisco
- Bergin A E, Garfield S L (eds.) 1994 Handbook of Psychotherapy and Behaviour Change, 4th edn. Wiley, New York
- Bion W 1961 Experiences in Groups. Tavistock, London
- Bromberg W 1959 The Mind of Man: A History of Psychotherapy and Psychoanalysis. Harper, New York
- Boszormenyi-Nagy I, Spark G M 1984 Invisible Loyalties: Reciprocity in Intergenerational Family Therapy. Brunner-Mazel, New York
- Bowen M 1978 Family Therapy in Clinical Practice. Jason Aronson, New York
- Byng-Hall J 1995 Rewriting Family Scripts. Improvisation and Systems Change. Guilford, New York
- Ellenberger H 1970 The Discovery of the Unconscious. Basic Books, New York
- Elliot P 1991 From Mastery to Analysis, Theories of Gender in Psychoanalytic Feminism. Cornell University Press, Ithaca, NY
- Eysenck H J 1952 The effects of psychotherapy. Journal of Consulting Psychology 16: 319–24
- Foulkes S H, Anthony E J 1965 Group Psychotherapy: The Psychoanalytic Approach. Penguin, Harmondsworth, UK
- Frank J D 1973 Persuasion and Healing: A Comparative Study of Psychotherapy. Johns Hopkins University Press, Baltimore, MD

- Gurman A S, Kniskern D P (eds.) 1991 Handbook of Family Therapy, Vol. II. Brunner/Mazel, New York
- Hadley S W, Strupp H H 1976 Contemporary views of negative effects in psychotherapy. Archives of General Psychiatry 33: 1291–302
- Mitchell S A, Black M J 1995 Freud and Beyond: A History of Modern Psychoanalytic Thought. Basic Books, New York
- Selvini-Palzzoli M, Boscolo L, Cecchin G, Prata G 1980 Hypothesizing-circularity-neutrality: Three guidelines for the conductor of the session. Family Process 19: 3–12
- Smith M L, Glass G V, Miller T I 1980 The Benefits of Psychotherapy. Johns Hopkins University Press, Baltimore, MD
- Yalom I D 1995 The Theory and Practice of Group Psychotherapy, 4th edn. Basic Books, New York

S. Bloch and E. Harari

Psychotherapy Integration

As an international movement, psychotherapy integration represents a revolutionary departure from the discipline's historical organization around single and competing theories. Integration is characterized by a desire to look across and beyond rival theories to see what can be learned—and how patients can benefit—from multiple ways of practicing psychotherapy. Although the movement faces several obstacles and has not yet been convincingly supported by empirical research, some form of integration will probably constitute the future of the discipline.

1. The Historical Context

The practice and training of psychotherapy has been historically organized around distinct and competing theoretical orientations, such as psychoanalysis, humanistic persuasions, behavior therapies, and family systems models. In the infancy of the field, therapy systems, like battling siblings, competed for attention and affection in a 'dogma eat dogma' environment. Clinicians traditionally operated from within their own particular theoretical frameworks, often to the point of being blind to alternative conceptualizations and potentially superior interventions.

Although this 'ideological cold war' may have been a necessary developmental stage for the discipline, psychotherapy since the mid-1980s has witnessed a decline in ideological struggle and the stirrings of rapprochement. The theoretical substrate of each system is undergoing intensive reappraisal, as psychotherapists acknowledge the inadequacies of any one system and the potential value of others. Distinctive of the present era is the tolerance for and assimilation of formulations that were once viewed as deviant, even heretical.

2. Integration Defined

As the field of psychotherapy has matured, integration has emerged as a dominating force. The dramatic growth of interest in psychotherapy integration during the 1990s has crystallized into a formal movement, or more dramatically, a 'metamorphosis' in mental health (London 1988).

Psychotherapy integration is characterized by a dissatisfaction with single-school approaches and a concomitant desire to look across and beyond school boundaries to see what can be learned—and how patients can benefit—from other ways of thinking about psychotherapy and behavior change. The ultimate outcome of doing so, not yet fully realized, is to enhance the effectiveness, efficiency, and applicability of psychotherapy.

Any number of indicators attest to the unprecedented interest in psychotherapy integration. Eclecticism or the increasingly favored term 'integration' is the modal theoretical orientation of English-speaking psychotherapists and is gradually increasing in prevalence throughout Europe. Leading psychotherapy textbooks increasingly identify their theoretical persuasion as integrative, and an integrative chapter is routinely included in compendia of treatment approaches. Handbooks on psychotherapy integration have appeared throughout the world, including several in Europe and two in the USA (Norcross and Goldfried 1992, Stricker and Gold 1993).

As with many relatively new movements, integration has been plagued by confusing vocabulary and multiple goals. Various labels are applied to the movement—convergence, rapprochement, treatment selection, combined therapies, prescriptionism, differential therapeutics, and eclecticism, among them—but psychotherapy integration has emerged as the overarching consensual term. Similarly, a plethora of integrations have been advanced: combining different therapy formats/modalities (such as individual and family therapy); blending self-help and psychotherapy; integrating pharmacotherapy and psychotherapy; synthesizing research and practice; integrating Occidental and Oriental perspectives; and so on. This article confines itself to the traditional and primary meaning of integration as the blending of diverse theoretical orientations or schools of psychotherapy.

3. Reasons for Recent Growth

Integration as a point of view has probably existed as long as philosophy and psychotherapy. In philosophy, the third-century biographer, Diogenes Laertius, referred to an eclectic school that flourished in Alexandria in the second century AD. In psychotherapy, Freud consciously struggled with the selection and integration of diverse methods.

Formal ideas on synthesizing the psychotherapies appeared in the literature as early as the 1930s (see Goldfried and Newman 1992 for a history), but it is only within the latter decade of the twentieth century that integration has developed into a clearly delineated area of interest. A number of interacting, mutually reinforcing motives have fostered the recent growth of integration (Prochaska and Norcross 1999):

(a) Proliferation of therapies. The field of psychotherapy has been staggered by over-choice and fragmented by future shock. Which of 400 plus therapies on the market should be studied, taught, or bought? This might also be called the Exhaustion Theory of Integration: the cynical but accurate observation that peace among warring schools is the last resort.

(b) Inadequacy of single theories for all patients and problems. No single system has cornered the market on utility. Underlying the ecumenical spirit is the stark realization that narrow conceptual positions do not begin to explain the evidence in psychotherapy. Clinical realities have come to demand a more flexible, if not integrative, perspective.

(c) Ascendancy of short-term, problem-focused treatments. The brief, problem focus of psychotherapy, particularly in the US, has brought formerly different therapies closer together. Integration responds to the pragmatic time-limited injunction of 'which therapy works better—and quicker—for this patient with this problem.'

(d) Opportunities to observe and experiment with various treatments. The introduction of treatment manuals, the availability of psychotherapy videotapes, and the establishment of specialized clinics for the treatment of specific disorders have all afforded exposure to other theories and therapies, and stimulated some practitioners to consider other orientations more seriously.

(e) Recognition that commonalties contribute heavily to outcome. The equivalent outcomes found among the empirically evaluated psychotherapies in many studies has led to increased emphasis on factors common to successful cases. Therapeutic success can best be predicted by patient characteristics and the therapeutic relationship, both transtheoretical features of psychotherapy, while only 15 percent of outcome variance is accounted for by specific techniques (Lambert 1992).

(f) Identification of specific treatments for particular disorders. While commonalties contribute heavily to therapeutic success, controlled research has identified several treatments of choice for particular disorders; for example, cognitive therapy and interpersonal therapy for depression, behavior therapy for specific phobias and childhood aggression, and exposure for PTSD. This has led to selective prescription of different treatments, and combinations of treatments, to individual patient needs.

(g) Development of a professional network for integration. Reflecting and engendering the burgeoning field have been the establishment of interdisciplinary psychotherapy organizations devoted to integration, notably the Society for the Exploration of Psychotherapy Integration (SEPI).

4. Pathways to Integration

There are numerous pathways toward the integration of the psychotherapies. The four most popular routes are technical eclecticism, theoretical integration, change processes, and common factors. All four attempt to look beyond the confines of single theories, but they do so in rather different ways and at different levels.

Technical eclecticism is the least theoretical of the four, but should not be construed as either atheoretical or antitheoretical (Lazarus et al. 1992). Eclecticism seeks to improve our ability to select the best treatment based primarily on the evidence of what has worked for others in the past with similar problems and similar characteristics. Proponents of technical eclecticism use procedures drawn from different sources without necessarily subscribing to the theories that spawned them (see Eclectic Psychotherapy: Psychological Perspectives).

In theoretical integration, two or more therapies are synthesized in the hope that the result will be better than the constituent therapies alone. This entails a commitment, as the name implies, to a conceptual or theoretical creation beyond a technical blend of methods. The various proposals to integrate psychoanalytic and behavioral theories, such as the influential work of Wachtel (1977), illustrate this path, as do the grander schemes to meld the major systems of psychotherapy, such as the transtheoretical approach of Prochaska and DiClemente (1984).

A level of abstraction down from theory is that of the change process or change strategy. This intermediate level of abstraction between global theory and specific techniques is a heuristic that implicitly guides the efforts of experienced therapists and that is increasingly guiding the teaching of psychotherapy. Instead of smushing theories fraught with epistemological incompatibilities on the one hand, or melding techniques without an overarching theory on the other, proponents of change processes suggest this intermediate level as the ideal for conceptualizing effective behavior change (Goldfried 1980).

The fourth pathway to psychotherapy integration is the common factors approach, which seeks to determine the core ingredients that different therapies share in common, with the eventual goal of creating more parsimonious and efficacious treatments based on those commonalties. This search is predicated on the belief that commonalties are more important in accounting for therapy outcome than the unique factors that differentiate among them, as eloquently maintained by Frank (1973). Literature reviews have discovered that the most consensual commonalties across theories are the development of a therapeutic alliance, opportunity for catharsis, acquisition, and practice of new behaviors, and clients' positive expectancies (Grencavage and Norcross 1990).

Integration, as is now clear, comes in many guises and manifestations. It is neither a monolithic entity nor a single operationalized system; to refer to the integrative approach is simply a fallacy. At the same time, these multiple integrative pathways are not mutually exclusive. No technical eclectic can totally disregard theory, and no theoretical integrationist can ignore technique. Without some commonalities among different schools of therapy, theoretical integration would be impossible. And even the most ardent proponent of common factors cannot practice 'non-specifically' or 'commonly'; specific methods must be applied.

5. Future Directions

Psychotherapy integration is a vibrant international movement that has begun to make encouraging contributions to the field. Transtheoretical dialogue and cross-fertilization fostered by the integrative spirit have produced new ways of thinking about psychotherapy and researching behavior change. This closing section outlines five probable directions of the movement.

First and foremost, psychotherapy integration, in some guise, will likely emerge as the psychotherapeutic Zeitgeist. A dispassionate panel of psychotherapy experts, for example, portend its escalating popularity. Indeed, integrative and eclectic therapies were two of the four orientations (along with cognitive therapy and family systems therapy) predicted to expand the most in the future (Norcross and Freedheim 1992).

Second, integrationists will increasingly attend to the potential obstacles and tradeoffs of the process of integration. These will include establishing ambitious training programs and processes that ensure student competence in multiple theories and interventions, an unprecedented task in the history of psychotherapy; acknowledging the underlying epistemological and ontological differences embodied by the different theories of psychotherapies, which precludes facile integration; and addressing the language problem that confounds understanding of disparate jargons and, in some cases, leads to active avoidance of theoretical constructs.

A third direction for the integration movement is to document through outcome research the effectiveness of various integrative treatments. The empirical evidence supporting integration remains largely anecdotal and preliminary (Lambert 1992, Kazdin 1996, Wolfe and Goldfried 1988).

Fourth, psychotherapy integration will evolve past its initial step of widening therapeutic horizons and embracing multiple techniques and theories. The next step is to specifically know when and where to use these multiple techniques and theories in order to enhance therapeutic efficacy, a process also known as differential therapeutics or prescriptive matching. Psychotherapies will thus be matched to multiple client variables, including but not limited to diagnosis or problem.

In this matching process lies the fifth direction for psychotherapy integration: customizing the therapeutic relationship to the individual patient. While the historical emphasis has been on matching techniques to specific disorders, the integration movement is more and more committed to the prescriptive use of the therapeutic relationship. One way to conceptualize the issue, paralleling the notion of 'treatment of choice' in terms of techniques, is how clinicians determine the 'relationship of choice' in terms of interpersonal stances for individual clients. Again, this customization will occur on the basis of both diagnostic and cross-diagnostic considerations, such as the patient's treatment goals, arousal level, coping style, personality traits, and stage of change (Beutler and Clarkin 1990).

In this manner, the psychotherapy integration movement promises to be instrumental in customizing research-informed treatment methods and therapeutic relationships to individual patients and, in so doing, enhance the effectiveness, applicability, and efficiency of psychotherapy.

See also: Behavior Psychotherapy; Rational and Emotive; Constructivist Psychotherapies; Counseling and Psychotherapy; Ethnic and Cultural Differences; Experiential Psychotherapy; Feminist Psychotherapy; Group Psychotherapy, Clinical Psychology of; Interpersonal Psychotherapy; Person-centered Psychotherapy; Psychological Treatment Delivered Non-traditionally; Psychological Treatment, Effectiveness of; Psychological Treatments, Empirically Supported; Psychotherapy, Brief Psychodynamic; Psychotherapy Process Research

Bibliography

- Beutler L E, Clarkin J F 1990 Systemic Treatment Selection: Toward Targeted Therapeutic Interventions. Brunner/Mazel, New York
- Frank J D 1973 Persuasion and Healing, rev. edn. Johns Hopkins University Press, Baltimore, MD
- Goldfried M R 1980 Toward the delineation of therapeutic change principles. American Journal of Psychotherapy 35: 991-9
- Goldfried M R, Newman C 1992 A brief history of psychotherapy integration. In: Norcross J C, Goldfried M R (eds.) Handbook of Psychotherapy Integration. Basic Books, New York
- Grencavage L M, Norcross J C 1990 Where are the commonalities among the therapeutic common factors? Professional Psychology-Research and Practice 21: 372-8
- Kazdin A E 1996 Combined and multimodal treatments in child

- and adolescent psychotherapy: Issues, challenges, and research directions. Clinical Psychology: Science and Practice 3: 69–100
- Lambert M J 1992 Psychotherapy outcome research: Implications for integrative and eclectic therapists. In: Norcross J C, Goldfried M R (eds.) Handbook of Psychotherapy Integration. Basic Books, New York
- Lazarus A A, Beutler L E, Norcross J C 1992 The future of technical eclecticism. Psychotherapy 29: 11–20
- London P 1988 Metamorphosis in psychotherapy: Slouching toward integration. Journal of Integrative and Eclectic Psychotherapy 7: 3–12
- Norcross J C, Freedheim D K 1992 Into the future: Retrospect and prospect in psychotherapy. In: Freedheim D K (eds.) History of Psychotherapy. American Psychological Association, Washington, DC
- Norcross J C, Goldfried M R (eds.) 1992 Handbook of Psychotherapy Integration. Basic Books, New York
- Prochaska J O, DiClemente C C 1984 The Transtheoretical Approach: Crossing the Traditional Boundaries of Therapy. Dow Jones-Irwin, Homewood, IL
- Prochaska J O, Norcross J C 1999 Systems of Psychotherapy: A Transtheoretical Analysis, 4th edn. Brooks/Cole, Pacific Grove, CA
- Stricker G, Gold J R (eds.) 1993 Comprehensive Handbook of Psychotherapy Integration. Plenum, New York
- Wachtel P L 1977 Psychoanalysis and Behavior Therapy: Toward an Integration. Basic Books, New York
- Wolfe B E, Goldfried M R 1988 Research on psychotherapy integration: Recommendations and conclusions from an NIMH workshop. Journal of Consulting and Clinical Psychology 56: 448–51

J. C. Norcross

Psychotherapy: Legal Issues (United States)

1. The Term 'Legal Issues in Psychotherapy'

Legal issues in psychotherapy can be understood as the ways in which the law affects providers of mental health services (hereinafter, mental health professionals or MHPs, in all stages of their careers and in all aspects of their practices. This article discusses the importance of MHPs knowing the law, the laws pertaining to MHP business matters and responsibilities, and psychotherapy services that are affected by the law. While comprehensive, this article provides only a general introduction to the law from the perspective of the United States's legal system (for detail on the issues discussed herein see, Sales and Miller 2001; Sales et al. in preparation). The US experience has been seen as predictive of future trends in other countries (e.g., United Kingdom, Bell-Boule 1999). It also does not discuss the provision of forensic services, covered elsewhere in this volume (see Forensic Psychology; Expert Witness and the Legal System: Psychological Aspects; Courtroom Consultation: Psychology; Rehabilitation of the Offender; Treatment of the Repetitive Criminal Sex Offender: United States; Crime and Delinquency, Prevention of).

2. Importance of MHPs Knowing the Law

Despite the law's pervasive influence, most MHPs do not know about or understand most of the laws affecting the operation of their practices, their services and their clients. This is due in part to the difficulty of understanding legal terminology, and in accessing the many different and applicable sources of law. This state of affairs is unfortunate because MHPs may not gain the benefits that the law may provide to them or their clients, and they may not be able to fully meet their clients' needs (e.g., Rothstein 1997). In turn, legal knowledge can increase MHPs' capability for handling their clients' distress (e.g., Shuman and Smith 2000). For example, MHPs who obtain legal information are better equipped to facilitate the appointment of a guardian for an abused child or a legally incompetent person (Tor and Sales 1996), and can help correct distorted beliefs about what may happen during their legal proceedings.

Not knowing the law is also potentially harmful in an era of increasing professionalization and litigiousness (e.g., Stromberg et al. 1988). MHPs run the risk of liability for professional practice that the law designates as inappropriate (e.g., divulgence of certain professional information when the law specifies it as confidential, or for not divulging certain professional information that the law requires to be reported).

3. The Law Affecting MHPs Business Matters and Responsibilities

Before engaging in the practice of psychotherapy, MHPs need to attend to their business matters and responsibilities, including: ensuring that they are properly licensed, deciding on the form or structure of their business, and implementing procedures for dealing with financial matters and confidential client information. Some of these business issues arise during the course of a MHP's practice (e.g., release of confidential information). The law typically affects all of these business issues.

3.1 Legal Credentialing and Licensure to Practice

In the United States, specific statutory and administrative laws govern each of the licensed mental health professions (e.g., Hogan 1979). The law of credentialing and licensure to practice is typically organized by discipline (e.g., psychiatrists, psychiatric nurses, psychologists, subdoctoral and unlicensed psychologists, school psychologists, social workers, professional counselors, chemical dependency/substance awareness counselors, school counselors, marriage and family therapists, hypnotists, polygraph examiners).

These laws have a number of different functions. First, they establish licensing boards for MHP professions. In addition, some States have created overarching boards that have oversight of MHPs from all disciplines, in order to standardize practices across disciplines. In general, overarching and discipline-specific boards operate similarly. Second, the laws specify licensure qualifications (i.e., education, experience, testing of competence, good character), and procedures and exceptions to licensure (e.g., for those unlicensed MHPs who are supervised by a licensed MHP).

Finally, the laws regulate MHPs' conduct, and prescribe sanctions for violations. The regulation of practice generally specifies what a MHP can and cannot do. As to what MHPs can do, the law will typically define the permissible scope of practice for licensed professionals (e.g., conduct psychotherapy, dispense medications). As to what MHPs cannot do, the licensure law will describe the powers of the agency or board to investigate and adjudicate violations of the law, specify reasons for sanctioning those found in violation of the law, and provide penalties for sanctioned professionals.

3.2 Legally-defined Business Arrangements

MHPs can organize their practices in a number of different forms, many of which are subject to legal regulation (see Sales and Miller 2001). Sole proprietorships involve a MHP being the only owner of his or her mental health practice, and usually do not require a legal application for a special business form. Certain MHPs may form professional corporations that may offer certain tax, insurance, and other practice benefits but require following legal procedures.

More types of business forms exist for those MHPs who choose to work with other MHPs. When two or more people enter into a 'for-profit' agreement as co-owners, a partnership is formed. These partners agree to combine their resources in order to undertake projects that would be financially difficult for one person, and to share responsibility for each other's acts. Recent developments in the law of some States allow for limited liability partnerships or corporations, in which there are a number of limited partners or shareholders whose financial commitment and liability is limited. Finally, MHPs may form a nonprofit or not-for-profit organizations to provide mental health services, including education, research, and/or inpatient or outpatient therapy, in a community health center, private hospital, or other setting.

The structure and organization of MHPs' practices are also affected by the health care entity with which MHPs and their clients are affiliated. The law may control certain health care provider arrangements in the US (e.g., MHPs who work for managed care companies), and government-run health services in other countries (e.g., Great Britain) (see Adolescent Vulnerability and Psychological Interventions; Managed Care and Psychotherapy in the United States). For example, in the US, Health Maintenance Organizations (HMOs) provide services to patient-subscribers (an individual or group) in exchange for a predetermined fixed premium. The law encourages HMOs to provide persons with competitively priced, alternative healthcare delivery and requires HMOs to offer basic, comprehensive healthcare services. The law varies by State as to whether HMOs are also required to cover mental health services, and whether only certain professionals are allowed to provide services to HMOs.

The liability of HMOs is an area of the law currently in development, a matter of much controversy. An HMO can be sued, and possibly may be held liable, for harm caused by the acts of participating providers in the course of furnishing such services. Another potential source of liability may arise from an HMO's refusing to allow for certain services in a particular case (e.g., utilization review that result in patients not being admitted or treated, or being discharged early). This could be a particular problem for MHPs if HMO precertification reviewers refuse to approve hospitalization, and a distraught patient then assaults another or commits suicide.

3.3 Financial and Contractual Matters

There are economic and contractual components to the relationships of MHPs with their clients as well as with the entities that may pay for or reimburse them for services. These issues are raised when MHPs are forming a relationship with a client and/or third-party payor; considering which services to provide; wanting financial payment for their services; and doing their taxes.

Since the MHP-client relationship is economic and contractual as well as therapeutic, MHPs should prepare a formal written agreement in order to protect the rights and interests of both parties at the outset of services. The client has the right to receive confidential, competent, and appropriate services that are performed according to professional standards. In return, the MHP should receive the client's cooperation with the service's plan (e.g., treatment) and payment for services rendered. The written contract, therefore, should be drafted according to local laws and clearly establish (a) the fee structure; (b) policies regarding charges and payment (e.g., charges per session, charges for missed sessions); (c) the client's commitment to paying the MHP; (d) the nature and scope of services to be provided; and (e) the general rule of confidentiality and its exceptions (see Sect. 3.4).

Such contracts are made with the informed consent of the client. Informed consent should be obtained before administering mental health services, disclosing information concerning the client to a third party, or taking any other action that may impact the client. Informed consent basically involves the process of discussions between a MHP and a potential client that leads to an informed choice by the client. In general, informed consent has three major parts: (a) competency of the person to be able to consent to services; (b) disclosure by the MHP of relevant and material information concerning the nature and risks of the proposed professional services; and (c) consent that is voluntarily given to the MHP. Even if not legally defined, the components of informed consent are generally agreed upon (see, e.g., Kitamura et al. 1999 for a Japanese example). The failure to obtain informed consent can lead to legal liability for malpractice.

In general, when people voluntarily contract with a MHP to receive services, they have a right to receive the services that they pay for. Conversely, competent adults have the right to refuse treatment that they voluntarily sought. Legal issues become more complicated with regard to persons who are unable to consent to treatment. In some cases, a legally competent person can execute an advance directive that identifies his or her treatment wishes if she or he becomes incompetent, and specifies whom the healthcare proxy decision-maker should be during this period. If no advance directive exists, a court can appoint a guardian (substitute decision-maker) or guardian ad litem (guardian over a specific issue such as making treatment decisions) after the person has been determined to be legally incompetent to make treatment decisions.

Because it is increasingly common that clients do not pay MHPs directly for services, MHPs may be reimbursed by third party payors, such as insurance agencies or government agencies. As discussed above, third party payors can legally affect the nature and length of services that MHPs can provide. However, laws are changing to prohibit both reimbursement denial for mental health services in certain cases and disparity in coverage between mental and physical health services.

Finally, the law also affects how MHPs must calculate their income and deductions to pay their taxes. In the US, MHPs are allowed to deduct expenses only once they have begun employment as a professional. For example, they may deduct expenses from subsequent educational activities or courses that: (a) are actually related to their business; (b) help the MHPs maintain or meet minimum requirements of their jobs or performance; (c) involve improving or maintaining their individual skills; or (d) are required by law (e.g., continuing education requirements for licensure). The law is unsettled regarding deductions for personal psychotherapy and psychoanalysis. The general trend is to allow MHPs who receive mental health services themselves to deduct them as educational business expenses if the MHPs have begun their practice, and if it is a necessary part of their practice (e.g., because the experience improves their job skills).

3.4 Maintaining and Disclosing Information

The doctrine of confidentiality originated in professional ethics codes (see Psychotherapy: Ethical Issues). It was based on the belief that effective psychotherapy required a guarantee from the therapist that no information obtained in the course of patient evaluation or treatment would be given to others without the client's consent. Thus, any written or verbal information conveyed by the client to an MHP in the course of a professional relationship can be considered a confidential communication (DeKraai and Sales 1984).

Maintaining confidential client records is not only necessary for the conduct of a good and ethical psychotherapy practice, but licensure law generally requires it. The law may specify a minimum period of time for which records must be kept, and the necessary procedures to follow to maintain the confidentiality of client records. As a general rule, MHPs should take reasonable precautions (i.e., precautions that similar MHPs in your area would take) to protect patient records. These procedures typically ensure that the records are preserved in the case of MHP relocation, separation from a group practice, retirement, or death. MHPs, who generally own their records, are also legally required to make records available to their clients upon request. However, laws may vary as to whether the request needs to be in writing, if fees can be charged for the service (e.g., for time spent copying records), and if there are limits on what type of information and in what format the requested information can be provided.

However, MHPs' duty to maintain client confidentiality is not absolute. Thus, it is important that MHPs inform clients of the limits of confidentiality at the initiation of services. Several types of penalties may be imposed for violations of confidentiality. First, as noted above, licensure law provides that the Board may suspend or revoke the license of any person betraying professional confidences, or it may impose other penalties such as probation. The same offending actions may also subject the MHP to criminal penalties or a civil lawsuit by the client.

There are a number of threats to the privacy of psychotherapy, including exceptions to confidentiality and competing duties. The law may require MHPs to divulge confidential client information to legal authorities: (a) under search and seizure law, (b) according to a subpoena, and (c) if the client sues the MHP. Generally, confidentiality protections do not apply in legal proceedings unless a privileged communications law protects the information. Confidential information may also be disclosed to third parties if the client gives his or her written consent to a release of information.

Reporting laws impose a competing, affirmative duty on MHPs to disclose specific information obtained in therapy. These laws are based on the premise that the duty to maintain private information revealed in therapy is outweighed by society's need to protect the safety of its members, including the client. For example, confidential information may be divulged if the client presents a clear and imminent danger to himself or herself, and refuses to accept further appropriate treatment. Other laws that require confidential disclosures include dangerous person reporting laws, and child abuse reporting laws. While commentary on such reporting laws has been critical (e.g., laws are based on faulty premise that MHPs can accurately predict dangerousness; see Clinical Psychology: Validity of Judgment), research has not shown that the laws are antitherapeutic, and courts continue to uphold the laws.

4. MHPs Psychotherapy Services that Are Affected by the Law

Because MHPs provide psychotherapy services to a variety of individuals and groups with different needs in different settings, this section discusses how the law directly and indirectly affects MHPs' psychotherapy practices with certain populations.

4.1 Psychotherapy Services for Individuals with Special Needs

Individuals with special needs include people with mental illness, who abuse alcohol and other substances, with developmental disabilities, who receive treatment and care because they have been victims of domestic violence or other crimes, and those individuals who are incarcerated in jail or prison. Knowing the laws allows MHPs to provide clients with the services to which they are legally entitled.

First, US State law provides for the care of people with mental illness in a number of ways (e.g., Brakel et al. 1985). Some people may be eligible to receive inpatient and outpatient mental health services through their health care plans. The law also provides for voluntary civil admission and involuntary civil commitment of mentally ill persons to state operated facilities. Generally, voluntary commitment may be permitted for those people with a variety of mental, emotional, or personality disorders, while involuntary commitment is only authorized for those people who meet a set of more restrictive standards listed in the law (e.g., Perlin 1994). The law may explicitly favor voluntary treatment over involuntary commitment because involuntary commitment generates substantial costs, and involves a loss of liberty to the person being committed. In such cases, many legally-mandated procedures must be followed to ensure that the person's rights are protected. For example, regular or long-term commitment generally requires a petition for a court-ordered commitment, a court review of the petition, an order for commitment, and an appeals process. In addition, the committed patient has numerous rights during treatment, including the rights to be free from excessive or unnecessary medication, and to not be subjected to certain procedures (e.g., experimental research; shock treatment) without informed consent, and/or a court order. MHPs can evaluate the person for admission and provide therapeutic services within the facility.

The law also provides for the voluntary treatment and involuntary commitment of those persons who are seriously disabled by alcoholism, and/or those persons with major substance abuse problems (i.e., drug-dependent persons or addicts). The law in many areas has changed from a punitive model to a continuum of care model, involving treatment and accountability (e.g., drug treatment courts). MHPs may be part of a multidisciplinary evaluation and treatment team under these laws, and may provide services (see Relapse Prevention Training; Alcoholics Anonymous; Psychotherapy Process Research; Substance Abuse in Adolescents, Prevention of) in a variety of settings (inpatient, outpatient, residential).

Third, the law recognizes that people with developmental disabilities (DD) have the capacity to be productive citizens, many of whom can achieve at least some or complete independence (e.g., Stefan 2000). Thus, some laws specifically provide for and protect rights of people with DD, including the rights to be given a nutritionally-adequate diet, and regular and sufficient medical care, and to not be physically or chemically restrained or isolated, except under strict regulations in emergency situations. Also, the law provides various inpatient and outpatient services (including evaluation and treatment by MHPs) for such persons (see Mental Retardation: Clinical Aspects; Autistic Disorder: Psychological). However, because such services are often not required, the provision of services is heavily dependent on available funding, and upon a government's commitment to provide a certain level of services.

Fourth, some laws provide services, including those of MHPs, for victims of crimes, including the crime of domestic violence. For example, Victim Assistance Boards and Victim-Witness programs help victims put their lives back in order after the crime, and help them to testify at trial. Beyond counseling abused partners, MHPs may also become involved in these cases by identifying an abusive or battering relationship. MHPs can encourage victims to obtain legal orders to stop the abuse, and help clients to develop safety plans for their and their children's safety (see Childhood Sexual Abuse and Risk for Adult Psychopathology).

Finally, some laws support and require mental health services in jails and prisons because they are recognized as a vital part of the overall healthcare program for incarcerated persons. While MHPs may provide services as employees or consultants to these institutions, very little law specifically governs their activities. In some States, the law provides specialized services for sex offenders as part of their sentence, or through a more controversial, and more regulated, civil commitment treatment program. Some States require sex offender evaluation and treatment providers to be certified and to be subject to standards of professional conduct unique to the certification (see Treatment of the Repetitive Criminal Sex Offender: United States; Sex Offenders, Clinical Psychology of).

4.2 Psychotherapy Services with Children and Families

MHPs who work with children and families often find themselves courted by the legal system to aid it in administration, as when they provide evaluations and psychotherapy to court-referred juveniles and adults. Juvenile and adult clients can be referred for treatment either before trial to evaluate and/or restore their ability to participate in the process (e.g., competency to stand trial), or after trial/adjudication as part of their disposition (e.g., juvenile determined to be delinquent/in need of supervision and services) (see Transportation, Psychology of; Rehabilitation of the Offender; Psychotherapy: Clinical Practice Guidelines; Conduct Disorder). Court cases can also clarify laws and regulations regarding the psychotherapeutic, educational, and other services which children (especially those who are disabled, gifted and talented, in need of guardianship/conservatorship, or in foster care or government custody) should be receiving.

Finally, MHPs find themselves indirectly affected by the law when their child and family clients become involved in legal entanglements that involve mental status issues (see generally, DeKraai et al., 1998), such as proceedings that concern the termination of marriage or parental rights. For example, legal child custody arrangements can affect not only the therapeutic needs of the child (see, Psychological Therapies: Emotional Processing; Childhood Depression; Clinical Assessment: Interview Methods) and adult (see Anxiety Disorder in Children) family members, but also the procedures that the psychotherapist must follow (e.g., the law may determine whether the MHP can evaluate and treat children at the request of a non-custodial parent).

5. Future Legal Developments

Despite the complexity of current legal regulations relating to psychotherapeutic practice, the law will continue to grow and change for a number of reasons. First, no longer do consumers unquestioningly accept MHP recommendations about treatment, or MHP assertions about the causes for unfavorable or unexpected treatment effects. Consumers are beginning to view psychotherapeutic services as similar to many other business arrangements. They want providers to be accountable for their work, and are no longer afraid to ask the courts and legislatures to impose new legal oversight and obligations to protect consumer interests. Second, increased legal regulation is likely to occur because many societies continue to fear, or at least stigmatize (e.g., Perlin 2000), the consumers of psychotherapeutic services. These perceptions will continue to fuel increased legal supervision of mental health services, which will likely be intrusive to the psychotherapeutic process.

Third, with MHP disciplines continuing to evolve, and as consumer concerns over cost-effectiveness in health care increase, new forms of practice are emerging both within and across disciplines. The inevitable result is the need for more laws to regulate these new forms of business practice and the unexpected consequences that sometimes ensue from them. Finally, because lawmakers are constantly looking for better ways to respond to societal needs (e.g., violent juvenile crime), we will continue to see new civil and criminal laws that partially rely on the services of MHPs. Each law brings new opportunities, requirements, and obligations for practitioners. What all this means for MHPs is that there will be increasing pressure on them to become conversant with the laws that affect both their practices and the consumers of their services

See also: Health Care: Legal Issues; Socioeconomic Status and Health Care

Bibliography

Bell-Boule A 1999 Psychotherapy and the law. International Journal of Psychotherapy 4(2): 193-203

- Brakel S, Parry J, Weiner B 1985 The Mentally Disabled and the Law. The American Bar Foundation, Chicago
- DeKraai M, Sales B 1984 Confidential communications of psychotherapists. Psychotherapy 21: 293–318
- Dekraai M, Sales B, Hall S 1998 Informed consent, confidentiality, and duty to report laws in the conduct of child therapy. In: Kratochwill T, Morris R (eds.) The Practice of Child Therapy, 3rd edn. Allyn and Bacon, Boston, pp. 540–59
- Hogan D 1979 The Regulation of Psychotherapists, Vols. 1–4). Ballinger Publishing, Cambridge, MA
- Kitamura T, Kitamura F, Mitsuhashi T, Ito A, Okazaki Y, Okuda N, Katoh H 1999 Image of psychiatric patients' competency to consent to treatment in Japan: I. A factor analytic study. International Journal of Law and Psychiatry 22(1): 45–54
- Perlin M 1994 Law and Mental Disability. Michie Law Publishers, Charlottesville, VA
- Perlin M 2000 The Hidden Prejudice: Mental Disability on Trial. American Psychological Association, Washington, DC
- Rothstein L 1997 Disabilities and the Law, 2nd edn. West Group, St. Paul, MN
- Sales B D, Miller M O (series eds.) 2001 Law and Mental Health, Professionals Series. American Psychological Association Books, Washington, DC [A series of volumes that comprehensively reviews and integrates the law that affects mental health professionals in the United States. <<http://www.apa.org/books/lmhptest.html>>]
- Sales B, Miller M, Hall S (in preparation) Clinical Practice Law. American Psychological Association, Washington, DC
- Shuman D, Smith A 2000 Justice and the Prosecution of Old Crimes: Balancing Legal, Psychological, and Moral Concerns. American Psychological Association, Washington, DC
- Stefan S 2000 Unequal Rights: Discrimination Against People With Mental Disabilities and the Americans with Disabilities Act. American Psychological Association, Washington, DC
- Stromberg, C, Haggarty D, Leibenluft R, McMillian M, Mishkin B, Rubin B, Trilling H 1988 The Psychologist's Legal Handbook. The Council for the National Register of Health Service Providers in Psychology, Washington, DC
- Tor P, Sales B 1996 Guardianship for incapacitated persons. In: Sales B, Shuman D (eds.) Law, Mental Health, and Mental Disorder. Brooks/Cole Publishers, Pacific Grove, CA, pp. 202–18

S. R. Hall and B. D. Sales

Psychotherapy Process Research

Psychotherapy process research is the scientific study of what happens in psychotherapy. It involves the precise, systematic, and controlled observation and analysis of the events that constitute psychotherapy. The basic elements of psychotherapy are simple—a patient, the distress or illness experienced by the patient, a therapist, and the treatment that the therapist provides—but psychotherapy occurs in a wide variety of forms and settings, involves a wide diversity of practitioners, and is conducted according to widely divergent theories about the causes and cures of psychological illness and distress. Since psychotherapy process research takes all these variations as its subject, a brief overview of the field it studies may serve as an introduction.

1. Psychotherapy

The forms of psychotherapy most commonly include individual therapy (one therapist with one patient), couple therapy (one therapist with two married or emotionally committed patients), family therapy (one or more therapists with members of a multigenerational family), and group therapy (one or two therapists with several patients who were previously strangers).

The settings in which psychotherapy is practiced include community mental health centers, private professional offices, university or college counseling centers, inpatient or outpatient psychiatric facilities, social work agencies, specialized schools, correctional facilities, consulting firms, and church-affiliated counseling programs.

The practitioners of psychotherapy are not members of a single profession, but instead are individuals who have typically been trained in one of the following professions: psychiatry, clinical or counseling psychology, clinical social work, psychiatric nursing, marital counseling or other counseling specialties, or the religious ministry. The level of involvement of different professions in psychotherapeutic practice, and their relative standing, varies from country to country.

Psychotherapeutic practitioners also differ in terms of the theoretical models they use to guide their work with patients. Broadly, these include analytic and psychodynamic theories, behavioral theories, cognitive and cognitive-behavioral theories, experiential and humanistic, and systemic or family-systems theory. Traditionally, these theories have formed the bases for rival 'schools' of psychotherapy. More recently, many therapists have adopted an eclectic or integrative attitude, seeking to broaden their effectiveness by combining the strengths of several models.

According to the theory followed, the treatment setting and format, and the professional identity of the therapist, these varied mental health practices may be known as psychotherapy, therapeutic counseling, psychoanalysis, behavior modification, personal training, growth facilitation, or some other term. Their practitioners may be referred to as psychotherapists, counselors, psychoanalysts, or simply by the name of the profession in which they were trained (e.g., psychologist, psychiatrist, social worker). The persons who seek help from these practitioners may be called patients, clients, counselees, or analysands. For simplicity in discussion, I refer to all those treatments as psychotherapies, to the persons who practice them as psychotherapists, and to the persons who experience them as patients.

2. Psychotherapy Research

Scientific research on the psychotherapies emerged as a field of inquiry in the middle of the twentieth century, following World War II, through the work of teams led by investigators such as C. Rogers, J. Frank, D. Shakow, M. Lorr, and others (Freedheim 1992, Chaps. 9–12, Russell 1994, Chap. 7). In this field, a distinction soon grew up between studies that focused mainly on treatment effectiveness, or the impact of therapy on patients, which were called ‘outcome’ research, and studies concerned primarily with the interactions of patients and therapists during the course of therapy, which were called ‘process’ research. Even from the outset, however, some studies included measures both of process and outcome, and in the years that followed process–outcome research has continued to be a vital focus of inquiry (Orlinsky et al. 1994, Orlinsky and Howard 1986).

Although this simple distinction between process and outcome served adequately for three decades, an increasing volume and complexity of studies and findings led eventually to the proposal of more finely differentiated frameworks for research. Based on extensive reviews of process–outcome, one of these (Orlinsky and Howard 1986) offered an overview of the field based on two distinctions: first, between therapeutic process (the observable events of psychotherapy) and its functional contexts (the social, cultural, and psychological circumstances in which therapy takes place); second, between context states that exist before and after the process events being studied, which influence and are influenced by them.

The influences of prior contextual states on events in therapy constitute determinants of therapeutic process. These would include, most immediately, the personal problems and psychological characteristics of the patient, and the therapeutic model, professional skills, and personal characteristics of the therapist. However, they also (if indirectly) include the organizational characteristics of the treatment setting, the nature and state of the mental health service delivery system, current societal pressures and stressors, and prevailing cultural standards of individual effectiveness, maturity, and well-being.

The reciprocal impacts of therapeutic events on subsequent contextual conditions comprise the consequences of therapeutic process. Researchers have been most directly concerned with the impacts of therapeutic events on the patient’s life and personality (i.e., clinical ‘outcome’). However, this broader framework also directs attention to the impact of therapeutic events on the professional and personal life of the therapist, and to the aggregate influence of patients’ and therapists’ experiences on cultural values and social institutions.

Between the contextual determinants of psychotherapy and its contextual consequences lies the set of psychological interactions and transformations that comprise the psychotherapeutic process. Researchers who would observe and analyze therapeutic process must, like photographers, first make a number of decisions about framing and focusing their studies. Framing a psychotherapy process study entails decisions about the location of the phenomenon (where to look), the temporal unit of observation (how long to look), and the observational perspectives to be employed (from which angle to look). Focusing the study involves making decisions about the facets and phases of therapeutic process to assess (which ‘variables’ or changes to measure).

3. Process Research Frames

3.1 Location

While therapeutic process may be defined abstractly in terms of psychological interactions and transformations, process researchers have differed over where, concretely, they can be best observed. Many researchers view therapeutic process as evidently consisting of the interactions and communications that take place between patient and therapist during the regular meetings in therapy sessions. On this view, therapeutic process includes all of the events that can be observed and recorded during therapy sessions. However, other researchers define therapeutic process in terms of the changes which patients undergo as they improve. This view directs observations primarily to the patient’s experience and activity in and outside of session, and regards much that occurs during therapy sessions as therapeutically inert or inessential. To distinguish them clearly, these contrasting but somewhat overlapping concepts will be referred to as therapy session processes and therapeutic change processes, respectively. Investigators who frame their studies in terms of session process generally take a descriptive, theoretically nonpartisan, approach to defining therapy. By comparison, investigators who frame their research in terms of change processes usually hold, and seek to test, some particular theoretical conception of therapy (e.g., Dahl et al. 1988, Rice and Greenberg 1984).

3.2 Temporal Units

The concept of process refer most generally to activities and events that proceed or evolve over time. However, some activities and events proceed or evolve so rapidly, or so slowly, that they normally cannot be noticed. Examples of the former are interactions that physicists observe among subatomic particles; or, more familiarly, the rapid projection of still photographs that we do not notice separately but experience sequentially as ‘moving’ pictures. Examples of the latter include the gradual cooling of romantic affairs into stable companionate relationships through years of shared routine; or, more remotely, the imperceptible erosion of mountains by millennia of wind and rain. The point is commonplace but basic and relevant.

Observations of process must be framed within the temporal span of human consciousness, but there is still a range of noticeable rates at which events occur. In observing therapeutic process, the researcher may choose to examine very brief events, like changes in facial expression or vocal intonation; or somewhat longer events, like the statement by one person of a coherent line of thought involving several sentences, or dialog between patient and therapist on a particular topic that includes successive statements by each; still longer events, like the quality of whole therapy sessions; or even longer events, like the opening, middle, and closing phases of an extended course of treatment. The temporal units or frames of reference that researchers select for study inevitably determine the kind of therapeutic events they can observe, and the descriptions of therapeutic process they give (Orlinsky et al. 1994, pp. 275–6).

3.3 Observational Perspectives

Any complex event can be viewed from several angles, and each observational perspective has the potential to reveal a different aspect of the event. In social interactions, including the interactive events of psychotherapy, the observational perspectives include those of the participants (called 'participant observers') and of immediate or remote bystanders (non-participant observers). In psychotherapy, there are two distinct participant observational perspectives, that of patients and that of therapists, who experience the events of therapy directly but from different vantage points. (The simplest case is that of individual therapies, which constitute the most frequent form of treatment; the same principle becomes more complex in practice when the treatment format includes more than one patient or more than one therapist, as in group or family therapies.)

To the patient's and therapist's natural observational perspectives, psychotherapy research has added that of nonparticipant observers by using clinical raters who are not part of the events being observed, and whose view of therapeutic process is generally mediated by audio or video recordings of therapy sessions or transcriptions of the verbal content of sessions. (Nonparticipant observations are sometimes also made by mechanical means, e.g., by using clocks to time speech durations.) Participant observers have a 'first hand' and 'inside' but also fleeting view of the events they experience. They have direct awareness of their own thoughts, feelings, and intentions, and immediate impressions of their own and others' behaviors, but these are typically organized around their goals in action. By contrast, nonparticipant observers just gain a 'second hand' knowledge of therapeutic process, and can only infer the covert internal states of the participants, but they have the advantage over participant observers of being able to review the recorded events many times, without the situational pressures to respond that participants experience.

Researchers may, and have, used one, two, or all of these observational perspectives in their studies, depending on their interests and the questions they investigate. However, since patients, therapists, and outside observers have different perspectives on the events of therapy, they are bound to see somewhat different aspects of process. It should not seem strange to researchers, or an indication of methodological weakness, if observers who view therapeutic phenomena from different perspectives sometimes produce discrepant observations, since those discrepancies may validly reflect the inherent complexity of social phenomena.

4. Process Research Focus

When undertaking a study of therapeutic process, researchers understand that they are dealing with a set of events that is too complex to be observed in its entirety, and must simplify the focus of the study if it is to be successful. However a study is framed in terms of session process or change process, temporal units, and observational perspectives, the researcher must focus its observations on a few specific facets of therapeutic process: the 'variables' that are to be qualitatively assessed or quantitatively measured. For the simplification to be meaningful, these variables must be defined in terms of some conceptual model of therapeutic process, and to be widely accepted by other researchers that model must be generally accepted within the research community.

4.1 Research Variables

Traditionally, the variables examined in psychotherapy process studies have been differentially defined according to whether they focus on the instrumental-adaptive (goal-directed, or task) aspect of therapist and patient behavior, or the social-emotional (expressive-interpersonal, or relational) aspect of therapist and patient behavior. Therapist instrumental or task-oriented behaviors involve the technical interventions, methods, or procedures that various clinical theories indicate therapists should employ to help patients. Research variables include the nature, timing, skillfulness, and appropriateness with which therapeutic techniques are used. Examples of specific technical interventions in psychoanalytic therapy are use of free associations to interpret dreams, interpretation of patient resistances, and transference interpretations. A typical therapist intervention in client-centered therapy would be empathic reflection of feeling; in behavioral therapy, relaxation training to assuage phobic anxiety; in gestalt therapy, the 'two-chair' technique to explore and resolve internal conflicts; and so on. Patient instrumental-adaptive or task-oriented variables generally focus on the patient's response to technical interventions, such as cooperativeness or resistance, as well as specific effects of interventions such as enhanced insight following an interpretation, deeper self-exploration and 'experiencing' in response to therapist empathy, or decreased anxiety when facing previously frightening stimuli as a result of relaxation training. Major research methods focused on instrument aspects of therapeutic process include those described in Greenberg and Pinsof (1986, Chaps. 2–8, 14).

A second traditional type of process variable that has been studied by psychotherapy researchers is defined in terms of the social-emotional or expressive-interpersonal aspect of the therapist and patient behavior, and their respective contributions to the formation and development of the therapeutic relationship (see Therapist–Patient Relationship). Relationship variables generally focus on the ways that patient and therapist feel and behave toward one another: the manner or style of their relating, complementary to the content of their interactions. Again, specific qualities of relationships have been emphasized by different theoretical orientations. Researchers influenced by psychoanalytic thought have focused on two issues related to the clinical concept of transference: core-conflictual themes in relationships and therapeutic alliance. Others, influenced by client-centered theory, have focused on therapist-offered relationship conditions such as genuineness, empathy, and positive regard. Social psychological theories of interpersonal behavior have provided another conceptual approach to research on relationships, emphasizing the reciprocal influences between patient and therapist, focusing on dimensions of behavior such as acceptance vs. rejection and control vs. autonomy. Useful research methods for studying therapeutic relationships are described by their proponents in Greenberg and Pinsof (1986, Chaps. 9–12, 15).

A more detailed, systematic classification that has emerged from repeated reviews of the research literature relating process to outcome (Orlinsky et al. 1994) distinguishes the following categories of process variables: therapeutic contract, therapeutic operations, therapeutic bond, participant self-relatedness, in-session impacts, and sequential flow. These are aspects of process that can be observed simultaneously in any unit of process, viewed from any observational perspective.

The therapeutic contract includes variables indicating the goals, tasks, and norms of patient and therapist roles, as defined by the therapist's treatment model; the number and qualifications of persons occupying each role; and the terms, setting, and schedule of their meetings. Therapeutic operations refer to the specific instrumental actions that patients and therapists perform in implementing the therapeutic contract, including the patient's presentation of a problematic condition (e.g., symptoms), the therapist's expert understanding of that condition (diagnosis), the therapist's ameliorative interventions (techniques), and the patient's response to those interventions (e.g., cooperation). The therapeutic bond is the personal connection that develops between the participants in therapy as they perform their respective roles as patient or therapist more or less in accordance with their therapeutic contract: their 'personal compatibility' (mutual feelings, and expressive attunement or rapport), and their 'teamwork capacity' (personal commitment to their roles, and interactive co-ordination). Participant self-relatedness reflects the intrapersonal aspect of patients' and therapists' involvement in the therapeutic process, including variables of self-awareness (e.g., openness vs. defensiveness), self-efficacy (e.g., confidence vs. embarrassment), and self-control (e.g., expressiveness vs. constriction). The in-session impact of these interdependent and reciprocally influential aspects of therapeutic process consists of the patient's 'therapeutic realizations' (e.g., hope, relief, understanding, courage) as well as the therapist's reinforcements (satisfactions and frustrations). The sequential flow of these process aspects within the therapy hour is indicated by variables reflecting session development, and the flow over longer periods of time is indicated by variables reflecting the course of treatment.

4.2 Research Methods

The events of psychotherapy occur in a series of meetings between patient and therapist called therapy sessions. The most directly observable aspects of those events consist of conversation. In some types of therapy, conversation may be supplemented by inviting patients to engage in certain activities or exercises designed to provide significant learning or corrective emotional experiences for the patient. Given the prominence of verbal and nonverbal communications, researchers have relied heavily on audio and video tapes of therapy sessions to record the events of therapy. Recording and replay technology have provided investigators with voluminous records for detailed examination from an external or nonparticipant observational perspective, but have also constrained them to concentrate on temporal units that have generally been briefer than whole sessions, and sometimes no longer than one complete statement or interchange between a patient or therapist. Examples of relevant methods can be found in Greenberg and Pinsof (1986, Chaps. 2–8).

But conversation is just the outward side of therapeutic events. The inner side of process is comprised of patients' and therapists' experiences of themselves and one another during their sessions, and during the imagined conversations or fantasy interactions that they may have in the times between sessions (e.g., Greenberg and Pinsof 1986, Chap. 13). This aspect of therapeutic process has been studied mainly through the use of postsession questionnaires. These retrospective ratings utilize the participant observational perspectives of patients and therapists to provide research data, and necessarily take the whole session as the temporal unit of observation.

Chapters providing further discussion of process research methods can be found in Bergin and Garfield (1994), Greenberg and Pinsof (1986), Horvath and Greenberg (1994), Kiesler (1973), and Russell (1994).

5. Main Process–Outcome Findings

A half century of research on psychotherapy has cumulatively demonstrated that qualities of the therapeutic bond or relationship, observed during the course of therapy from varied observational perspectives, robustly predict treatment outcomes as assessed by patients, therapists, clinical judges, and psychometric measures, although there is still some debate about whether these relationship qualities produce that outcome or merely reflect its on-going attainment. Global ratings of relationship quality are demonstrably linked to outcome from all observational perspectives. In terms of specific relationship qualities, therapists are better able to distinguish the patient's contribution to therapeutic process, whereas patient as well as therapist process contributions are associated with outcome from the distinct observational perspectives of patients, clinical judges, and psychometric measures. The patient's personal investment, collaborativeness, expressiveness, emotional responsiveness, and positive feelings towards the therapist are particularly important, as is the therapist's empathy and credibility. This has led to a widespread view of the therapeutic bond or alliance as the most salient aspect of therapeutic process, and the 'common factor' that enables different types of psychotherapy to be more or less equivalent in effectiveness.

With regard to therapeutic operations, some types of technical interventions, when skillfully focused on patients' life problems, have also been shown persuasively to be associated with positive outcomes (e.g., interpretation, experiential confrontation, and paradoxical intention), although this too is evident from the observational perspectives of patients and clinical judges rather than therapists. In terms of participant self-relatedness, assessments of patient openness (vs. defensiveness) have been very consistently associated with outcome, from all observational perspectives. Likewise, patients' positive in-session impacts ('therapeutic realizations') have consistently been found to predict positive treatment outcomes.

6. Process Research and Practice

Psychotherapy process research thus far has proven itself a scientifically successful field of inquiry. Initially, it had to overcome an exclusion rule, stated by Freud (1953, p.185), that 'the "analytic situation" allows the presence of no third party. ... An unauthorized listener who hit upon a chance one of them would as a rule form no useful impression; he would be in danger of not understanding what was passing between the analyst and the patient.' Thus in the earliest days, investigators were mainly concerned to demonstrate the feasibility of systematic and methodologically objective research on therapeutic process. Once that had been established (e.g., Rogers and Dymond 1954), another 15 years or so were devoted primarily to devising reliable measures and rigorous methods of process research, during which time some therapists who had taken an interest in the field were disappointed by the methodological preoccupations of researchers and the paucity of clinically applicable results (e.g., Talley et al. 1994, Chaps. 2, 4, 5). However, the rate of research on process and process–outcome patterns increased steadily from about 1970 onwards. As the 1990s approached, a considerable body of well-replicated findings had been amassed, from which implications for therapeutic practice could begin to be drawn (e.g., Talley et al. 1994, Chap. 6). Current pressures for accountability and quality assurance from managed care have forced therapists of all schools to become interested in outcome research, in order to demonstrate the effectiveness of their treatments. Yet the knowledge that most psychotherapists have of process and process–outcome research findings lags behind the times. As progress in process research continues, a major challenge will be to increase clinical awareness of the relevance and potential usefulness of these research findings.

See also: Assessment and Application of Therapeutic Effectiveness, Ethical Implications of; Behavior Psychotherapy: Rational and Emotive; Behavior Therapy: Psychological Perspectives; Cognitive and Interpersonal Therapy: Psychiatric Aspects; Cognitive Therapy; Experiential Psychotherapy; Person-centered Psychotherapy; Psychological Treatment, Effectiveness of; Psychotherapy, Brief Psycho-dynamic; Psychotherapy: Case Study

Bibliography

- Bergin A E, Garfield S L (eds.) 1994 Handbook of Psychotherapy and Behavior Change, 4th edn. Wiley, New York
- Dahl H, Kaechele H, Thomae H (eds.) 1988 Psychoanalytic Process Research Strategies. Springer-Verlag, Berlin
- Freedheim D K (ed.) 1992 History of Psychotherapy: A Century of Change. American Psychological Association Press, Washington DC
- Freud S 1953 The question of lay analysis. In: Strachey A (ed.) The Standard Edition of the Complete Psychological Works of Sigmund Freud. Hogarth Press and the Institute of Psychoanalysis, London, Vol. 20
- Greenberg L S, Pinsof W M (eds.) 1986 The Psychotherapeutic Process: A Research Handbook. Guilford, New York
- Horvath A O, Greenberg L S (eds.) 1994 The Working Alliance: Theory, Research, and Practice. Wiley, New York
- Kiesler D J (ed.) 1973 The Process of Psychotherapy: Empirical Foundations and Systems of Analysis. Aldine, Chicago
- Orlinsky D E, Grawe K, Parks B K 1994 Process and outcome in psychotherapy—noch einmal. In: Bergin A E, Garfield S L (eds.) Handbook of Psychotherapy and Behavior Change, 4th edn. Wiley, New York
- Orlinsky D E, Howard K I 1986 Process and outcome in psychotherapy. In: Garfield S L, Bergin A E (eds.) Handbook of Psychotherapy and Behavior Change, 3rd edn. Wiley, New York
- Rice L N, Greenberg L S 1984 Patterns of Change: Intensive Analysis of Psychotherapy Process. Guilford, New York
- Rogers C R, Dymond R F (eds.) 1954 Psychotherapy and Personality Change. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
- Russell R L (ed.) 1994 Reassessing Psychotherapy Research. Guilford, New York
- Talley P F, Strupp H H, Butler S F (eds.) 1994 Psychotherapy Research and Practice: Bridging the Gap. Basic Books, New York

D. E. Orlinsky

Puberty, Psychosocial Correlates of

1. Introduction

This article aims to review recent research on the ways in which the biological changes of puberty influence and are influenced by the social and psychological contexts in which young people live and develop. While the biology of puberty has presumably been relatively constant since the emergence of Homo sapiens, the context in which young people are developing has changed dramatically. The evidence for these effects and interactions will be briefly reviewed, with some attention to the processes thought to be involved. It is important to note that almost all of this research is descriptive and correlational rather than experimental, although more work is being done with animal models to clarify causal explanations.

The phrase 'pubertal youth' is likely to evoke images of a group of children at least some of whom are beginning to show manifestations of physical maturity in terms of adult size and shape. Similarly, 'pubertal behavior' would conjure images related to interest in the other sex. A photograph often used in textbooks on adolescence in which somewhat taller girls are paired as dancing partners with later-developing boys depicts both 'pubertal youth' and 'pubertal behavior.' That some youngsters depicted in the photograph do not yet show physical changes of puberty demonstrates that some will engage in 'pubertal behavior' for social reasons. Further, the probabilistic nature of any complex developmental process implies that what generally occurs in a cohort of youngsters will not apply to some individuals.

The psychosocial correlates of puberty, together with the biological process of puberty itself, are usually considered to be a single biopsychosocial process (that is, a process involving biological, psychological, and social aspects) in development. In this encyclopedia, 'puberty' is used to refer to the biological aspects of the process rather than the biopsychosocial process. In this article, psychosocial correlates will be considered in two ways: (a) those that appear to influence the timing or nature of the biological process and (b) those that appear to be results or effects of the process. The term 'behavioral' will be used for both kinds of psychosocial correlates. It is assumed that influences from the social context (including structural influences) have effects through behavior.

2. Behavioral Influences on Puberty

2.1 Influences on Pubertal Timing

There is evidence that several behavioral influences affect the timing of puberty, with some altering physical appearance. These include eating behavior, exercise, stress, and sexual behavior. Starvation and other extreme stress may prevent the pubertal process from ensuing, presumably to prevent reproductive capacity in an organism unable to sustain it. Limited nutritional intake along with high physical demands on the body result in a delay of pubertal onset. For example, puberty is delayed by 1–2 years in ballet dancers, figure skaters, and gymnasts who practice intensely and restrict eating. Because prepubertal growth of the long bones continues, these youngsters may have longer limbs than would otherwise be the case (Eveleth and Tanner 1990).

Recent hypotheses have linked familial stress to acceleration or delay of puberty. For example, evolutionary theory is used to posit that children of parents under high stress will engage in behavior that will speed their exit from the family (Belsky et al. 1991). Parents under high family stress will engage in insensitive, inconsistent, and affectively negative parental care. Young children in this circumstance then develop insecure attachments to parents and an opportunistic style of interacting with others. These children are more likely to develop behavior problems such as aggression or social withdrawal in childhood and risky sex or substance use behaviors in adolescence. While the exact process linking family relationships to pubertal timing has not been identified, it is argued that earlier pubertal timing is adaptive in this circumstance.

Delay of puberty has also been proposed to result from stressful family contexts. In this hypothesis, environmental stress increases adrenal hormones (i.e., the hypothalamic–pituitary–adrenal axis) which inhibit sex steroids (i.e., the hypothalamic–pituitary–gonadal axis) (Malo and Tremblay 1997). Research supporting this hypothesis has found that families with paternal alcoholism or with negative emotions expressed by parents were more likely also to have sons with delayed puberty. The presumptive mechanism is a stress response in the sons that interferes with hormonal mechanism for initiating puberty resulting in delayed pubertal onset.

Another line of work links prepubertal sexual abuse to earlier puberty (Trickett and Putnam 1993). The underlying mechanism may be pheromones that trigger pubertal onset, or some other triggering mechanism related to the stimulating effects of sexual contact.

This work is all relatively new and more work is needed to refine understanding of precipitating factors and mechanisms. It is possible that behavioral influences operating directly on the gonadal system accelerate pubertal onset whereas those that operate primarily through the adrenal system delay puberty. However, at this point there is no definitive research to clarify why some stressors accelerate while others delay pubertal onset.

In any case, it is clear that even timing of pubertal onset, an aspect of puberty with strong evidence of genetic influence, can be affected by behavior within the social contexts in which young people live and develop.

2.2 Influences on Other Aspects of Puberty

The example of exercise above is one in which effects have been seen on the adult shape that results from pubertal growth, in addition to delaying pubertal onset. Young ballet dancers who train many hours a day develop longer limbs—both arms and legs—compared with sisters and mothers. A similar effect has been observed among swimmers. While there surely are selection effects confounding the results for these elite athletes, the comparison with other family members provides some degree of control.

Although there are likely to be other examples of effects of behavior on pubertal outcomes, effects on gross aspects of physical development are easiest to attribute. Even here, though, there is the continuing confound of experience during development that makes causal attribution to pubertal change more difficult to establish. For example, different shapes surely result from different eating patterns (e.g., overeating versus undereating), but in this discussion of puberty the focus is on those outcomes that are pubertal rather than those that would occur at any point in development. As complicated as these issues become with physical attributes, they are even more complicated with psychological or social outcomes.

One effect of context on puberty should be mentioned. The increased life span and generally better health and nutrition of many people today have led to an earlier age at puberty, clearly among more developed nations in the world and increasingly among developing nations (Garn 1992). This changes the context for puberty in that it occurs in otherwise less mature organisms. Some had thought that all aspects of development might proceed in concert, so that earlier puberty would be accompanied by earlier cognitive, psychological, and social development. This does not appear to be the case, probably because of the experience or training (sometimes called socialization) needed to become a mature human. Given the existence of psychologically or socially immature adults, we should not be surprised about physically mature but otherwise immature adolescents.

The fact that puberty occurs a few years earlier now than even in the mid-1900s, and is now closer to 10 years of age among girls than to 20 years as was more typical around 1900, has tremendous significance for our understanding of and also the experience of childhood. Biological maturity permitting procreation occurs at ages much earlier than those typically considered appropriate for taking on adult work and family roles. Most societies have not adjusted to this disjunction, either to protect children from becoming parents too early or to change socialization practices and social institutions to support earlier entry into adult roles. Instead, some societies have blamed the victim in this situation, suggesting that early child-bearing represents a moral failure on the part of the child or their families.

3. Pubertal Influences on Behavior

As with the earlier discussion of effects on puberty, pubertal timing is much more important than are other aspects of pubertal change as a factor influencing behavior. Both kinds of effects will be summarized.

3.1 Pubertal Timing Effects

Three hypotheses or models have been proposed for pubertal timing effects on psychosocial adjustment, the outcomes that have been the focus of most research: the stage termination hypothesis, the deviance hypothesis, and the goodness-of-fit hypothesis (Petersen and Taylor 1980, Alsacker 1995). The stage termination hypothesis places pubertal change within the context of other developmental stages, and suggests that early puberty could cause premature termination of prepubertal development. The deviance hypothesis suggests that negative effects could accrue from being deviant for one's age and gender, as with earlier-developing girls and later-developing boys. The goodness-of-fit hypothesis posits that negative effects will result when the social context differs from the individual's developmental status, as with an aspiring dancer who may be developing on time but producing a body shape different from the prepubertal one valued for dance. There is some support for each of these hypotheses, although developmental stage has receded in importance as a psychological construct.

3.1.1 Body image. Early-developing girls tend to have poorer body images during adolescence, with increasing effects by the end of the adolescent decade, compared with girls developing later or on time relative to their peers. In contrast, early-developing boys had the most positive body image in early adolescence, with effects diminishing over adolescence (Graber et al. 1996). Although body dissatisfaction is most strongly related to short stature among boys and heavier weight among girls, preference for body types has a strong cultural component, with variations seen cross culturally (Silbereisen et al. 1989).

3.1.2 Internalizing behaviors. Early-developing girls and, to some extent, late-developing boys appear to be more vulnerable to a range of mental health indicators, including internalizing problems (e.g., depression, phobic disorders) (Graber et al. 1997). Research has also shown that pubertal timing effects can be compounded by other life changes occurring at around the same time, such as change to a new school context (Petersen et al. 1991).

3.1.3 Externalizing behaviors. Earlier pubertal timing among both boys and girls is related to more problems with externalizing behaviors (e.g., aggression, delinquency). This is a strong effect from almost all the studies of problem behavior, including substance use and abuse, with effects found on lifetime rates of substance dependence and disruptive behavior disorders (Graber et al. 1997). There is some evidence that this pubertal timing effect is especially strong when early developers begin associating with older peers.

3.1.4 Sexual behaviors. Recent research studying hormones, pubertal timing, and sexual behavior demonstrates that for boys high levels of testosterone represent a marker for early puberty, and lead to earlier sexual behavior. For girls, high levels of testosterone also lead to earlier initiation of coitus but do not seem to be markers of early puberty. This research also demonstrates that social control (e.g., religious restriction of social behavior) can moderate biological effects (Halpern et al. 1997). Many other studies find that earlier developers are more likely to be sexually active, consistent with the pattern reported above for externalizing behaviors.

3.1.5 Summary of pubertal timing effects. For both body image and internalizing behaviors, the deviance hypothesis appears to predict the pattern of results; early-developing girls and, to some extent, late-developing boys are at greater risk of problems with these outcomes. For externalizing behaviors and sexual behavior, early development in both boys and girls leads to earlier and more extensive involvement in these behaviors. To the extent that these youngsters become involved with older peers, these results fit the goodness-of-fit hypothesis, but most studies find that early pubertal onset precedes peer choice. Hence, these results seem to suggest that a different model is operating, one more directly biological, although with social moderation of effects.

3.2 Pubertal Status Effects

As noted earlier, very few effects of pubertal status have been reported in the literature. The young person's stage of pubertal development seems to have little effect on behavior. The one area that is an exception is that of parent-child relationships. As the young person becomes pubertal, there is an increase in parent-child conflict and a decrease in warm interactions peaking midpuberty (or around the time of menarche for girls) and then declining (Paikoff and Brooks-Gunn 1991). The nature of conflict is mild bickering, frequently over chores or other expectations.

4. Conclusion

As this review demonstrates, becoming pubertal has modest significance for relationships with parents but otherwise has little consistent effect on behavior. Whether one becomes pubertal earlier or later than one's peers is of much greater significance. Deviant development relative to the group of same-aged peers—that is, early development for girls and late development for boys—is related to internalizing behaviors, or the way one feels about oneself. Early development for both boys and girls is related to problems with externalizing behavior, or the way one feels about others. The latter finding suggests that in this time of earlier puberty for youngsters generally, those who are even earlier are especially at risk. Early-developing girls are at risk for both internalizing and externalizing problems while early-developing boys are primarily at risk for externalizing problems.

In general, puberty constitutes an important change in a young person's life. The effects of developing adult size, shape, and reproductive potential are significant. Even more important to the developing individual, however, is the meaning of these changes for the society in which the young person is developing. If these biological changes signal marginality in the society, the impact on the individual is likely to be negative. In contrast, if these changes are welcomed and even celebrated, as was the case in many traditional societies in which puberty was celebrated with rites of passage into adult society, the impact on the individual is likely to be positive. Therefore, societies can choose to have more positive, constructive behavior among their young people, or they can increase the likelihood of negative and life-damaging behaviors among young people.

There is much yet to learn about effects on and effects of puberty. Recent advances in genetics and neuroscience provide tremendous opportunities to link these advances to understanding of development, especially at puberty. Equally important is research illuminating the effects of social and cultural contexts on biological processes such as puberty and the ways in which the biological process of puberty interacts with individual psychology and social context. Especially needed are studies that establish the generality of current findings, or the limits of their generalizability, with broader populations.

Policy efforts are needed to apply what we already know about puberty. There is a need for greater understanding, and recognition in policy and practice, of the fact that puberty is occurring significantly earlier now for young people than it did in the current generation of parents and grandparents. Different effects for boys and girls also require some broader attention in practice if not policy.

See also: Adolescence, Psychiatry of; Adolescence, Sociology of; Antisocial Behavior in Childhood and Adolescence; Childhood and Adolescence: Developmental Assets; Cognitive Development in Childhood and Adolescence; Identity in Childhood and Adolescence; Social Competence: Childhood and Adolescence; Socialization in Adolescence

Bibliography

- Alsacker F D 1995 Timing of puberty and reactions to pubertal changes. In: Rutter M (ed.) Psychosocial Disturbances in Young People: Challenges for Prevention. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK, pp. 37–82
- Belsky J, Steinberg L, Draper P 1991 Childhood experience, interpersonal development, and reproductive strategy: An evolutionary theory of socialization. Child Development 62: 647–70
- Eveleth P B, Tanner J M 1990 Worldwide Variation in Human Growth, 2nd edn. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Garn S M 1992 Physical growth and development. In: Friedman S B, Fisher M, Schonberg S K (eds.) Comprehensive Adolescent Health Care. Quality Medical Publishing, St. Louis, MO, pp. 18–23
- Graber J A, Lewinsohn P M, Seeley J R, Brooks-Gunn J 1997 Is psychopathology associated with the timing of pubertal development? Journal of the American Academy of Child and Adolescent Psychiatry 36: 1768–76
- Graber J A, Petersen A C, Brooks-Gunn J 1996 Pubertal processes: Methods, measures, and models. In: Graber J A, Brooks-Gunn J, Petersen A C (eds.) Transitions Through Adolescence: Interpersonal Domains and Context. Lawrence Erlbaum, Mahwah, NJ, pp. 23–53
- Halpern C T, Udry J R, Suchindran C 1997 Testosterone predicts initiation of coitus in adolescent females. Psychosomatic Medicine 59: 161–71
- Malo J, Tremblay R E 1997 The impact of paternal alcoholism and maternal social position on boys' school adjustment, pubertal maturation and sexual behavior: A test of two competing hypotheses. Journal of Child Psychology and Psychiatry 38: 187–97
- Paikoff R L, Brooks-Gunn J 1991 Do parent–child relationships change during puberty? Psychological Bulletin 110: 47–66
- Petersen A C, Sarigiani P A, Kennedy R E 1991 Adolescent depression: Why more girls? Journal of Youth and Adolescence 20: 247–71
- Petersen A C, Taylor B 1980 The biological approach to adolescence: Biological change and psychological adaptation. In: Adelson J (ed.) Handbook of Adolescent Psychology. Wiley, New York, pp. 117–55
- Silbereisen R K, Petersen A C, Albrecht H T, Kracke B 1989 Maturation timing and the development of problem behavior: Longitudinal studies in adolescence. Journal of Early Adolescence 9: 247–68
- Trickett P K, Putnam F W 1993 Impact of child sexual abuse on females: Toward a developmental, psychobiological integration. Psychological Science 4: 81–7

A. C. Petersen

Public Administration: Organizational Aspects

Public administration is the term used to define the formal procedural and organizational arrangements under which public employees serve a government, by implementing and advising on policy, and managing resources. Organizational aspects refer to both the overall structures and relationships within public administrations. This could include: The organizations that make up a civil service, sometimes referred to as the machinery of government; internal organizational arrangements; and/or organizational behavior. Thus, organizational aspects can be studied in a broad sense, or within several defined fields. This contribution covers organizational aspects, widely interpreted.

Beyond public administration as a discrete body of knowledge, organizational aspects can be examined further through other theories and practices relating to, for example, political science, public policy, sociology, economics, and management. In this sense, each area of study has its own theories and concepts. Furthermore, each state has its own history, organizational form, and approach, although there are many universal, common elements, which have developed through the international transfer of ideas. New governments, formal review processes, focused research, and events have often stimulated notable change. Therefore, the area of public administration is a difficult area to research, and over the years studies have been largely descriptive, rather than experimental or empirical.

For the purpose of this article, organizational aspects of public administration are examined as four phases of development and evolution, representing important paradigm shifts, or prospective shifts. These are the premodern, modern, postmodern, and virtual/supranational phases. Critical issues relating to the theories, models, trends, and practices of organizational aspects of public administration during these times are explored.

1. Premodern Public Administration, Organizational Aspects (Pre-1850s)

The organizational aspects of public administration have been apparent from ancient times, through many civilizations, such as Greek, Roman, and Chinese dynasties, and have often been the subject of criticism and analysis. Indeed, the ancient Greek satirist and playwright Aristophanes was probably one of the earliest in the literate world to highlight the lack of accountability and fairness in relation to public office. The works of ancient philosophers, such as Plato and Aristotle, address pertinent issues of interest in this regard.

Military histories over many years from the ancient Greeks and Romans to Machiavelli, to Frederick the Great, and to Napoleon provide further insights into the evolution of organizational aspects of public administration. For example, in the 1700s, in the context of militarism and empire building, the Prussian leader, Frederick the Great, and his successor, Frederic William III, structured an exemplary public administration. Furthermore, France's public administration, which had been evolving for centuries through constitutional reform following the French Revolution of 1789, was organized on the basis of similarly functioning districts, or départements. In the late 1700s to early 1800s, Napoleon oversaw the central appointment of officials charged with the administrative responsibility for the départements. He also developed bodies which undertook administrative review, and involved the separation of juridical and public administrative powers. The civil service was made up of a number of distinct corps supported by training schools.

In the context of royalty, an early patronage system of public administration developed in England, primarily, as a support function for the royal Anglo-Saxon courts. The later structuring of a distinct, centralized public administration was related to a concept of a parliamentary cabinet. Some senior government ministers had portfolio responsibilities and a small supporting staff. Separate departments eventually existed to provide administrative functions to the ministers in charge of the Treasury, the Exchequer, the Chancellery, and the State. Accountabilities of the ministers were divided, between the Parliament and the monarch. While ministers undertook many of the administrative duties because of a general lack of suitably qualified men [sic], a small, elite corps of public administrators was established with a resultant continuity of tenure from government to government. To a small extent, these public administrations served a legitimate purpose, but for the most part they existed to meet the needs and ends of the administrators themselves.

Some of the public administration ideas from Europe were also adopted in New World states. In the USA, in the context of a revolutionary federal constitution which came after the War of Independence, their early patronage system was based on political connections, rather than royalty or class. Not surprisingly, these arrangements meant that the administrative organizations of government became highly corrupted, as Woodrow Wilson observed (1887). The dissatisfaction with this type of system, and a promoted interest in reform processes, led to the eventual development of professional public administrations in many states.

1.1 Modern Public Administration, Organizational Aspects (1850s–1970s)

Organizational aspects of public administration continued to evolve because of constitutional and parliamentary reform processes and, in some cases, shifts from royal courts to representative governments. The industrial revolution, the rise of capitalism, and the new bourgeoisie all contributed to pressures for professional civil services. Thus, in modern times, organizational aspects of public administration have been based largely on the need for professionalism and have often come about because of administrative review.

In Britain, for example, the Northcote–Trevelyan Report (1853) recommended major changes in civil service recruitment and other processes. Fundamental to the changes was the establishment of a central Board of Public Administration, which eventually became a Civil Service Commission in 1870. The Board was responsible for the competitive recruitment, based on merit, of professional civil servants, and their appointment to departments; it was largely independent of government. From an organizational aspect, the idea of a central and independent agency of government responsible for recruitment and other personnel matters was instituted from that time. The best educated men [sic] with knowledge of history, classics, language, and mathematics were appointed to the service. Three classes of civil servant also applied: the elite administrative classes; clerical support classes; and the technical or professional classes.

In the USA, European and British theories and practices continued to influence reform of public administration, especially through the Civil Service (Pendleton) Act of 1883. However, there was a determination, as Woodrow Wilson (1887) notes, to ‘Americanize’ the system. The state was regarded as an instrument of social cooperation, and a more bureaucratic public administration structure was needed to manage the state. However, there was always a fundamental rejection that the senior administration could perform in a non-partisan way. This meant that there were dual streams of career civil servants and political appointees at the high levels of the civil service. Therefore, it was recognized that there was a blurred delineation between the political and public administration environments. High-level entry requirements were embedded into the career civil service, and a political education was favored as the main qualification. Taylor’s (1912) theory of scientific management and related developments in the field were promoted as appropriate models of organization and work distribution.

Another major contributor to the evolution of ideas about public administration and organizational aspects was the German economist and sociologist, Max Weber. Weberian principles of bureaucracy have had a universal impact on the organizational aspects of public administration. These principles included the matching of fixed job responsibilities to defined, permanent positions; a hierarchy of official authority; the requirement for appointed, suitably qualified, and anonymous staff with continuity of tenure until retirement; recognition that high level appointments bring social status; and entitlement for a salary and a retirement pension (Weber 1946).

As an example of Weber’s force, his ideas were evident as far away as Japan. Public administration and organizational aspects were based largely on German bureaucracy and Weberian principles, with other local attributes. This included the preferential acceptance of law graduates into the administrative elite stream, which has meant that the critical decision processes have been rule and precedent bound. However, the developmental role of the state has led to the dominance of certain elite governmental organizations, such as the Ministry of International Trade and Industry.

Furthermore, major events and trends, such as world wars and the growth of global trade, have impacted upon organizational aspects of modern public administration. Consequently, public sectors have increased in certain periods to address major reconstruction initiatives. Cycles of nationalization of certain industries have also impacted upon organizational aspects. Political history is important, too, and organizational change at a micro level will usually occur when new governments are elected. Thus, there is a strong link between significant history and highly dynamic organizational aspects of public administration.

Thus, public administration has evolved as a distinct area of research and study in modern times. This is supported organizationally where, in concept, there is meant to be a clear separation of powers and responsibilities between political executives (governments); public administrations (civil or public services); and, the juridical arena (the law and courts). However, there are obvious accountabilities between governments and public organizations, as well, given that there is usually a correlation between the portfolio responsibilities of members of the government and the way public administrative arrangements are determined. For example, members of a government are allocated portfolio responsibilities pertinent to particular public policy fields, such as health, defense, or education. Typically, there is a defined public administration department dedicated to the implementation of government policy and/or service provision in the corresponding policy field.

Moreover, within public administrations, organization can take a number of forms. While categorization may vary from government to government, in general terms, five types of organization may be apparent. First, there are central agencies dedicated to coordinating and supporting government effort, responsible for areas such as financial and human resource management and management improvement. Second, there are departments charged with the responsibility for direct service provision to the public, across a broad range of policy fields. Third, there are government business enterprises (GBEs) which operate at a distance from government, in a more business-like way, usually providing some essential or commercial service. Fourth, there are the review and regulatory agencies, such as auditors-general, ombudsmen [sic], and anti-corruption and whistle-blowing protection agencies. Fifth, there are the more peripheral boards and agencies, often semi-autonomous entities that conduct other, sometimes more obscure, aspects of government business.

In general, these organizational aspects still apply, but the public administration–bureaucratic paradigm which endured for over a hundred years has to a significant extent been rejected by governments in postmodern times. By the 1960s, especially in Anglo-American polities, it was apparent that the modern paradigm of public administration, as it had evolved, was no longer serving governments, as intended. Public administrations were seen by critics and reviewers to be too big, too inefficient, and too powerful in comparison to governments. These criticisms were also linked to the perceived failure of Keynesian economic principles, which had underpinned governments' strategic policy decisions since the 1930s.

1.2 Postmodern Public Administration, Organizational Aspects (1979–Present)

It took until the late 1970s and early 1980s for fundamental changes to be implemented in a major paradigm shift toward a market-based model of public administration. Conservative political leaders, Prime Minister Thatcher in Britain and President Reagan in the USA were the first politicians demonstrably to sustain such an approach, which led to adoption in other Anglo-Saxon polities. Similar earlier attempted changes had been evident in Latin America, where free-market concepts of the Chicago School were influential for a relatively short time. The market-based model, in varying forms, has been adopted in over 100 countries, worldwide, with some convergence of ideological thought between traditionally conflicting political parties. The market-based model supplanted communism in Eastern Europe in the late 1980s as a guiding ideology and has led to revolutionary change in organizational form in other largely totalitarian states.

Supranational governance structures, involving organizations such as the International Monetary Fund (IMF), the World Bank, the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), the Group of 7–8 leading trading nations, the World Trade Organization (WTO), and the European Union (EU) have all supported and promoted the market-based model. This may account for the active transfer and adoption processes in place from polity to polity. The EU, as the most comprehensive organizational form for supranational governance, operates with its own parliament and public administration system.

Several common themes based partly on public choice, and other less well defined neoclassical economic theories of rational choice are characteristic of the market-based model. They all have implications for public administration and organizational aspects. First, for example, there is a move away from a mixed economy to a firm belief in markets as the primary and more efficient economic mechanism. To this end, deregulation, relating to trade, finance, and monetary policies has taken place.

Second, if markets are to prevail, then the size of governments and their public sectors needs to be reduced. Included in the radical downsizing of public sectors is commercialization, and/or the privatization of GBEs where it is deemed inappropriate for governments to continue to operate in these areas. Major utilities and commercial businesses traditionally involving governments, in areas of activity such as telecommunications, power generation, distribution and transmission, water, banking, insurance, postal services, and airlines may be targeted.

Third, and most importantly, for the public sector, the strategic focus is on organizational efficiency, the creation of internal market-style competitive conditions and the more purposive application of private-sector business techniques to public management. These changes have involved a shift from a focus on processes of administration and policy, however flawed, to organizational management. A business, or corporation, metaphor may be used to define organizational form.

As a subset of public choice theory, principal–agent theory focuses on the relationships between governments and their top bureaucrats. Public bureaucrats are perceived to be budget-maximizing, self-interested agents, not trusted by governments. Therefore, governments need to develop executive structures where principal–agent theory can be applied directly so that governments can compel their administrative elite to act in the government's interests. The establishment of formal senior executive services, with performance incentives and fixed-term contracts may result.

Organizationally, the acceptance of the market-based model by governments has seen other major changes. These include, first, substantial machinery of government changes including the separation of policy, regulatory, commercial, and operational services and programs into discrete organizations. Second, the purchaser/provider split, where governments are the contract managers and service provision is contracted out. Third, more openly political appointments at the top of the public service are apparent in previously nonpartisan services. Frequently, this has involved the centralization of power away from independent personnel bodies, which have been abolished. These senior executive managers are expected to support publicly governments' electability. In such circumstances, the possibility of ministers accepting responsibility for departmental managerial failure, within the construct of ministerial responsibility, considerably diminishes.

The rational choice logic, which underpins the market-based model, is open to question, given the presupposition of perfect markets and exchange processes. Such a conceptual framework is unrealistic for the political environment of public administration. Rewards for certain actions and behaviors of agents, required by the principals, can be achieved through both formal and informal power structures. This is an important organizational aspect of the market-based model, where parallel systems of exchange, reward, and relationships operate as a matter of course. While the formal systems may promote a constancy of action and process, the informal system can support implicitly institutionalized power relationships.

Whether the paradigm shift has resulted in better public administration and organizational aspects is still to be determined as the key economic indicators of performance, predicated within this new paradigm, suggest a mixed result. There has certainly been a shift from idiosyncratic or confined interpretations of public administration, relevant to particular nations, regions or systems, to a more universal construct. Nevertheless, there are many variations on the market-based theme depending on governments in power and individual leaderships at any given time.

From an organizational aspect, one of the weaknesses of the market-based model is that it focuses strongly on economic issues and individualism, rather than on the collective responsibility of the state to its citizens. In this sense, social and related policy fields may be diminished in their importance. Some governments are attempting to redress this imbalance with more attention to social, environmental, and other imperatives, relating to the development of human and social capital. Furthermore, the continuing growth of supranational structures in terms of greater organizational form, and advances in information technology, now provide new challenges for governments, and another likely significant paradigm shift. The organizational shape and size of public administrations into the future remains uncertain.

1.3 Virtual and Supranational Public Administration, Public Administration (Now and into the Future)

Two developing areas of interest will undoubtedly have major organizational impacts on public administration in the future. These are, first, more virtual governments, and, second, the power of supranational organizations. With developments in information technology and the related rise of the global new economy, governments are adding more virtual organizational forms to public administrations. For example, especially with customer service initiatives, knowledge management becomes increasingly important. Free information lines, supported by computer technology, provide coordinated details of government services. Similarly, one-stop shops allow citizens to attend to a range of government requirements, such as license renewals and the payment of bills, at a single location. Comprehensive information can be obtained from government Internet websites, and civil servants can be contacted, more informally and directly, by e-mail. E-commerce, relating to procurement, contracting, and the lodging of documents may now apply. Within governments, more virtual communication also takes place involving typed, aural, and visual media. Undoubtedly, this will continue to impact upon organizational aspects of public administration in the future.

Second, the continuing development of supranational governance structures, in the context of globalization, has led to both cogent and conspiratorial debate in recent years about future organizational aspects of public administration. The Parliament of the EU as a structure challenging the sovereignty of national member governments, is an example of how future organizational aspects may evolve as other trading coalitions consolidate their form. However, responses to globalization, especially negative ones, also prompt support for localism, which emphasizes the role of individual communities.

With all these complex local and global pressures, it is likely that organizational aspects of public administration will experience quite dramatic change in the first decades of the twenty-first century. Whether the more traditional structures of agencies, departments, trading enterprises, and review bodies, with the complex relationships between key actors, will remain as the primary organizational aspects is difficult to predict. Even if they do remain, the more virtual aspects of public administration are expected to endure and grow, to the point where there will be far more virtual public administration than there is at the time of writing.

See also: Administration in Organizations; Bureaucracy and Bureaucratization; Civil Service; Organization: Overview; Organizations and the Law; Organizations: Authority and Power; Organizations, Sociology of; Parliamentary Government; Planning, Administrative Organization of; Public Administration, Politics of; Public Bureaucracies; Public Sector Organizations; Weber, Max (1864–1920)

Bibliography

- Aucoin P 1995 The New Public Management CANADA in Comparative Perspective. Institute for Research on Public Policy, Ottawa, Canada
- Barberis P (ed.) The Civil Service in an Era of Change. Dartmouth, Aldershot, UK
- Barratt Brown M 1995 Models in Political Economy. Penguin Books, London
- Beloff M 1959 The American Federal Government. Oxford University Press, London
- Boston J, Martin J, Pallot J, Walsh P (eds.) 1991 Reshaping the State. Oxford University Press, London

- Campbell C, Wilson G 1995 The End of Whitehall. Blackwell, Oxford, UK
- Clegg S 1989 Frameworks of Power. Sage, London
- Eldridge C C 1978 Victorian Imperialism. Hodder & Stoughton, London
- Galbraith J K 1994 The World Economy Since the Wars. Mandarin, London
- Halligan J, Power J 1991 Political Management in the 1990s. Oxford University Press, Melbourne, Australia
- Hood A 1998 Public officials, government and the public trust. Australian Journal of Public Administration. 57(1), March: 98–114
- Hughes O 1994 Public Management and Administration. St. Martin's Press, New York
- Hutton W 1995 The State We're In. Jonathan Cape, London
- Institut Internationale d'Administration Publique 1996 An introduction to French administration. La Documentation française. Institut Internationale d'Administration Publique, Paris
- Kingdom J 1991 Government and Politics in Britain. Polity Press, Cambridge, UK
- Koh B 1989 Japan's Administrative Elite. University of California Press, Berkeley, CA
- Laffin M, Painter M (eds.) 1995 Reform and Reversal: Lessons from the Coalition Government in New South Wales 1988–1995. Macmillan, South Melbourne, Australia
- Lynn L E Jr 1996 Public Management as Art, Science and Profession. Chatham House, NJ
- Northcote–Trevelyan Report 1853 Report on the Organisation of the Permanent Civil Service. Appendix B in Fulton, Lord (Committee under the Chairmanship of) 1968 The Civil Service. Vol. 1. HMSO, London
- Ormerod P 1994 The Death of Economics. Faber and Faber, London
- Peters B G 1996 The Future of Governing: Four Emerging Models. University Press of Kansas, St Lawrence
- Pollitt C 1993 Managerialism and the Public Services, 2nd edn. Blackwell, Oxford, UK
- Pusey M 1991 Economic Rationalism in Canberra. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge
- Rainey H 1991 Understanding Public Organizations. Jossey-Bass, San Francisco, CA
- Savoie D 1994 Thatcher, Reagan, Mulroney. University of Toronto Press, Toronto, Canada
- Self P 1993 Government by the Market? Macmillan, London
- Shafritz J, Hyde A 1992 Classics of Public Administration. Brooks/Cole, Pacific Grove, CA
- Spann R N 1979 Government Administration in Australia. Allen & Unwin, Sydney, Australia
- Sturgess G 1993 Can parliament cope? Towards a new era in public accountability, Canberra Bulletin of Public Administration, 7, September: 45–52
- Taylor F 1912 Scientific Management (Reprinted in Shafritz J, Hyde A 1992 Classics of Public Administration). Brooks/Cole, Pacific Grove, CA
- Wanna J, O'Faircheallaigh C, Weller P 1992 Public Sector Management in Australia. Macmillan, South Melbourne, Australia
- Weber M 1946 Bureaucracy. Reprinted in Shafritz J, Hyde A 1992 Classics of Public Administration. Brooks/Cole, Pacific Grove, CA
- Wilenski P 1986 Public Power and Public Administration. Hale and Ironmonger, Sydney, Australia

- Wilson W 1887 The Study of Administration. Reprinted in Shafritz J, Hyde A 1992 Classics of Public Administration. Brooks/Cole, Pacific Grove, CA

J. Johnston

Public Administration, Politics of

From its self-conscious beginnings in the late nineteenth century until the years around World War II, the practice of public administration in America, conceived then, as now, as the organization of government and the management of its activities, was regarded as a rational, technical enterprise properly pursued entirely apart from the give and take of politics. Working against the backdrop of civil service reform, those who sought initially to define the field in both a descriptive and prescriptive sense were certain that public administration could only be accomplished by strict adherence to principles of neutral competence and efficiency rather than partisanship, compromise, and preference. In this view, representative political institutions, whose function is to weigh competing interests and make choices for the society, set the tasks of the bureaucracy. In his seminal essay of 1887, The Study of Administration, Woodrow Wilson wrote of the possibility of a 'science of administration,' maintaining that 'administrative questions are not political questions' (Wilson 1941). In the crucible of the Great Depression of the 1930s and the war that followed, however, challenges to the politics-administration dichotomy began to take form, and by 1950 John Gaus (1950) could declare that 'a theory of public administration means in our time a theory of politics also.' Today, there is no controversy: no one would deny that public administration is a decidedly political process.

1. How Public Administration is Political

There are two general ways in which public administration may be regarded as a political process. One is that by their actions public administrators make value choices that allocate benefits and costs authoritatively; these choices are likely therefore to be contested. The other is that public administrators, far from being passive agents of representative political institutions, act strategically, seeking to maximize the influence of their agencies by competing with other actors for resources and by building alliances.

1.1 Administration as the Pursuit of Values

The organization of government and the implementation and evaluation of public policy are carried out in the context of certain normative standards or values that guide both management strategies as well as day-to-day actions. The origin of these standards lies normally with the legislative or judicial branches of government or the elected executive. They include, among others, injunctions to pursue the business of government with economy, efficiency, equity, responsiveness, transparency, and accountability.

Many of these standards are in conflict with one another, however: economy and equity may not be attainable simultaneously, for example, if the former stresses cost-savings at the expense of broad distribution of benefits. Nor is efficiency, which may require swift and confidential action, always compatible with transparency, which may entail open decision-making and citizen participation. Furthermore, each of these standards is susceptible to interpretation as it relates to any given concrete situation. Since representative political institutions may not provide specific guidance about priorities or offer ways to resolve ambiguities as these standards are applied in the field, public administrators must necessarily make choices and render interpretations that inevitably create advantages for some interests and deny them to others. Thus, as Carl Friedrich (quoted in Lynn 1996) once observed, 'Public policy is being formed as it is being executed ... In so far as particular individuals or groups are gaining or losing power or control in a given area, there is politics.' To the extent that politics is the process of deciding who gets what, then public administration is a political activity.

1.2 Public Administrators as Strategic Actors

Through the aggrandizement of resources and the solidification of alliances, managers of bureaucratic agencies strengthen their ability to exercise influence in the shaping and implementation of public policy. Selznick's study of the Tennessee Valley Authority (1949) was among the first to suggest the importance of establishing external allies (such as client groups, interest groups, the news media, or members of Congress) as a key to the survival and prosperity of a bureaucratic agency. Subsequent observers have seen the efforts of bureaucratic agencies to build a resource base and foster external support as creating new competitors for power with legislative bodies in government (Rourke 1987). Another perspective, however, has emphasized the mutually reinforcing relationships that bureaucratic agencies at the national level tend to forge with interest groups and the legislative committees critical to their funding and authority. These relationships are variously referred to as 'iron triangles' or, to suggest the greater fluidity with which these alliances evolve, 'issue networks' (Heclo 1979).

2. The Public Management Perspective

The political nature of public administration has taken on sharper focus with the emergence in the last quarter of the twentieth century of the subdiscipline of public management. Whereas traditional public administration was concerned primarily with the organization, design, and operation of bureaucratic institutions, public management is more interested in how managers actually manage public policy (Lynn 1996). Kettl (1996) attributes the rise of public management as a field of study and practice in part to research on policy implementation that began in the 1970s. These investigations suggested that policy success and failure lay not so much with the laws that established programs, or even with the design of the organizations responsible for implementation, as with the skills and capacities of the managers. Some were more politically capable than others. Lynn (1996), for example, writes of 'the politics of management,' by which he means the ability of managers of public agencies to set a course, maintain credibility with overseers, marshal authority and resources, and position the organization advantageously in the political environment. Thus, the public management perspective focuses explicitly on strategy and interorganizational relations rather than the administration of processes internal to bureaucratic agencies.

3. The Politics of Public Administration in Action

The politics of public administration are revealed in the routine processes of government organization and operations, such as reform, personnel administration, and policy implementation.

3.1 Reform

Reformers have made repeated attempts during the twentieth century to transform American government to make it more effective and more responsive to public desires. These efforts have often focused on reorganization schemes whose effect was to redistribute power within government. For example, the creation of an executive budget at the national level in the United States in the 1920s and the establishment of an Executive Office of the President in the postwar period both served to strengthen the presidency in relation to Congress. In more recent times, the movement to 'reinvent' government has sought to shift power both from Congress to the bureaucracy and from the higher reaches of the bureaucracy to mid-level managers and line functionaries (Kettl 1998). Not only has the reinvention movement aimed at 'empowering' government functionaries at the lower rungs of the bureaucracy, but it has also attempted to recast citizens as customers rather than supplicants. Since customers may exercise their right not to buy, to 'exit,' the successful market actor must be attentive to their desires. The reinvention movement at the end of the twentieth century is, thus, partly an effort to transform the culture of public administration by conferring on citizens seeking service from government rights and powers—respect, attentiveness, quality—similar to those enjoyed by customers in the private market (Osborne and Gaebler 1992).

3.2 Personnel Administration

Hiring public employees, defining job requirements, motivating workers to perform, and appraising their achievements are standard tasks of the public administrator. As Levine et al. (1990) have pointed out, public executives seek to achieve a diverse set of values in personnel administration, including instrumental achievement, social equity, merit, and employee rights. Often these may be in conflict with one another. This is nowhere more apparent than in the debate over affirmative action and descriptive representation in the public workforce.

Holden (1996) has observed that no theory of public administration can fail to take account of competition among ethnic groups in a plural society. Public employment has long been a prize over which ethnic and racial groups have contended, for work in government has provided not only a measure of economic security but also advancement. The need to respond to the political demands of groups underrepresented in public jobs may be seen as clashing at times with the exercise of strict merit standards. Public administrators face the dilemma of resolving this value conflict as they seek to manage their agencies, posing clear political choices. Elected officials also struggle with this issue, and those who resolve it by committing to affirmative action illustrate how political considerations may merge with and shape the public administration of personnel management.

3.3 Policy Implementation

One of the most important factors accounting for the political nature of the administrative process is the degree to which government functionaries necessarily exercise discretion in implementing laws and administrative directives. When state highway department planners choose to establish a right-of-way for a new road through a poor neighborhood rather than a middle-class area, or decide to locate an interchange near one suburban commercial development rather than another, it is clear that the implementation of highway policy is not simply a matter of the application of engineering and administrative considerations; management choices have distributive consequences. They create winners and losers.

Discretion may be more or less circumscribed. Schneider and Ingram (1997) point out that the allocation of discretion in any given policy area varies from the situation in which the laws and rules establish unambiguous goals, means, and target populations to a situation in which the law is so general as to leave all of these in great measure to the judgment of government employees in the field. At the lower levels of the organization so-called 'street-level bureaucrats' (Lip-sky 1980), such as police officers, welfare case workers, health and safety inspectors, and other government employees who deal on a face-to-face basis with the public, often labor under conditions that conform more to the latter end of the spectrum than the former. The choices of these bureaucrats are fraught with political meaning: police officers who stop automobiles driven by young black men more often than those driven by whites simply in the belief that blacks are more likely to be criminals, or caseworkers whose sympathies lead them to facilitate applications by elderly clients for food stamps but not for single mothers, serve as key actors in the allocation of policy benefits and costs.

Discretion may even lead to the sabotage of laws with which bureaucratic officials do not agree. For example, in the mid-1970s the secretary of the US Department of Agriculture resisted implementing the Women, Infants and Children supplemental food program, claiming that such assistance was both duplicative of other programs and ineffective. Delays in the implementation of the program led to congressional claims that the department was breaking the law.

4. The Administration–Politics Synthesis

To reformers in the early twentieth century, for whom the business corporation provided the preferred template for the administrative state, politics was understood as the competitive struggle for partisan advantage. This struggle served its purpose in the selection of leaders and the adoption of policy, but in an ideal society, administration, the carrying out of political decisions as well as the housekeeping functions of government, such as street paving, would be separated from partisan conflict and placed in the hands of disinterested professionals, beholden neither to party nor politician, but to rational principles of management. Yet in the century since these ideas took form, students of the administrative process came to see that the operational details of organization and management were themselves deeply political.

Public administration has come to be understood as the continuation of the political process—the authoritative allocation of values—by government actors in government settings other than the elected institutions. To the extent that public administrators make choices in organizing their bureaus, in choosing their personnel, in establishing operational priorities, and most important, in applying the laws, they distribute costs and benefits across groups and interests in the society. In that sense, public administration is a political activity.

See also: Accountability: Political; Administration in Organizations; Bureaucracy and Bureaucratization; Management Accounting; Organizations, Sociology of; Planning, Administrative Organization of; Public Administration: Organizational Aspects; Public Bureaucracies; Public Sector Organizations

Bibliography

- Gaus J 1950 Trends in the theory of public administration. Public Administration Review 10: 161–68
- Heclo H 1979 Issue networks and the executive establishment. In: King A (ed.) The New American Political System. American Enterprise Institute, Washington, DC
- Holden M 1996 Continuity & Disruption. University of Pittsburgh Press, Pittsburgh, PA
- Kettl D 1996 Introduction. In: Kettl D, Milward H B (eds.) The State of Public Management. Johns Hopkins University Press, Baltimore, MD
- Kettl D 1998 Reinventing Government: A Fifth Year Report Card. Brookings Institution, Washington, DC
- Levine C, Peters B G, Thompson F 1990 Public Administration: Challenges, Choices, Consequences. Scott, Foresman, Glenview, IL
- Lipsky M 1980 Street Level Bureaucracy. Russell Sage, New York
- Lynn L 1996 Public Management as Art, Science and Profession. Chatham House, Chatham, NJ
- Osborne D, Gaebler N 1992 Reinventing Government. Addison Wesley, Reading, MA
- Rourke F 1987 Bureaucracy in the American constitutional order. Political Science Quarterly 102: 217–32
- Schneider A, Ingram H 1997 Policy Design for Democracy. University of Kansas Press, Lawrence, KS
- Selznick P 1949 TVA and the Grassroots. University of California Press, Berkeley, CA
- Wilson W 1941 The study of administration. Political Science Quarterly 56: 481–506

P. Eisinger

Public Broadcasting

The history of broadcasting, beginning in the early 1920s, has seen three main types or models of broadcasting organizations. One is the commercial model, in which advertising is used to provide revenues, with programs seen as vehicles for providing an audience to which products can be sold. A second model is one in which the broadcasting organization is funded by the state, usually so that the state can project its political message and thus influence the public. The third model is known in the USA as public broadcasting but in most of the rest of the world as public service broadcasting. The most famous and influential example of this model is the BBC. It is this model with which this article is concerned, particularly by defining it in ways that will allow the reader to see the fundamental difference between it and the other two models.

1. The General Concept and Background of Public Broadcasting

In a public system, television and radio producers acquire money to make programs. In a commercial system they make programs to acquire money. However simple, this little epithet articulates the divergence of basic principles, the different philosophical assumptions, on which broadcasting is built. History and experience fashioned inside public broadcasting a definable canon, a set of principles and practices which constitute the core theses around which the institution has been formed and which have guided its performance.

The particular institutional structures and forms of funding may vary from place to place, but public broadcasting is above all else an ambition, a belief that the sheer presence of broadcasting within all our lives can and must be used to nurture society, to proffer the opportunity that society and its inhabitants can be better served than by systems which primarily seek consumers for advertisers or subjects for the state.

Some of the most powerful visions of the purpose of broadcasting emerged within unusual and trying circumstances. Consider, for instance, the cultural histories of the occupations of Germany and Japan in the late 1940s and the formulation of Allied policy for broadcasting in the rebuilding of those societies. Here was testament to the idea of broadcasting as primarily a social rather than an economic process, as something with moral, cultural, intellectual, and creative purpose and not just as a source of mild comment and moderate pleasure. The charters that established broadcasting in Japan and in Germany, by the Allied occupying powers, were replete with the public service ideal. If broadcasting was to comment, it should do so with a flourish. If it was to amuse, it should do so with elan. If it was to educate, it should do so with real professionalism. It was believed by the Allied leadership, including the USA, that the life of the mind of a society was far too precious and important to be left to what they took to be the vagaries of a commercial system or the oppressive force of state control.

It could be argued that such policies were creatures of the moment, as massive destruction demanded enormous reconstruction, of which communications would inevitably be part. But what was required was the restoration not just of highways, buildings, plants, but also of the shattered imaginative lives of whole populations. The architects of postwar Germany and Japan sensed correctly that healthy, diverse cultural institutions were a prerequisite to a functioning liberal democracy. Broadcasting was thus to be used as a key part of the cultural and social regeneration of those societies. In that lies the real clue to the nature and purpose of great public broadcasting: that it makes best sense when it represents a national and moral optimism within a society, when it suggests through the diversity and quality of its programs that societies be better than they are, better served, better amused, better informed, and, thus, better societies.

A period which is widely regarded within the advanced industrial societies as a high water mark of public service broadcasting, is the BBC in the early 1960s. A key figure from those years was Sir Arthur fforde, possibly the greatest of the chairmen of the BBC. In 1963 he wrote: 'By its nature broadcasting must be in a constant and sensitive relationship with the moral condition of society.' He felt that the moral establishment had failed modern society and that broadcasting was a way in which that failure could be rectified. He added that it 'is of cardinal importance that everyone in a position of responsibility should be ready to set himself or herself the duty of assuring, to those creative members of staff... that measure of freedom, independence and elan without which the arts do not flourish' (quoted in Tracey 1983, p. 235).

That idea of providing a protective layer within which the imaginative spirit might create, lay at the heart of the BBC version of public service broadcasting which flourished in the postwar years and which constituted a model that other nations sought to emulate. Ian Jacob, Director-General of the BBC from 1952 to 1959, refined the notion. In 1958, in an internal document called 'Basic Propositions', he described public service broadcasting as:

... a compound of a system of control, an attitude of mind, and an aim, which if successfully achieved results in a service which cannot be given by any other means. The system of control is full independence, or the maximum degree of independence that Parliament will accord. The attitude of mind is an intelligent one capable of attracting to the service the highest quality of character and intellect. The aim is to give the best and the most comprehensive service of broadcasting to the public that is possible. The motive that underlies the whole operation is a vital factor; it must not be vitiated by political or commercial consideration.

This is one of the best attempts to capture in words a concept and view of broadcasting which continues to circulate in the world of cultural politics. Yet even here the vision, the articulation, is limited. Jacob's words imply that we understand the nature of public service broadcasting not by defining it, but by recognizing its results, rather as one plots the presence of a hidden planet or a subatomic particle not by 'seeing' it, but by measuring the effects of its presence. The Pilkington Committee, on the future of British broadcasting, said as much in 1962 when it observed: 'though its standards exist and are recognizable, broadcasting is more nearly an art than an exact science. It deals in tastes and values and is not precisely definable' (Home Office 1962, p.13, para. 34).

One obvious characteristic of efforts to define public service broadcasting is the elegant vagueness that is studied and deliberate. In effect what is suggested is that one thing that has to be understood about defining public service broadcasting is that in any abstract sense one cannot.

The beast that lurks in the shrubbery of those discussions is that whatever the definitional uncertainties, in that public service broadcasting can be experienced and recognized but never properly captured by language, someone has to decide on what is 'good' and 'bad,' and there should be a guiding hand, what has been referred to as 'the custodians, the caretakers' of culture. As traditionally understood by public broadcasters the whole idea of custodianship was totally unproblematic, as was understanding just who the custodians were, the characteristics they would possess and the locations in which they would be found. Such presuppositions appeared only natural throughout the history of broadcasting because that history was embedded within a social order in which hierarchy was also assumed: hierarchies of social status and cultural judgment. And in a curious kind of way the point of hierarchy is to reproduce itself, since the fundamental belief of the hierarchical system is, and has to be, that such arrangements have worth and merit. The plausibility of such a thesis becomes very much dependent on delivering evidence that attests to both worthiness and meritoriousness in such a way as to drown out the noise of any emergent countervailing thesis.

A key justification for the custodial role in most societies where public service broadcasting was established was that since the radio frequency used for transmissions was a limited natural resource, someone had to ensure that its use served the public good, the whole community. The cultural geology of this decision had, however, a deeper level to it, based on nineteenth century assumptions about the ways in which the arts and humanities could elevate the human condition. In an essay on the formation of modern literary analysis, Steiner wrote that behind the study of literature in the nineteenth century lay:

a kind of rational and moral optimism... a large hope, a great positivism... The study of literature was assumed to carry an almost necessary implication of moral force. It was thought self-evident that the teaching and reading of the great poets and prose writers would enrich not only taste or style but moral feeling: that it would cultivate human judgment and act against barbarism (Steiner 1985, pp. 77–8).

Reading this account one could quite properly substitute the word ‘broadcasting’ for ‘literature’ and have a powerful explanation of what the creation of the model of public service broadcasting was all about: a relocation of a nineteenth century humanistic dream of human betterment. The fear that drove that dream was of ‘the mob,’ the pervasive belief among cultural, religious, and political elites that there was indeed a dark side to the human soul that was, when let loose, dangerous and devastating to the flesh as well as the spirit. Whatever the apparent elitism, who is to say that they were wrong nestling, as they did, between the first great war and a looming second. There remained, however, a residual faith, tied to the whole condition of the Enlightenment, humanism, and belief in progress, that popular culture need not be debauched but could in fact transcend itself. Consider these key passages from the Pilkington Report:

Television does not, and cannot, merely reflect the moral standards of society. It must affect them, either by changing or by reinforcing them... Because the range of experience is not finite but constantly growing, and because the growing points are usually most significant, it is on these that challenges to existing assumptions and beliefs are made, where the claims to new knowledge and new awareness are stated. If our society is to respond to the challenges and judge the claims, they must be put before it. All broadcasting, and television especially, must be ready and anxious to experiment, to show the new and unusual, to give a hearing to dissent. Here, broadcasting must be most willing to make mistakes; for if it does not, it will make no discoveries (Home Office 1962, pp. 19–20, paras. 50–3).

The suggestion here is not that public broadcasters are all hoping and dreaming that their programs will transform people from cultural and intellectual slobes into something of which one can more readily approve, but rather that objectively some such argument must be the public broadcaster’s last line of defense. The language is of standards, quality, excellence, range. The logic is of social enrichment, that in however indefinable a manner this society is ‘better’ for having programs produced from within the framework of those social arguments termed public service broadcasting, compared to those programs produced within an environment in which commerce or politics prevail.

One cannot, however, escape the charge that those sentiments rest on a set of ill-explored assumptions about the sociological organization of modern culture. How are we better? What are the mechanics? And, vitally, where is the evidence? Indeed, what would such evidence even look like?

2. The Public Service Idea: Eight Principles

What then are the definable principles of public service broadcasting? Eight principles are outlined below.

2.1 Universality of Availability

Public broadcasting has historically sought to ensure that its signals are available to all, that no one should be disenfranchised by distance or by accident of geography. The imperative that guides this principle is not that of maximizing customers in a market but of serving citizens in a democracy, that if one defines one’s audience as the citizens of a country, then logically one has to reach them all. To a remarkable extent in country after country this principle has been made real.

2.2 Universality of Appeal

Public broadcasting seeks to provide programs that cater to the many different tastes and interests that constitute a society’s life. The public broadcasting community understands that each of us, at different moments, is part of a majority and a minority. In seeking to provide programs for a wide range of tastes and interests, public broadcasting does so with an eye cocked to the need to ensure that whether the program is pitched at the many or the few it is done so with real quality. Public broadcasting does not expect that it can please all the people all of the time—indeed it sees in that approach precisely the kind of populism that nurtures cultural mediocrity, as quality is sacrificed on the altar of maximizing the audience size.

It is an important element of this principle that public broadcasting serves not only tastes and interests that are readily apparent, but also those that are dormant and latent—that may be part of the potential we all possess but that circumstance may not have allowed us to develop.

2.3 Provision for Minorities, Especially Those Disadvantaged by Physical or Social Circumstance

It is commonplace to characterize the medium of television as essentially serving ‘the mass.’ Certainly public broadcasting understands the vast capability of one medium to reach enormous numbers of people. It sets its face, however, against the logic of commercial systems to see people as no more than statistics in skins, with a definable value captured in the most desirable rates, demographic buys, and cost per thousand. As suggested in the second principle, public broadcasting views the public as a rich tapestry of tastes and interests, each of which, insofar as possible, should be served.

In particular it recognizes that there are whole subcultures of minority social experiences crying out for attention. People of different color, language groups, and religious preferences all have vital needs for expression in the political and social discourse of the nation. Public broadcasting is dedicated to a dual role here—on the one hand to give access to such groups, to provide them with the opportunities to speak to one another and to voice the issues as they see them, and on the other to provide coverage of their histories, interests, and concerns for the public at large.

2.4 Serving the Public Sphere

Some television programs are successful because they get a fair-sized audience, make some money, and sometimes even exemplify the craft of popular television. Other programs are successful because they reach out and touch a small, particular, but powerful audience. Some programs are successful because the craft of the program maker is used to speak to us all. They touch us, move us, make us laugh and cry and cheer. They speak to us because they speak for us. Like all great art, they help us make sense out of life, to see and understand things with a fresh eye, and give us a burning sense of the collective, of belonging to the nation-as-community. It is an increasingly vital principle of the work of public broadcasting that it recognizes its special relationship to a sense of national identity and broad community. Any nation is a patchwork of localities and regions, but it also is a nation, heterogeneous and homogeneous to a remarkable degree at one and the same time. Public broadcasting's very nature is then to nurture the public sphere as a means of serving the public good. It understands that while within civil society individuals pursue their own private self-interests, it is within the public sphere that they function as citizens. It is a fundamental principle then that public broadcasting must motivate the viewers as citizens possessing duties as well as rights, rather than as individual consumers possessing wallets and credit cards.

2.5 A Commitment to the Education of the Public

The most outstanding example of public broadcasting's commitment to the audience-as-citizen is the long-time provision in almost all systems of educational programming at every level. Public broadcasting knows that political and social literacy, as well as of course literal literacy, is an essential prerequisite to the healthy working of a democratic order. Above all else, the commitment to this principle requires that it treat its audience as mature, rational beings capable of learning and growing in many ways. Thus much of public broadcasting has retained its commitment to institutional services. Daytime school broadcasting and formal learning services of all kinds continue to play a role in most national services.

2.6 Independence from Vested Interests

It is a simple but key principle of public broadcasting that its programs can best serve the public with excellence and diversity when they are produced from within a structure of independence. Programs funded by advertising necessarily have their character influenced in some shape or form by the demand to maximize the garnering of consumers. Programs directly funded by the government, and with no intervening structural heat shield, inevitably tend to utter the tones of their master's voice.

The whole history of public broadcasting has been dominated by the idea that it can best serve the nation when it remains distanced from any particular commitment to any particular power structure inside the nation. Of particular importance to this principle is the ability of public broadcasting to support a cadre of independent-minded program makers, who are thus well able to speak with authentic tones and to offer that singularity of vision allied to creativity and passion that has traditionally produced some of public television's finest moments. It follows that the political and economic architecture of this principle is such as to support the making of programs that are good in their own terms, whatever their intended audience. In the making of programs for public broadcasting, there should be no ulterior purpose or motive. It is axiomatic to this principle that the funding of public broadcasting should be such, in total amount and in the absence of any strings attached, as to encourage rather than negate the independence enjoyed.

2.7 Encouraging Competition in Good Programming Rather Than Competition for Numbers

This principle is central to public service broadcasting and essentially involves a commitment to making programs which, whatever their intended audience, are of high quality. The overwhelming brunt of the evidence leads to the conclusion that the most important aspect of such structuring relates to the forms of finance. Where commercial sources of revenue are dominant, or even present, or where there is direct subvention from government, the program maker's eye is almost inevitably diverted away from what should be the main focus, the inherent quality of the program he or she is making.

2.8 The Rules of Broadcasting Should Liberate Rather Than Restrict the Program Maker

While all broadcasting will inevitably be governed by certain prescriptions—'educate,' 'inform,' 'entertain,' 'balance,' 'fairness'—and certain broadly drawn restrictions—obscenity, national security—the essence of the legislative foundation by which it is empowered should sustain a liberal function for the program maker. The legislation should create secure living space, arena for action, for broadcasters with all kinds of interests in possible programs and possible varieties of audience, rather than leaving the field to those who are interested chiefly in delivering maximum audiences most of the time. The legislation should also ensure that the higher echelons of broadcasting contain individuals who understand its potential and who themselves care for the importance of the creative work of their staff. Part of that understanding would be the need for experiment and innovation in broadcasting, the need to provide a focus for a society's quarrel with itself, the recognition that mistakes will be made but as such may signify the health of the system.

Perhaps above all else, such leadership should be helped to understand that experiment, innovation, quarrel, and mistake are likely to come from the younger program maker, without whom the system is in danger of institutional arteriosclerosis.

See also: Broadcasting: General; Broadcasting: Regulation; Mass Media, Political Economy of; Mass Media, Representations in; Media, Uses of; Public Relations in Media; Public Sphere and the Media

Bibliography

- Avery R L (ed.) 1993 Public Service Broadcasting in a Multi-channel Environment: The History and Survival of an Ideal. Longman, New York
- Briggs A 1985 The BBC: The First Fifty Years. Oxford University Press, Oxford, UK
- Bullert B J 1997 Public Television: Politics and the Battle Over Documentary Film. Rutgers University Press, New Brunswick, NJ
- Home Office 1962 Report of the Committee on Broadcasting (Pilkington Report). HMSO, London
- Jarvik L A 1997 PBS, Behind the Screen. Forum, Rocklin, CA
- Ledbetter J 1997 Made Possible By: The Death Of Public Broadcasting in the United States. Verso, New York
- Skene W 1993 Fade to Black: A Requiem for the CBC. Douglas and McIntyre, Vancouver, BC
- Smith A, Paterson R (eds) 1998 Television: An International History. Oxford University Press, New York
- Stewart D 1999 The PBS Companion—A History of Public Television. TV Books, New York
- Stuart C (ed.) 1975 The Reith Diaries. Collins, London
- Tracey M 1983 A Variety of Lives: A Biography of Sir Hugh Greene. Bodley Head, London
- Tracey M 1998 The Decline and Fall of Public Service Broadcasting. Oxford University Press, Oxford, UK

M. Tracey

Public Bureaucracies

Throughout history public bureaucracies have served as a source of continuity and stability in the life of the state. This role has sometimes led to their becoming a significant obstacle to innovation in government policies. More recently, however, these bureaucracies have also become useful agents of change in many societies.

The power that bureaucrats exercise comes mainly from the expertise they command both as individuals and when linked together in organizations. This power has come under increasing challenge in the industrialized democracies. Other institutions—governmental and nongovernmental—have begun to acquire their own expertise, and public bureaucracies are less able to cloak their operations in secrecy. Moreover, many public agencies that formerly performed regulatory or service delivery functions have been abolished, and private or quasi-public organizations have begun to perform tasks that were once within the exclusive preserve of government agencies. By the end of the twentieth century, it had become clear that public bureaucracy was not the growth industry it had appeared to be in the aftermath of World War II, fifty years earlier.

1. Bureaucracy: the Permanent Government

Although perhaps the least venerable, public bureaucracies rank among the oldest of all existing government institutions. Such bureaucracies played a central and continuing role in the operation of two of the largest and the most effective of the empires that emerged in the early stages of human history, the Chinese and the Egyptian, as they did in the imperial systems of Rome and Byzantium. Each of these was a political system that endured for centuries.

As history evolved and as nation-states emerged as the dominant form of political community in Western society, public bureaucracies were still able to demonstrate as formidable a capacity for holding on to power as their ancient forbears. Even when other political institutions, such as elected executives and legislatures, began to emerge as new centers of government authority, these public bureaucracies still managed to maintain a leading position in crafting and carrying out state programs and decisions.

This continuity in the exercise of power enabled public bureaucracies to be a source of stability in the life of a nation even when fundamental changes were taking place in the nature of the regime they served. Alexis De Tocqueville has given us a memorable description of bureaucratic organizations serving in this way amidst the turbulence of French politics at the end of the eighteenth century: 'For though in each successive revolution the administration was, so to speak, decapitated, its body survived intact and active. The same duties were performed by the same civil servants... These men administered the country or rendered justice in the name of the King, then in that of the Republic, thereafter in the Emperor's' (De Tocqueville 1955).

2. Bureaucracy and Change

Since De Tocqueville wrote, the role that public bureaucracies can play as a stabilizing force in societies beset by a time of troubles has sometimes been seen in a less favorable light. It is argued, for example, that their durability as government institutions has enabled bureaucracies to function as an obstacle to change in the social order, long after it has become clear that such change is urgently needed. During the twentieth century, some bureaucracies, especially in the military sector, have played this kind of obstructive role in the emerging nations of Africa and Asia. In its most extreme form, resistance to change on the part of a public bureaucracy may even lead a government agency to sabotage programs placed under its control that it opposes.

2.1 Bureaucracies as Change Agents

In the modern world, however, it is also possible to find public bureaucracies that serve not as barriers to innovation but as agents of change in their own societies. When Social Democratic political parties came to power in Europe after World War II, it was widely anticipated that the reforms they intended would be undercut by the conservative bureaucracies in their own country that would be responsible for putting these programs into effect. This kind of sabotage did not in fact occur. Such bureaucracies carried out the changes proposed by the Labour Party when it took control over the British government after the parliamentary elections of 1945 with the same diligence they had shown when administering the programs of the Conservative governments under which they had previously served.

Moreover, one of the enduring legacies of that great period of social and economic reform in the USA in the 1930s, which came to be known as the New Deal, was the creation of new bureaucratic organizations such as the Rural Electrification Administration (REA) and the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA) that were designed to serve neglected sectors of the American population. In the 1960s a similar reform movement gave birth to agencies at all levels of government in the USA that were authorized to protect women and minority groups from discrimination in employment and other spheres of everyday life. Of course, even when a bureaucracy is created to serve as an agent of change, it can still find itself under attack from its own supporters on the grounds that it is insufficiently zealous in pursuing this objective. As a result, the stereotype of bureaucracy as an obstacle to change tends to endure, even in settings where an organization is breaking new ground.

The effort to use public bureaucracies as instruments of social reform is the product of a general movement toward democracy that has taken place throughout the Western world. As this has occurred, victory in regularly scheduled elections has become the chief source of empowerment, and the political parties competing in such electoral contests have every reason to see public bureaucracies as vehicles for promoting policy changes or carrying on programs that will ultimately provide the political support necessary to win or maintain control of the government. This convergence of interest between party and bureaucracy has energized the effort in modern democratic societies to use bureaucratic institutions as instruments for breaking with the past rather than preserving it.

3. Bureaucratic Expertise

Throughout history the fundamental source from which public bureaucracies derive their power is the possession of a body of knowledge or skill indispensable to the successful performance of the government in which they operate. In many cases, especially during the early stages in their historical development, these organizations held a monopoly of such expertise. In addition to the influence it gave them within the councils of government, it enabled them to win a certain measure of deference within the community at large. To be sure, this deference was usually coupled with hostility, since ordinary citizens commonly resent the power exercised by bureaucrats in democratic as well as authoritarian societies. Such antagonism toward bureaucracies is perhaps the chief way in which these disparate systems of government continue to resemble one another in the modern world.

Over the course of modern history societies have differed in their willingness to allow expertise to become the signature characteristic of their public bureaucracies. The UK, modeling itself after the example of ancient China, pioneered in this respect, and various segments of the British Empire followed this example even after they won independence. In the more egalitarian culture of the USA, proposals to establish such a Mandarin-style bureaucracy met with strong initial resistance in the nineteenth century as betrayal of the country's democratic traditions. A similar outcry can still be triggered today in US politics by proposals that the country create an institutional counterpart to France's 'Ecole Nationale d'Administration,' a school for the training of the French administrative elite.

3.1 Competition among Experts

One development that has greatly diminished the advantage public bureaucracies derive from their command over bodies of expertise in specialized areas of government policy has been the gradual migration of such expertise to other institutions of government. In the USA, for example, Presidents now have a large number of experts of their own clustered in various units within the Executive Office of the President. While Prime Ministers and Cabinet members in the parliamentary systems that prevail elsewhere in democratic societies do not have similar access to such organized cadres of experts, they are often able to turn elsewhere to satisfy their need for expert assistance.

3.2 The Rise of Think-tanks

Another important source of expertise widely available to elected officials today lies within the private sector in the form of private research organizations known as 'think-tanks' that have emerged and begun to focus on current issues of government policy in the Western democracies. The research findings of these organizations sometimes attract almost as much, if not more, public attention than the reports emanating from the public bureaucracies whose work they monitor. In earlier days these think-tanks tended to provide intellectual support for programs and policies that led to an expansion in the size and power of public bureaucracies, especially in the areas of the social services and economic regulation. More recently, however, think-tanks with a conservative orientation have begun to emerge, and they have provided intellectual ammunition for groups critical of public bureaucracies and the programs and policies these organizations pursue.

4. Bureaucratic Secrecy and Open Government

The emergence and expansion of new forms of mass communication has tended to make public bureaucracies increasingly vulnerable to scrutiny and criticism from institutions and groups outside the government. Pressure from such media organizations has been chiefly responsible for the enactment in a number of modern societies of 'freedom of information' statutes which require public bureaucracies to provide information in their files to private citizens or groups upon request, except for certain specified categories of data. Max Weber long ago saw the secrecy in which the public bureaucracies of his day normally operated as a major source of the power they exercised. As a study edited by Itzhak Galnoor has shown, the scope of such secrecy has been greatly narrowed in both Europe and the USA today.

5. Alternatives to Public Bureaucracies

Critics of the role of public bureaucracies in government, or of the programs they administer, have long argued that they are in fact immortal institutions, which, once established, are impossible to terminate. Certainly it is true that such bureaucracies are tenacious organizations, sinking deep roots into the fabric of the societies they serve.

Still, recent developments in modern societies make it abundantly clear that public bureaucracies are far from immortal. During the past two decades a wide variety of regulatory agencies have been put to death in both the USA and Europe, casualties of a bipartisan consensus that they mainly serve not the public but the interests of the industries they regulate. Public bureaucracies have also been victims of the growing belief that private ownership is more efficient than state operation. A striking example of this trend occurred in Canada in 1996, when Parliament transferred the vital task of carrying on the country's air traffic control system from the government's transport department to a nonprofit firm created by the legislature.

Along with these developments, there has been a continuing expansion in both Europe and the USA of organizations in the nonprofit sector that administer programs that were once thought to lie within the exclusive domain of government. These nongovernmental agencies, or 'semi-public' bureaucracies as they might be called, supplement rather than supplant the work of public bureaucracies in such areas as health, welfare, and education, and much of their revenue actually comes from the government itself. One such organization in the international sphere—Medecins Sans Frontieres—received the Nobel prize for Peace in 1999 for its work in providing medical care and moral support for population groups in distress around the world.

See also: Administration in Organizations; Administrative Law; Bureaucracy and Bureaucratization; Bureaucratization and Bureaucracy, History of; Civil Service; Public Policy Schools; Public Sector Organizations; Think Tanks

Bibliography

- De Tocqueville A 1955 The Old Regime and the French Revolution. 1st edn., Doubleday, Garden City, NY
 Galnoor I (ed.) 1977 Government Secrecy in Democracies. Harper and Row, New York
 Gidron B, Kramer R M, Salamon L M (eds.) 1992 Government and the Third Sector. Jossey-Bass, Inc., San Francisco
 Huddleston M W, Boyer W W 1996 The Higher Civil Service in the United States: Quest for Reform. University of Pittsburgh Press, Pittsburgh, PA
 Kaufman H 1976 Are Government Organizations Immortal? Brookings Institution, Washington, DC
 Rourke F E 1984 Bureaucracy, Politics, and Public Policy. Little, Brown, Boston

F. E. Rourke

Public Commemoration

Public commemoration is a matrix of activity, through which social groups express 'a collective shared knowledge ... of the past, on which a group's sense of unity and individuality is based' (Assmann 1995) The group that organizes the commemoration inherits earlier meanings attached to the event, as well as adding new meanings. Their activity is crucial to the presentation and preservation of commemorative forms. When such groups disperse or disappear, commemoration loses its initial force, and may fade away entirely.

Public commemoration is therefore a process with a life history. It has an initial, creative phase; followed by a period of institutionalization and routinization. Such markings of the calendar can last for decades, or be abruptly halted. In most instances, the date and place of commemoration fade away with the passing of the social groups which initiated the practice.

Commemoration operates on many levels of aggregation and touches many facets of associative life. While commemorative forms were familiar in the ancient and medieval period, they have proliferated in more recent times. Consequently, the subject has attracted much discussion in social scientific literature. We therefore concentrate on public commemoration in the epoch of the nation state, primarily in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

In the modern period, most commemorative events were marked distinctively and separately from the religious calendar. There has been, though, some overlap. Armistice Day, 11 November, in countries remembering the end of the 1914–18 war, is close enough to the Catholic feast of All Saints on 2 November; in some countries with a large Catholic population, the two days occupy a semisacred space of public commemoration. The day marking the end of the Second World War in Europe, 8 May, is also the Saint's day of Joan of Arc. Those engaging in commemorative acts on that day may be addressing the secular celebration or the Catholic one; some celebrate the two together.

Commemoration is an act arising out of a conviction, shared by a broad community, that the moment recalled is both significant and informed by a moral message. Moments of national humiliation are rarely commemorated, although here too there are exceptions of a hortatory kind. 'Never again' is the hallmark of public commemoration on the Israeli Day of Remembrance for victims of the Nazi persecution of the Jews. Where moral doubts persist about a war or public policy, commemorative moments are hard to fix. That is why there is no date commemorating the end of the Algerian War in France, or the end of the Vietnam War in the USA. There was no moral consensus about the nature of the conflict; hence there was no moral consensus about what was being remembered in public, and when was the appropriate time to remember it (Prost 1999).

1. Commemoration and Political Power

Much of the scholarly debate about commemoration concerns the extent to which it is an instrument of the dominant political elements in a society. One school of opinion emphasizes the usefulness to political elites of public events establishing the legitimacy of their rule (Nora 1984–92). Some such events are observed whoever is in power—witness Bastille Day in France or Independence Day in the USA. But other events are closely tied to the establishment of a new regime and the overthrow of an older one: 7 November was the date in the calendar marking the Bolshevik revolution and establishing the Communist regime in power in Russia. That date symbolized the new order and its challenge to its world-wide enemies. May Day similarly was a moment when labor movements, and Labor parties in power, publicly demonstrated their place in history.

This top-down approach proclaims the significance of commemoration as a grammar of national, imperial or political identity. Anzac Day, 25 April, is celebrated as the moment when the Australian nation was born. It commemorates the landing of Australian and New Zealand troops as part of the British-led expeditionary force sent to Turkey in 1915. The fact that the landing was a failure does not diminish the iconic character of the date to Australians. It is the day, they hold, when their nation came of age (Inglis 1992).

By no means are all commemorative activities associated with warfare. The birthdates of monarchs or deceased presidents are marked in similar ways. Queen Victoria's birthday, 24 May, was Empire Day in Britain; now (2000) it is celebrated as Commonwealth Day. The creation of such commemorative dates was part of a wider movement of what some scholars have termed 'the invention of tradition.' That is, at the end of the nineteenth century, new nation states and preeminent imperial powers deepened the repertoire of their ceremonial activity. Such flourishes of the majesty of power were then immediately sanctified by a spurious pedigree. To display ceremonies with a supposed link to ancient habits or forms located in a foggy and distant past created an effective cover for political innovation, instability or insecurity (MacKenzie 1986, Ranger and Hobsbawm 1986).

This functionalist interpretation of commemoration has been challenged. A second school of scholarship emphasizes the ways that public commemoration has the potential for dominated groups to contest their subordinate status. However much political leaders or their agents try to choreograph commemorative activity, there is much space for subversion or creative interpretation of the official commemorative script. Armistice Day, 11 November, was, for different groups, a moment for both the celebration and the denigration of military values. Pacifists announced their message of 'Never again' through their presence at commemorative ceremonies; military men used these moments to glorify the profession of arms, and to demonstrate the duty of citizens, if necessary, to give their lives for their country in a future war. The contradictions in these forms of expression on the same day were never resolved (Gregory 1994, Winter 1999).

This alternative interpretation of the political meaning of commemorative activity emphasizes the multi-vocal character of remembrance. From this point of view, there is always a chorus of voices in commemorations; some are louder than others, but they never sound alone. Decentering the history of commemoration ensures that we recognize the regional, local, and idiosyncratic character of such activities.

Very occasionally, these dissonant voices come together. Between 1919 and 1938 in Britain, there was a two-minute silence observed throughout the country. Telephonists pulled the plugs on all conversations. Traffic stopped. The normal flow of life was arrested. Then the Second World War intervened, and such disruption to war production was not in the national interest. Thereafter the two-minute silence was moved to the Sunday nearest 11 November. But in the two decades between the Wars, it was a moment of national reflection. Mass Observation, a pioneering social survey organization, asked hundreds of ordinary people in Britain what they thought about during the silence. The answer was that they thought not of the nation or of victory or of armies, but of the men who were not there. This silence was a meditation about absence. As such it moved away from political orchestration into the realm of family history. To be sure, families commemorated their own within a wider social and political framework. But the richest texture of remembrance was always within family life. This intersection of the public and the private, the macro-historical and the micro-historical, is what has given commemoration in the twenty-first century its power and its rich repertoire of forms.

2. The Business of Remembering

Commemoration is and always has been a business. It costs money; it requires specialists' services; it needs funding and, over time, re-funding. There are two kinds of expenditure we can trace in the history of commemoration. The first is capital expenditure; the second is recurrent expenditure.

The land for such sites must be purchased; and an appropriate symbolic form must be designed and then constructed to focus remembrance activities. The first step may require substantial sums of public money. Private land, especially in urban areas, comes at a premium. Then there are the costs of architects' fees, especially when a public competitive tender is offered inviting proposals from professionals. Finally, once the symbolic form is chosen, it must be constructed out of selected materials and finished according to the architect's or artist's designs.

When these projects are national in character, the process of production is in the public eye. National art schools and bodies of 'experts' have to have their say. Standards of 'taste' and 'decorum' are proclaimed. Professional interests and conflicts come into play.

Much of this professional infighting is confined to national commemorative projects, but the same complex stepwise procedure occurs on the local level too, this time without the same level of attendant publicity. Local authorities usually take charge of these projects, and local notables can deflect plans towards their own particular visions, whatever public opinion may think about the subject.

Most of the time, public funding covers only part of the costs of commemorative objects. Public subscriptions are critical, especially in Protestant countries where the concept of utilitarian memorials is dominant. In Catholic countries, the notion of a 'useful' memorial is a contradiction in terms; symbolic language and utilitarian language are deemed mutually exclusive. But the Protestant voluntary traditions has it otherwise. In Protestant countries, commemorative projects took many forms, from the sacred to the mundane: in Britain there are memorial wards in hospitals, memorial scholarships in schools and universities, alongside memorial cricket pitches and memorial water troughs for horses. In the USA and in Australia there are memorial highways. The rule of thumb is that private citizens pick up most of the tab for these memorial forms. The state provides subsidies and occasional matching grants, but the money comes out of the pockets of ordinary people. The same is true in Britain with respect to a very widely shared form of public commemoration: the purchase of paper poppies, the symbol of the Lost Generation of the First World War. These poppies are worn on the lapel, and the proceeds of the sale go to aid disabled veterans and their families.

Recurrent expenditure for commemorative sites is almost always paid for by taxpayers. War cemeteries require masons and gardeners. The Imperial (now Commonwealth) War Graves Commission looks after hundreds of such cemeteries all over the world. The cost of their maintenance is a public charge. Private charities, in particular Christian groups, maintain German war cemeteries. Once constructed, memorial statues, cemeteries, or highways also become public property, and require public support to prevent them from decomposing. They are preserved as sites of commemorative activity.

Much of this activity is directed towards inviting the public to remember in public. This means directed the public towards particular sites of remembrance. Some of them are nearby their homes. In Britain and France there are war memorials in every city, in every town, and in every village; it is there that Armistice Day ceremonies are held annually. Churches throughout Europe of all denominations have memorial plaques to those who died in war. Special prayers were added to the Jewish prayer book to commemorate the victims of the Nazis in the Second World War, and later, those who died on active service in the Israeli army.

Remembrance in local houses of worship or at war memorials required that the public travel a short distance from their homes to sites of remembrance. But given the scale of losses in the two World Wars, and the widely dispersed cemeteries around the world in which lie the remains of millions of such men and women, the business of remembrance also entails international travel. Such voyages start as pilgrimage; many are mixed with tourism (Lloyd 1998). But in either case, there are train and boat journeys to take; hotel rooms to reserve; guides to hire; flowers to lay at graves; trinkets and mementos to purchase. In some places, museums have arisen to tell more of the story the pilgrims have come to hear and to share. There too money is exchanged along with the narratives and the symbols of remembrance.

This mixture of the sacred and the profane is hardly an innovation. It is merely a secular form of the kind of pilgrimage, for example, that made San Juan de Compostela in Spain the destination of millions of men and women in the middle ages who came to honor the conventionally designated resting place of the remains of one of the original Apostles. Pilgrimage to war cemeteries is public commemoration over long, sometimes very long, distances. Today (2000) thousands of Australians make the journey to Gallipoli, on the border between Asia and Europe, to be there for the dawn service on 25 April (as we have already noted), the day of the Anzac landing in 1915. Where does pilgrimage stop and tourism take over? It is impossible to say, but in all cases, the business of remembrance remains just that—a business.

3. Aesthetic Redemption

Public commemoration is not only a set of political gestures and material tasks. It is also an art form, the art of arranging and interpreting signifying practices. This field of action can be analyzed on two different levels: the first is aesthetic; the second is semiotic. The two are intimately related.

Some national commemorative forms are distinctive. Others are shared by populations in many countries. The figure of Marianne as the national symbol of the French Republic could not be used in Germany or Britain. The German Iron Cross, on commemorative plaques, denotes the location and the tradition in which commemoration is expressed. Germany's heroes' forests or fortresses are also imbricated in Teutonic history.

At times the repertoire of one country's symbols overlap with that of others, even when they were adversaries. After the First World War, the first industrialized war fought among fully industrialized nations, many commemorative forms adopted medieval notation. Throughout Europe, the revolutionary character of warfare was marked by a notation of a backward-looking kind. Medieval images of heroic and saintly warriors recaptured a time when combat was between individuals, rather than the impersonal and unbalanced duel between artillery and human flesh. The war in the air took on the form and romance of chivalry. On the losing and the winning sides, medievalism flourished.

On war memorials, the human form survived. In some instances, classical images of male beauty were chosen to mark the 'lost generation'; others adopted more stoical and emphatically untriumphalist poses of men in uniform. In most cases, victory was either partially or totally eclipsed by a sense of overwhelming loss. Within this aesthetic landscape, traditional Christian motifs were commonplace. The form of the grieving mother—Stabat Mater—brought women into the local and national constellation of grief.

In Protestant countries, the aesthetic debate took on a quasireligious character. War memorials with crosses on them offended some Protestants, who believed that the Reformation of the sixteenth century precluded such 'Catholic' notation. Obelisks were preferable. In France, war memorials were by law restricted to public and not church grounds, although many local groups found a way around this prescription. In schools and universities, the location of such memorials touched on such issues. Some were placed in sacred space—in chapels—semisacred space—around chapels—or in secular space. Public thoroughfares and train stations also housed such lists of men who had died in war.

Twentieth-century warfare democratized bereavement. Previously armies were composed of mercenaries, volunteers, and professionals. After 1914, Everyman went to war. The social incidence of war losses was thereby transformed. In Britain, France and Germany, virtually every household had lost someone—a father, a son, a brother, a cousin, a friend. Given the nature of static warfare on the Western front, many—perhaps half—of those killed had no known grave. Consequently, commemorative forms highlighted names above all. The names of the dead were all that remained of them, and chiseled in stone or etched on plaques, these names were the foci of public commemoration on both the local and the national scale.

This essential practice of naming set the pattern for commemorative forms after the Second World War and beyond. After 1945, names were simply added to Great War memorials. This was partly in recognition of the links between the two twentieth-century conflicts; partly it was a matter of economy. After the Vietnam war, naming still mattered, and First World War forms inspired memorials, most notably Maya Lin's Vietnam Veterans' Memorial in Washington. Her work clearly drew on Sir Edwin Lutyens's memorial to the missing of the Battle of the River Somme at Thiepval, inaugurated in 1932.

By the latter decades of the twentieth century, artistic opinion and aesthetic tastes had changed sufficiently to make abstraction the key language of commemorative expression. Statues and installations thereby escaped from specific national notation and moved away from the earlier emphasis upon the human figure. The exception to the rule is Soviet commemorative art, which resolutely stuck to the path of heroic romanticism in marking out the meaning of what they called the Great Patriotic War. In many instances in Western Europe, but by no means all, forms which suggested absence or nothingness replaced classical, religious or romantic notions in commemorative art.

This aesthetic shift had important social and political implications. Great War commemorative forms had sought out some meaning, some significance in the enormous loss of life attending that conflict. There was an implicit warning in many of these monuments. 'Never again' was there ultimate meaning. But 'never' had lasted a bare 20 years. Thus after the Second World War, the search for meaning became infinitely more complex. And the fact that more civilians died than soldiers in the Second World War made matters even more difficult to configure in art.

Finally, the extreme character of two elements of the Second World War challenged the capacity of art—any art—to express a sense of loss when it is linked to genocidal murder or thermonuclear destruction. Both Auschwitz and Hiroshima defied conventional notations of 'meaning,' although some individuals continue to try to rescue redemptive elements from them both. The construction of a national Holocaust memorial at the Brandenburg gate in Berlin, the construction of which began in 1999, is a case in point (Young 1999). The debate over this and similar projects does not abate, since such events seem to force all participants—public officials, the public, survivors, architects, artists—to the limits of representation and beyond.

4. Ritual

Public commemoration is an activity defined by the gestures and words of those who come together to remember the past. It is rarely the simple reflection of a fixed text, a script rigidly prepared by political leaders determined to fortify their position of power. Inevitably, commemoration overlaps with political conflicts, but it can never be reduced to a simple reflection of power relationships.

There are at least three stages in the history of rituals surrounding public commemoration. The first we have already dealt with: the construction of a commemorative form. But there are two other levels in the life history of monuments which need attention. The second is the grounding of ritual action in the calendar, and the routinization of such activities; the third is their transformation or their disappearance as active sites of memory.

One case in point may illustrate this trajectory. The date of 1 July 1916 is not a national holiday in Britain; but it marks the date of the opening of the British offensive on the river Somme, an offensive which symbolized the terrible character of industrial warfare. On that day the British army suffered the highest casualty totals in its history; on that day a volunteer army, and the society that had created it, were introduced to the full terrors of twentieth-century warfare. To this day, groups of people come to the Somme battlefields to mark this day, without national legislation to enable them to do so. There are locally-defined rituals. In France, 11 November is a national holiday, but not in Britain. Legislation codifies activities the origins and force of which lie on the local level.

Public commemoration flourishes within the orbit of civil society. This is not true in countries where dictatorships rule; Stalinist Russia smashed civil society to a point that it could not sustain commemorative activity independent of the party and the state (Merridale 1999). But elsewhere, local associations matter.

And so do families. Commemorative ritual survives when it is inscribed within the rhythms of community and, in particular, family life. Public commemoration lasts when it draws about overlaps between national history and family history. Most of those who take the time to engage in the rituals of remembrance bring with them memories of family members touched by these vast events. This is what enables people born long after wars and revolutions to commemorate them as essential parts of their own lives. For example, children born in the aftermath of the First World War told the story of their family upbringing to grandchildren born 60 or 70 years later. This transmission of childhood memories over two or sometimes three generations gives family stories a power which is translated at times into activity—the activity of remembrance (Winter and Sivan 1999).

This framework of family transmission of narratives about the past is an essential part of public commemoration. It also helps us understand why some commemorative forms are changed or simply fade away. When the link between family life and public commemoration is broken, a powerful prop of remembrance is removed. Then, in a short time, remembrance atrophies and fades away. Public reinforcements may help keep alive the ritual and practice of commemoration. But the event becomes hollow when removed from the myriad small-scale social units that breathed life into it in the first place.

At that moment, commemorative sites and practices can be revived and reappropriated. The same sites used for one purpose can be used for another. But most of the time, commemorative forms live through their life cycle, and like the rest of us, inevitably fade away. This natural process of dissolution closes the circle on public commemoration. And rightly so, since it arises out of the needs of groups of people to link their lives with salient events in the past. When that need vanishes, so does the glue that holds together the social practice of commemoration. Then collective memories fade away.

We have reached, therefore, a quixotic conclusion. Public commemoration is both irresistible and unsustainable. Time and again people have come together in public to seek meaning in vast events in the past and try to relate them to their own smaller networks of social life. These associations are bound to dissolve, to be replaced by other forms, with other needs, and other histories. At that point, the characteristic trajectory of public commemoration—creation, institutionalization, and decomposition—comes to an end.

See also: Collective Identity and Expressive Forms; Collective Memory, Anthropology of; Collective Memory, Psychology of; Media Events; Pilgrimage; Public Sphere and the Media; Ritual

Bibliography

- Assmann J 1995 Collective memory and cultural identity. New German Critique 65: 125–34 (esp. 132)
- Gregory A 1994 The Silence of Memory. Berg, Leamington Spa, UK
- Inglis K 1992 World War One memorials in Australia. Guerres Mondiales et Conflits Contemporains 167: 51–8
- Lloyd D 1998 Battlefield Tourism: Pilgrimage and the Commemoration of the Great War in Britain, Australia and Canada, 1919–1939. Berg, Oxford, UK
- MacKenzie J (ed.) 1986 Imperialism and Popular Culture. Manchester University Press, Manchester, UK
- Merridale C 1999 War, death and remembrance in Soviet Russia. In: Winter J, Sivan E (eds.) War and Remembrance in the Twentieth Century. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK, pp. 61–83
- Nora P (ed.) 1984–92 Les Lieux de Mémoire. Gallimard, Paris
- Prost A 1999 The Algerian War in French collective memory. In: Winter J, Sivan E (eds.) War and Remembrance in the Twentieth Century. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK pp. 161–76
- Ranger T, Hobsbawm E (eds.) 1986 The Invention of Tradition. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Winter J 1999 Sites of Memory, Sites of Mourning: the Great War in European Cultural History. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Winter J, Sivan E 1999 Setting the framework. In: Winter J, Sivan E (eds.) War and Remembrance in the Twentieth Century. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK, pp. 1–40
- Young J E 1999 Berlin's Holocaust Memorial: a report to the Bundestag Committee on Media and Culture. German Politics and Society 17(3): 54–70

J. Winter

Public Good, The: Cultural Concerns

From the inception of political theory to twenty-first century reflections on democracy and the welfare state, the ideal of public good has consistently been linked to the sociomoral resource of civic spirit. This is so insofar as the ideal of the public good claims civic spirit from a society's citizens, while the presence of civic spirit is an indispensable premise for any orientation toward the public good.

Through such a circular linkage, the ideal has gained strategic importance as an element of political rhetoric catalyzing a process of normative self-limitation, due to conditions at play in the democratic public sphere.

1. The Public Good in the History of Political Ideas

From time immemorial, the idea of the public good has been a fixed quantity in debates concerning legal, economic, and political forms of social cooperation. For example, in ancient Egypt, Pharaoh's duty to see to the welfare of his subjects was considered an element of Ma'at, the world-order connecting human beings to the gods; and in Islamic legal doctrine, the normative standard for the legal-religious community, maslaha, can be interpreted as similar to the idea of the public good. The concept's occidental career began in ancient Greece. Plato distinguished the public good from private profit, linking the former to the idea of justice (Plato 1993, 420 b–c, 421 a–c). Aristotle followed Plato in this respect (Aristotle 1990, III./VII./1); but in contrast to Plato he did not equate the just state with an authoritarian pedagogic utopia. Rather, he understood the public good to involve a political limitation on the right to rule, demarcating a difference between the proper constitutional form, which acknowledges such a good, and the improper, serving the ruler's interests (Aristotle 1990, III./IV./7). The political thinking of Roman republicanism focused on reconciling individual interests with the public good, the legal system here taking on special meaning. But even at this early period, lamenting at a loss of orientation around the public good—this seen as the source of a growing danger to the republic—is a predominant theme.

The redemptive orientation of the early Christian fathers transcended the antique approach to the public good, depoliticizing it in the process. But within scholasticism, the dogma of the subordination of earthly existence to the divine order again received a ruler-limiting and hence political accent. In his Summa Theologiae, Thomas Aquinas defined a regime as unjust tyranny when the ruler does not strive for the public good but for his private benefit (1952, Pars IIa, IIae, q.42, a.2). Subjects can here thus evoke the public good, placed higher than the ruler's interests, in opposition to the ruler; and the ruler can appeal to the public good to justify his actions. In this manner, a struggle emerged regarding semantic supremacy over the concept of public good—the concept being capable of both limiting and legitimizing political rule. If the ruler could claim to be enacting the public good, nothing stood in the way of his rule; to be sure, the latter was then limited through involvement of the estates—such involvement being inextricably bound up with the idea of public good in the medieval world of political ideas (Eberhard 1993).

Whereas into the early modern period, self-interest and the public good represented 'asymmetrical counterconcepts' in Reinhart Koselleck's sense, i.e., 'binary concepts with claims to universality ... involving a mutual recognition of the parties involved' (Koselleck 1985), the Reformation saw the onset of a relativization process. Set in motion by the 1555 Peace of Augsburg, the increased individualization in estate-bound society was accompanied by a normative transformation, its import captured in Leonhard Fronsberger's initial (at the time singular) praise of self-interest. This already reflected an important paradigm shift that would unfold over three decades, replacing the old European ideal of political virtue, in the sense of the citizen's voluntary orientation toward the public good (Münkler 1991). Instead, rational self-interest now emerged as a core political-theoretical concept. Its immediate context was a market society in the course of self-differentiation, with the state now simply expected to set the conditions for maximized economic well-being of the citizenry in a civil society. By turning the inherited conceptual opposition of public good and self-interest upside down, Bernard Mandeville's The Fable of the Bees (1929; its first, pamphlet form appearing in 1795 as The Grumbling Hive or Knaves turn'd Honest) played a key part in this transformative process. 'Private vices, public benefits' was Mandeville's credo. The end effect of each individual pursuing his private good is the greatest possible advantage for the polity, so that one, particular maxim prevails: 'The worst of all the Multitude Did something for the Common Good' (Mandeville 1929). Admittedly, this construct is based on citizens being in a position to pursue their own interests rationally; and Mandeville remained skeptical regarding his own theory's implicit premise. In fact, he demanded state intervention to check the loss of civic spirit—particularly feared on account of short-sightedness and ignorance when it came to the needs of following generations.

In respect to this general problem, Adam Smith was essentially more optimistic. Bringing Mandeville's idea to a head, he saw a mechanism at work that produces a common benefit in direct proportion to efforts at its opposite. The citizen, he argued, 'generally, indeed, neither intends to promote the public interest, ... he intends only his own gain, and he is in this, as in many other cases, led by an invisible hand to promote an end which was no part of his intention' (Smith 1981). With this argument, Adam Smith in a way achieved liberalism's semantic coup vis-à-vis the public good. Through the definition of the public good as a wondrous result of well-understood self-interest—a predictable product of the individual's egoistic maxi-mization of advantage—the asymmetric conceptual opposition between self-interest and public good, already relativized by Mandeville, was enduringly destroyed (Bohlender 1998). Reflecting the advent of modern contractual theory, this way of thinking can lead to the sort of relativizing of the idea of public good that we find in Kant: a complete focus on formal legal principles, and the treatment of the sociomoral qualities and intentions of both rulers and the ruled as a secondary matter. Kant, however, was not the final word in the long conceptual history of the public good, for speaking up against him, Hegel had already insisted that 'the so-called "general good," the welfare of the state, i.e., the right of mind actual and concrete, is quite a different sphere, a sphere in which abstract right is a subordinate moment like particular welfare and the happiness of the individual' (Hegel 1942, Sect. 126 Remark).

In the twentieth century, the notion of public good was subject to steady abuse: first by the Nazis, who used the empty phrase 'the common interest precedes self-interest' as propaganda for its collectivist 'you are nothing; your Volk is everything' ideology, then by the Bolsheviks. As a consequence, a refusal substantively to define the public good and how it is to be realized, once and for all, has emerged as an identifying trait of proponents of freedom and democracy. Rather, through use of democratic procedures, society needs constantly to arrive at a consensus regarding the concept—a consensus subject to revision. This does not preclude the pluralistic process of opinion formation being oriented toward normative concepts of public good with universal, i.e., ubiquitous and extra-temporal claims to validity: the natural-law claims, for instance, staked by Catholic advocates of social transformation. In the context of, among other things, a global ecological crisis, such universal claims have been further developed into a concept of a worldwide public good.

2. Public Good and Civic Spirit

This overview of the conceptual history of 'public good' points to two basic features. First, it represents a functional formal concept with effects that vary considerably according to the context of usage and semantic competence. It can, for instance, serve for both the legitimation and limitation of rule. The renunciation by democratic societies of an a priori, essentialist understanding of the public good can thus be seen as a consequence of the insight into its semantic indeterminacy having become manifest in the course of time.

Second, precisely when thematized from a democratic perspective, the concept of public good needs to be viewed in connection with another central theme of political theory, namely, civic virtue or civic spirit, which Mandeville had already addressed in his skeptical fable. Against the contractualistic tendency to place an economic model of order in the foreground, Montesquieu, for example, had stressed that, more than is the case with any other form of state, democracies must see to it that their citizens identify with the public good. For a republic, he indicates, needs 'a continuous preference of the public interest over one's own' (Montesquieu 1989, IV, 5)—and this without the state force that Mandeville speaks of. The emphasis on this voluntariness underscores the importance of a minimum of civic spirit (or civic virtue) as an indispensable premise for any orientation toward the public good. The ideal of public good sets the norms for the behavior of a commonwealth's free citizens; it needs, however, the preliminary presence of some degree of civic virtue as a willingness to act according to normative ideals in the first place. As such a preliminary, motivational specification for any orientation toward the public good, civic spirit emerges as a prepolitical basis for the political, only capable of being inadequately guaranteed by democratic politics, which may not control (or even guide) the citizenry's motivations (Böckenförde 1991, Goodin 1992).

In this sense, civic spirit is a nonrenewable sociomoral resource (as the metaphor of social capital suggests, by alluding to the economic understanding of 'capital') and hence it ought to be neither undertaxed nor overtaxed. Undertaxing occurs when, for instance, the solidarity every society needs increasingly becomes a form of institutional machinery (Gunnar Myrdal), creating an impression among individual citizens that the state is itself removing all required acts of solidarity from their own purview. Overtaxing is apparent when the political-social unit subject to the norms set by the public good exceeds a certain size, the imagination of belonging and reciprocal interdependence required for public good thus no longer being capable of production. This is all the more likely when such extension is a successive process making use of moral appeals and excessive public-good rhetoric with visible semantic development. Old European republicanism already saw the erosion of a society's sociomoral resources being threatened here; and communitarianism confirms this in referring to the need for supportive habits, the experience of personal identification, and one's own acts of solidarity (Bellah et al. 1985, 1991, Walzer 1983). But even Adam Smith's trust in the invisible hand was tied to the premise of a limited, overseeable marketplace: one guaranteeing that consumers could themselves sanction an egoistic benefit-maximization spurred forward at their own cost.

A game-theoretical analysis using postulates of rational choice backs up this assumption of a link between, on the one hand, a group subject to public-good norms having a comprehensible size, and, on the other hand, civic virtue (or civic spirit) as the readiness to follow these norms. Take, for example, a group of people who visit an expensive restaurant, having agreed together to share the costs equally regardless of the different prices of individual orders: the factors determining the choice between self-interest and cooperation are the group's size, communicative capacity, and duration. In this manner, we can perceive the expectation of cooperation as a decisive element in the calculation of individual benefit—thus rendering civic spirit an explicable quantity of political-social action (Glance and Huberman 1994).

But not only democracy-theoretical factors connect the two basic features of the political idea of the public good—the fact that it represents a functional formal concept, and its immanent ties to civic spirit. The ongoing debate over the future of the Western welfare-state model underscores an interesting variation on the historically familiar semantics of public good and civic spirit. It is evident, for instance, in an argument regarding distribution: policies misperceived as a guarantee of welfare by the state produce a situation in which egoistic benefit-maximization can no longer further the public good, but—caught up in an illiberal system of administrative care—simply results in an exploitation of social output. According to this argument, a welfare state oriented towards a false ideal of public good effects something like an amputation of the invisible hand conjured up by Adam Smith; it does so by gradually diminishing the productive readiness of its members—hence eroding its own sociomoral basis, the free and responsible engagement of its citizens. Without the sociomoral resource of civic spirit, the development of active and productive self-interest—the self-interest that promotes the public good—is paternalistically thwarted. What remains is passive and unproductive self-interest: the sort damaging the public good.

3. The Public Good as a Political Concept

The meaning of the public good as a political concept—one through which interest-conflicts are consistently played out as interpretive struggles—emerges not least of all in this rhetorical mode of a differing public-good semantics. With the satisfaction of one's own demands being represented as a general advantage, precisely this theme has the merit of masking a variety of self-interests. As has been shown in an empirical study of the orientation of different German industrial organizations toward the public good, participating in such interpretive struggles has now basically become compulsory. For those failing to offer a 'declaration of public good' risk finding their positions cast under the suspicion of group-egoism and irrationality. Lack of responsibility and self-inflicted damage then emerge as the discrediting political-semantic labels (Vobruba 1992, Luhmann 1990, 2000). Once the connection between public good and civic spirit is established, political rhetoric can even have its effect as self-fulfilling prophecy. This is the case when an impression of general decline in civic spirit is awakened among the citizenry, in turn prompting a politically-induced disappointment, defined by Albert O. Hirschman as the basis for withdrawal into the self-interested, private sphere: a disappointment cyclically alternating with periods of engagement for the public good (Hirschman 1982).

We can thus discern one particular continuity between the medieval and contemporary approach to the public good: the effort at a monopoly over its definition as constituting a central element of political conflict. Now as before, the theme can be invoked both as a basis for political demands and proposals for reform and, as it were, a 'governmental concept' meant to defend individual claims of a various interest groups. The latter function involves the government's task being depicted as to protect the public good from damaging special interests—even if such a protective function in a pluralistic democracy itself requires validation. In this respect, the breadth of the concept's variations—taking the form, as well, of common good, common weal, and public interest, each with its own fine shade of meaning—offers a rich range of possibilities for political communication.

Nevertheless, accompanying these different rhetorical functions, the idea of the public good consistently retains what—broadly speaking—constitutes a normative dimension: this as a result of the self-limitation necessarily imposed on anyone claiming to orient his political behavior toward the public good. Such a limitation furnishes a check on any purely strategic exploitation of the rhetoric of public good. Those invoking the concept in public debate reveal great expectations regarding the total effect on the welfare state of the policies they are enacting or defending. (This remains the case even when the invocation serves to rebuff claims and demands tendered by various social groupings.) At the same time, they are publicly aligning themselves with a standard against which they and their policies are to be measured due to conditions at play in the democratic public sphere. In this sense, invoking the public good involves a self-limitation by society's political agents.

To this extent, its status as a functional formal concept contradicts neither the public good's normative dimension, resulting from the obligation of honesty in democratic politics, nor its political relevance. This leads once more to both the extreme attitudes toward the public good mentioned above. On the one hand, the radically individualistic view sees free-market mechanisms without bureaucratic restriction or attempts at political steering as the best way to promote the public good. Beside the fact that such a radical view must ignore the linkage between the public good and the sociomoral resource of civic spirit we have been discussing, the use of public-good rhetoric not only by politicians, but also by representatives of society's other functional systems, indicates that the ideal of the public good is an inevitable category for any public action, particularly within the political system. At the same time, the conditions of pluralistic democracy exclude any substantialistic and durably valid definition of the public good a priori, as characterizing totalitarian ideologies. In a pluralistic democracy, the public good is necessarily an 'open' formula, comprising a valid norm only if it can be freely accepted by all of the individuals who are affected by it. The application of this Habermasian idea to the ideal of the public good points to the limits of its validity, as well as its importance as a core concept of political thought and practice.

See also: Altruism and Prosocial Behavior, Sociology of; Citizenship, Historical Development of; Citizenship: Sociological Aspects; Civic Culture; Civil Society/Public Sphere, History of the Concept; Individualism versus Collectivism: Philosophical Aspects; Public Goods: International; Virtue Ethics

Bibliography

- Aristotle 1990 Politics. In: Aristotle in Twenty-three Volumes. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA, Vol. 21
- Bellah R N, Madsen R, Sullivan W M, Swindler A, Tipton S M 1985 Habits of the Heart. Individualism and Commitment in American Life. University of California Press, Berkeley, CA
- Bellah R N, Madsen R, Sullivan W M, Swindler A, Tipton S M 1991 The Good Society. Knopf, New York
- Böckenförde E W 1991 State, Society and Liberty. Studies in Political Theory and Constitutional Law. Berg, New York
- Bohlender M 1998 Government, Commerce und Civil Society. Zur Genealogie der schottischen politischen Ökonomie. In: Kaelble H, Schriewer J (eds.) Gesellschaften im Vergleich. Peter Lang, Frankfurt, Germany, pp. 115–47
- Eberhard W 1993 Herrscher und Stände. In: Politisches Denken in der Zeit der Reformation. In: Fetscher I, Münkler H (eds.) Pipers Handbuch der politischen Ideen. Vol. 2: Mittelalter: Von den Anfängen des Islams bis zur Reformation. Piper, München, Germany, pp. 467–551
- Glance N S, Huberman B A 1994 The dynamics of social dilemmas. Scientific American 270: 76–82
- Goodin R E 1992 Motivating Political Morality. Blackwell, Cambridge, MA
- Hegel G W F 1942 Hegel's Philosophy of Right. Clarendon, Oxford, UK
- Hirschman A O 1982 Shifting Involvements. Private Interest and Public Action. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Koselleck R 1985 Futures Past. On the Semantics of Historical Time. MIT Press, Cambridge, MA
- Luhmann N 1990 Political Theory in the Welfare State. W de Gruyter, Berlin
- Luhmann N 2000 Die Politik der Gesellschaft. Suhrkamp, Frankfurt, Germany
- Mandeville B 1929 The Fable of the Bees: Or, Private Vices, Public Benefits. Clarendon, Oxford, UK
- Montesquieu C S 1989 The Spirit of Laws. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Münkler H 1991 Die Idee der Tugend. Ein politischer Leitbegriff im vorrevolutionären Europa. Archiv für Kulturgeschichte 73(2): 379–403

- Plato 1993 Republic. Oxford University Press, Oxford, UK
Smith A 1981 An Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations. Liberty Classics, Indianapolis, IN Thomas Aquinas 1952 S. Thomae Aquinatis Summa Theologiae. Marietti, Torino, Italy
Vobruba G 1992 Wirtschaftsverbände und Gemeinwohl. In: Mayntz R (ed.) Verbände zwischen Mitgliederinteressen und Gemeinwohl. Verlag Bertelsmann Stiftung, Gütersloh, Germany, pp. 80–121
Walzer M 1983 Spheres of Justice. A Defense of Pluralism and Equality. Basic Books, New York

H. Münkler and K. Fischer

Public Goods: International

International public goods are goods that are accessible to all at international level, the consumption of which by one individual does not reduce the possibility of consumption by other individuals. However, there are few public goods of this pure type. Instead, nearly all are characterized by mostly unlimited accessibility and simultaneous rival consumption, i.e., the use of the resource by one individual reduces the possibilities for others to consume this good. These types of goods are called common-pool resources. Where there is free accessibility and rival consumption, a collective action problem or social dilemma arises: how can the individual user be prevented from using the limited resource and jeopardizing the long-term utility of all as a result of maximizing their own short-term individual interest? A number of institutional possibilities exist to secure the provision of public goods and common-pool resources. However, the possibilities for collective action available at national level—such as legal prescriptions imposed by majority decision in order to force individual actors to comply with a scheme of collective action—are not all applicable at international level because of nation–state sovereignty. In what follows, public goods will first be defined, then different paths to the development of institutional answers to collective action problems will be presented, before different institutional modes of provision of public goods and common-pool resources and their possible implications will be discussed.

1. Definition of Public Goods

Public goods and common-pool resources—as stated above—may be defined by the analytic economic criteria of universal accessibility and (non-)rival consumption. These attributes may be properties that are inherent in the goods themselves, or they may be properties that are attributed to goods through societal consensus and/or political decision. In the older economic literature the central attributes of public goods—nonexcludability and nonrivalry (Samuelson 1954, Musgrave and Musgrave 1976)—have been regarded as sources of market failure, from which the need for state intervention has been derived. The problem with common-pool resources and public goods lies in their limited excludability. As a result, prices cannot be charged and hence private provision through the market is not feasible. More recently, economic theory (Cornes and Sandler 1996) has argued in a more differentiated way that an exception is the case where a particular actor has an incentive to provide a public good irrespective of the free-riding behavior of other beneficiaries. The same holds true when, in the case of a common-pool resource, the stakes of provision are high enough to induce co-operation among actors (Cornes and Sandler 1996). Only in cases where the private provision of common goods fails are governments called upon to remedy the market failure (Bator 1958). Another aspect from which public goods can be viewed is the phenomenon that some market activities generate external effects. Positive, as well as negative, external effects are not part of the actor's economic calculation and as a result they are under- or over-produced from an aggregate view. In the traditional perspective externalities are seen as by-products of economic activities and internalization of externalities traditionally has been viewed as a government task (Pigou 1920). However, in the 1960s a new interpretation started to dominate the economic literature. According to this view, Pareto-relevant externalities are internalized through market forces if property rights are well defined and transaction costs are sufficiently low (Coase 1960, Buchanan and Stubblebine 1962).

While economic theory views the properties of a public good as inherent attributes of such a good from which a specific institutional form of provision is deduced, political science goes beyond this notion to insist additionally on a processual view of common goods. It argues that what constitutes such a good and how it is provided for institutionally depends on specific situational and technological conditions, and, moreover, is determined in a political and social process. First, it is not clear in many cases what constitutes a public good or a common-pool resource in so far as there are no absolute and objective criteria for defining them in a general sense. Instead, what constitutes a public good depends in part on the specific situational context of provision and consumption of the good, and its technical properties.

Thus, the importance of a specific situational context for the definition of a good as a public good in terms of nonexcludability and nonrival consumption is illustrated by the example of the protection offered by the ozone layer vis-à-vis radiation for sunbathers, which is a public good in the classical sense. One sunbather enjoying the sun does not impinge upon the protection offered to other sunbathers. In this sense, the ozone layer is a public good, accessible to all with nonrival consumption. In another sense, however, it may be perceived as a common-pool resource. Seen in terms of the relationship between producers and sunbathers, and given that scientific research has identified a problem of scarcity in the ozone layer, certain productive activities, such as the production of refrigerators with chlorofluorocarbons, diminish the protective quality of the ozone layer and jeopardize the protection offered to all. This is rival consumption. In this specific context, the ozone layer constitutes a common-pool resource which is accessible to all and is depletable (Snidal 1986).

Technological innovation may force a reconsideration of the definition of a public good in cases where a good, which had hitherto been regarded as universally accessible and nondiminishable, has been rendered potentially excludable. A case in point is broadcasting. This good used to be accessible to all and of nonexcludable nature, but as a result of technological change, access to the good can now be limited to those paying for the service via a telematic coding system. Put in different terms: the transaction costs for establishing property rights were reduced drastically by technological progress so that the gains from excluding free riders and the precise allocation of user costs now exceed the costs of establishing property rights. Second, the definition of what constitutes a public good and what does not, may not necessarily be determined by 'objective' characteristics, but instead by political and social definition. There are huge cultural variations across polities and time as to what is considered a public good or common-pool resource and what is a private good. Thus, universal and free healthcare may be formulated as a political goal and consequently be considered as a common-pool resource in one polity. But in another, the same service may be regarded as a private good that each individual has to buy on the market. In the same way, policy makers in one society may decide that its provision should be left entirely to the buying power of the individual through the market. Hence, what constitutes a public good or common-pool resource can be answered either in terms of analytic economic criteria or in terms of a process of social and political definition. Once a good has been identified as a public good or a common-pool resource, the institutional mode of provision of the good has to be determined.

2. The Provision of Institutional Answers to a Collective Action Problem

Different paths may lead to an institutional answer for a stable solution for providing public goods at international level. The solutions may be designed intentionally, as is the case of international agreements. They may develop without being planned, as in a case of spontaneous coordination, for example, in the case of the standardization of products. Either way, once in place, they develop an institutional dynamism of their own and over a period of time they may transform the processes in the institution and, in turn, transform the preferences of the actors involved.

The intentional formulation of an institutional solution to a public-good problem may presuppose an acute awareness of an existing social dilemma and a need for collective action where there is cross-boundary problem interdependence. For example, in the case of an imminent cross-border environmental problem, an international conference will be convened that seeks to develop a format of cooperation. After a lengthy process of bargaining, institutional answers for solving the problem will be found and agreed. All those involved in the negotiations will seek to maximize their own interests, for example, by minimizing the implicated costs. In other words, institutional solutions to collective action problems are interpreted in terms of their distributional impacts on the actors involved (Knight 1995). In the great majority of cases, the negotiators do not all enjoy the same degree of power, and in the event of an agreement not being reached, the stronger actors may take up a fall-back position. While a solution may be desirable for them, they may not consider it vital. In other words they have more resources for negotiating an institutional solution. This route to an institutional solution, i.e., interest-oriented negotiation with a view to the distributional results, generally applies where the interests at stake are clear-cut and substantial. A case in point is the negotiation of CO₂ emission limits at international climate conferences. All the states engaged in the bargaining process, to find an institutional solution for reducing emissions, view the process in terms of its distributional impacts on the market position of domestic industries, and so forth. However, there are situations where collective action problems need to be solved and the actors involved do not really appreciate the nature of the problem at hand, much less which interests are at stake. Consequently, the preferences of the actors involved are uncertain. In such situations deliberation, exchange of arguments, and persuasion will prevail as the actors strive to reach, at best, a common perspective on the problem at hand together with possible solutions; or as a minimum, to establish clarity as to the different stakes involved (Knight and Johnson 1994). Only then does interest-oriented bargaining follow and asymmetries of interests and power come into play. Cases in point are complex environmental problems or the problem of providing more transparency and certainty in financial markets.

The second avenue for developing an institutional solution to a collective action problem is that of the spontaneous emergence, rather than the intentional development of a solution in a planned social interaction at international level. Here, the strategic uncertainty as to the preferences of other actors promotes behavior likely to resolve a social dilemma. It makes sense to shape other actors' perceptions of one's preferences and to give signals of willingness to coordinate and be trustworthy. These signals enable like-minded actors to locate others who are equally so, and who can in turn build up a reputation for responding cooperatively to trust (Bates 1988). Because actors prefer coordination as one of the outcomes, as opposed to noncoordination, they will use whatever salient information (focal point) they have in order to achieve that coordination (Schelling 1960). In time, other actors will follow suit, and a social convention is established which provides information about the future actions of others (Knight 1995). The focal point may be relatively contingent, but henceforth serves as a point of reference for future coordinating actions (Calvert 1986, Schelling 1960). Third, irrespective of the path along which an institutional solution develops, be it design or spontaneous emergence, once established, it gains a dynamism of its own. The institutional process then begins to develop its own rules beyond the formal and informal rules originally instituted, or interprets the original rules in the light of the day-to-day need to make decisions, thereby transforming and developing those rules incrementally (March and Olsen 1989). This process may change the preferences of the actors involved. As well as the path of development of an institutional solution to secure the provision of a public good or a common-pool resource, the specific context in which it is shaped and the institutional arrangements in which it is embedded have been discussed in the literature.

3. The Context and Institutional Mode of Provision

What is the general context and what are the more specific institutional and instrumental conditions in which the provision of a public good and a common-pool resource occurs? The overall question is: under which conditions do particular institutional arrangements apply particular instruments to produce favorable results for providing public goods at international level? With respect to the overall context, generally it is argued that the greater the number of participants involved in an attempt to resolve a social dilemma and the greater the heterogeneity of the actors involved, the greater the difficulty in arriving at a solution. In this sense, the prospects of an efficient solution to collective action problems for agreements at international level, with its heterogeneous actors and large numbers of participants, would appear to be bleak. However, as has been pointed out (Ostrom 1990, Martin 1994, Snidal 1984), this relationship is not as simple as it first appears. Heterogeneity may constitute a precondition for an actor to take the lead in organizing collective action because they have a specifically strong incentive for this action to be successful. Thus, the US has repeatedly acted as a hegemonic actor in cooperating with Western public and private actors when it comes to solving collective action problems such as sharing banking information to enable countries to uncover money-laundering (Schmidt 1995). Furthermore, the problem of coordinating an unwieldy number of actors is often alleviated by organizing the participants into groups according to commonly-shared criteria. Each group is represented by a speaker, as in the case of climate negotiations, thereby reducing the number of actors sitting at the bargaining table. Moreover, the extent to which homogeneity facilitates negotiations in collective action problems depends upon the nature of the homogeneity: if all actors are intent on having the same resource, homogeneity may render agreement difficult. If, by contrast, the preferences of actors differ over time and in intensity, they may be made complementary through issue-linkage (Martin 1994).

Beyond the general context conditions, various institutional arrangements and instruments are applied in the provision of public goods and common-pool resources at international level which determine the degree of success in solving the collective action problem. The institutional arrangement denotes the structure and the nature of the relationship among the actors involved; the instruments that are applied define how the desired behavior of the target actor is to be elicited. The basic types of institutional settings for providing public goods are hierarchy, negotiation, societal self-regulation, and markets (Mayntz 1997, Scharpf 1999). Hierarchy is an arrangement in which a central actor (government) has an electoral mandate that permits it to legislate specific provisions, such as the statutory requirement to use a fully regulated catalytic converter, with noncompliance being sanctioned in order to protect the quality of ambient air. Thus, legal obligation is backed up by a bureaucratic apparatus to ensure implementation. In an international context, hierarchy as an institutional arrangement for providing public goods and protecting common-pool resources can only be applied to a very limited extent. However, even in international negotiations among sovereign states seeking to solve a collective action problem, a certain amount of initiative needs to be taken by one or a group of actors if public goods are to be provided jointly. As a result, we find power being yielded by central actors in varying degrees in order to facilitate cooperation. Thus, a central body may consist of member-actors who only make framework decisions that subsequently are made more specific by actors at the decentral level, or the central body may delegate power to members to implement the decisions. However, it is also conceivable that the outcome of autonomous actors cooperating voluntarily is strict implementation by command-and-control once a decision is agreed. Depending on whether the decision is vaguely, as opposed to precisely, formulated the ensuing latitude for such actors is either great or little. Power to sanction noncompliance may again be vested in a central body or, alternatively, in decentral bodies (Martin 1994).

Another important institutional setting in which solutions to collective action problems at international level are found is negotiations in bipartite, tripartite, or multipartite actor constellations. However, it can often be linked to elements of various forms of hierarchy. Thus, if negotiations are not successful in bringing about a solution to a problem, actors may move out of the arena and turn to a court or a tribunal for a ruling in order to overcome the conflict. In anticipating this possibility, actors may be more willing to compromise. Thus, in the European dispute over social policy, if social partners do not negotiate an agreement successfully, the Commission may propose legislation for submission to the Council of Ministers. The 'shadow of hierarchy' (Scharpf 1997) speeds up negotiations. Some actors are particularly apt at brokering agreements in negotiations at international level in order to bring about a common solution. In the European context, the Commission has played a pre-eminent role in hammering out such agreements by acting as a policy entrepreneur and broker in different arenas, bargaining with various actors simultaneously in order to develop solutions acceptable to all, for example, by proposing package deals, compensation payments, etc. (Grande 1995).

Yet another institutional arrangement is the self-organization and self-regulation of actors. Self-regulation in providing a public good or common-pool resource implies that the same actors who make joint decisions about how to provide the common good also implement these decisions. The actors concerned build on the motivation, expertise, and resources of the actors immediately affected in order to provide public goods (Mayntz and Scharpf 1995). These forms of self-governance are also linked frequently to elements of hierarchy, such as the possibility of appeal to a third-party tribunal (Ostrom 1990).

Finally, markets may serve as an institutional context for the provision of public goods and common-pool resources under specific conditions, for example, when a group of actors have such high stakes that they engage in the provision. It has been increasingly claimed that quasimarkets should be created to provide public goods and common-pool resources (Le Grand 1991). Thus, many Western countries have promoted the liberalization of state monopolies in the provision of network utilities. However, a pure form of market as an institutional arrangement for providing public goods and common-pool resources can rarely be found either. Rather—as, for example, in the case of the provision of network utilities—markets are regulated at two levels: in terms of market creation to guarantee competition on the one hand, and at the level of market correction as regards 'service public' obligations to guarantee the accessibility and affordability of these services. Here—as with other institutional arrangements—two or three different types of institutional arrangements for providing public goods or common-pool resources are combined rather than existing separately as pure forms.

A further, more contextual institutional mechanism for solving collective action problems is the development of 'social capital' and trust among the actors concerned (Taylor 1996, Hardin 1993). The underlying notion is that you can trust the others involved to cooperate in the provision of a public good. Trusting others is reasonable because it is in their interest to be trustworthy in a specific situation in which a social dilemma is to be overcome. One's own trust depends on the interest of the trusted (Hardin 1999).

The instruments of command-and-control, bargaining, setting incentives, persuasion, and information are often closely linked to the institutional settings in which they are applied. Thus, command-and-control is often applied in a hierarchical context where a government authority requires the regulatees to behave in a particular way and where sanctions are applied in cases of noncompliance. However, a majority decision can also be made in favor of applying incentives. Hence, hierarchy may be linked to instruments other than command-and-control. In the institutional setting of negotiation in bi-, tri-, and multipartist settings, bargaining, together with issue-linkage, compensation payments, and compromises are the main instruments used to reach agreement, while deliberation and argument also play an important part. The negotiation process may, however, also result in the application of a strict prescription of behavior linked with the levying of fines. Incentives are set in the institutional environment of the market. Trust would be linked to information and persuasion.

4. Implementation

Agreement on a joint institutional solution to provide a public good does not automatically guarantee its implementation. The path from decision-making to the final realization of the measure is a long one, and many obstacles may prevent it being a smooth process (Pressman and Wildavsky 1973, Mayntz 1983, Windhoff-Héritier 1980). At international level, typically we are faced with the situation that the definition of the goods and institutional solutions for providing the public good or common-pool resource occur at international level, while implementation takes place at national level. This may raise particular problems of compliance. Thus, for example, if an international environmental agreement stipulates the extent and time-span for a reduction in CO₂ emissions, this does not mean that the signatory states, in cooperation with industry, will necessarily honor their obligations.

Research on implementation concludes that solutions for providing public goods that are redistributive in nature have little chance of being realized, whereas solutions with distributive outcomes, where all stand to win, meet with fewer difficulties. This applies as long as the redistributive solutions do not rely on hierarchy/command-and-control that prevents actors who are adversely affected by the decision from trying to change the contents of the decision in the course of implementation; and as long as those who are to benefit from the potential solution do not mobilize in order to exert pressure for a speedy implementation process (Windhoff-Héritier 1980). However, since hierarchical guidance and command-and-control can only be used to a limited extent in international governance, effective implementation depends much more on setting incentives which induce actors, over whom there is no hierarchical control, to comply with the agreed solution. Alternatively, it depends on societal mobilization where the actors profiting from the agreement press those who resist implementation into compliance. The same effect may be achieved if an agreed provision is deeply embedded in existing societal value systems. Furthermore, by using reputational mechanisms parties which do not comply are 'named and shamed' into compliance. The noncompliance of a state would result in the loss of reputation.

5. Outcomes and Impact of the Institutional Provision of Public Goods

A final question relates to the outcomes and impacts of specific institutional provision of a public good at international level. What are the policy outcomes of such a solution and how does it affect existing governance structures? The first question addresses the problem-solving capacity of an institutional solution, i.e., the performance of the institutional setting that has been created and the instruments applied in solving the problem. Thus, the question may be raised: does an international environmental agreement help protect endangered natural resources? Since institutional solutions are largely negotiated with a view to their potential distributional outcomes, their de facto distributive effects must be identified. Who gains and who loses on account of a specific institutional solution, and what does this mean in terms of the stability of the chosen solution? The second aspect relates to the fact that specific institutional solutions to public good problems across boundaries affect existing governmental and governance structures. Thus, the formal decision-making powers and the de facto power of national actors are changed by specific institutional solutions to problems. A case in point is the attempts of the European Union to solve collective action problems in environmental policy that have challenged the competencies of subnational actors in the member states. Similarly, the de facto involvement of Euro-associations in policy shaping has implied a loss of political power of national associations. Finally, the question must be raised as to how the overall structure and functions of the traditional state change in an environment where public goods are provided by forms of international governance. Does it imply the demise of the traditional state (Majone 1996, Grande and Eberlein 1999) in direction of a the regulatory state?

See also: Action, Collective; Global Governance; International and Transboundary Accords, Environmental; International Organization

Bibliography

- Bates R H 1988 Contra contractarianism: Some reflections on the new institutionalism. Politics and Society 16: 387–401
- Bator F M 1958 The anatomy of market failure. Quarterly Journal of Economics 72(August): 351–79
- Buchanan J M, Stubblebine W C 1962 Externality. Economica 29: 371–84
- Calvert R L 1986 Models of Imperfect Information in Politics. Harwood Academic, Chur, Switzerland
- Coase R H 1960 The problem of social cost. Journal of Law and Economics 3
- Cornes R, Sandler T 1996 The Theory of Externalities, Public Goods, and Club Goods, 2nd edn. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Grande E 1995 Regieren im verflochtenen Verhandlungssystemen. In: Mayntz R, Scharpf F W (eds.) Gesellschaftliche Selbstregulierung und politische Steuerung. Campus, Frankfurt, Germany
- Grande E, Eberlein B 1999 Der Aufstieg des Regulierungsstaates. Zur Transformation der politischen Ökonomie der Bundesrepublik Deutschland. [The Rise of the Regulatory State. The Transformation of the Political Economy of the Federal Republic of Germany]. Presentation March 1999 at the Max-Planck-Projektgruppe Recht der Gemeinschaftsgüter, Bonn, Germany
- Hardin R 1993 The street-level epistemology of trust. Politics and Society 21(4): 505–29
- Hardin R 1999 Liberalism, Constitutionalism, and Democracy. Oxford University Press, Oxford, UK
- Knight J 1995 Models, interpretations and theories: Constructing explanations of institutional emergence and change. In: Knight J, Sened I (eds.) Explaining Social Institutions. University of Michigan Press, Ann Arbor, MI
- Knight J, Johnson J 1994 Aggregation and deliberation: On the possibility of democratic legitimacy. Political Theory 22: 277–96
- Le Grand J 1991 Equity and Choice: An Essay in Economics and Applied Philosophy. Harper Collins Academic, London
- Majone G 1996 Regulating Europe. Routledge, London
- March J G, Olsen J P 1989 Rediscovering Institutions: The Organizational Basis of Politics. Free Press, New York
- Martin L L 1994 Heterogeneity, linkage and commons problems. Journal of Theoretical Politics 6(4): 473–93
- Mayntz R 1983 Zur Einleitung: Probleme der Theoriebildung in der Implementationsforschung. In: Mayntz R (ed.) Implemen-

- tation politischer Programme II: Ansätze zur Theoriebildung [The Implementation of Political Programmes II: First Attempts to Develop a Theory]. Westdeutscher Verlag, Opladen, Germany
- Mayntz R 1997 Soziologie der öffentlichen Verwaltung, 4th edn. [Sociology in Public Administration]. Mueller Verlag, Heidelberg, Germany
- Mayntz R, Scharpf F W (eds.) 1995 Gesellschaftliche Selbstregulierung und politische Steuerung [Societal Self-regulation and Political Steering]. Campus, Frankfurt, Germany
- Musgrave R A, Musgrave P B 1976 Public Finance in Theory and Practice, 2nd edn. McGraw-Hill, New York
- Ostrom E 1990 Governing the Commons. The Evolution of Institutions for Collective Action. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Pressman J L, Wildavsky A B 1973 Implementation: How Great Expectations in Washington Are Dashed in Oakland. University of California Press, Berkeley, CA
- Pigou A C 1920 The Economics of Welfare. Macmillan, London
- Samuelson P A 1954 The pure theory of public expenditure. Review of Economics and Statistics 36: 387–9
- Scharpf F W 1997 Games Real Actors Play: Actor-centered Institutionalism in Policy Research. Westview Press, Boulder, CO
- Scharpf F W 1999 Regieren in Europa: effektiv und demokratisch? [Governing Europe: Effective and Democratic? Oxford University Press, Oxford, UK]. Campus Verlag, Frankfurt, Germany
- Schelling T C 1960 The Strategy of Conflict. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Schmidt V A 1995 The new world order, incorporated: the rise of business and the decline of the nation-state. European University Institute working paper 5
- Snidal D J 1984 Interdependence, Regimes and International Cooperation. University Microfilms International, Anne Arbor, MI
- Taylor M 1996 Good government: on hierarchy, social capital and the limitations of rational choice theory. The Journal of Political Philosophy 4(1): 1–28
- Windhoff-Heritier A 1980 Politikimplementierung: Ziel und Wirklichkeit politischer Entscheidungen [Policy Implementation: Aims and Reality in Political Decision-making]. Hain, Königstein/Taunus, Germany

A. Héritier

Public Health

Calling to mind Pasteur, his students and successors, Frederic Gorham (1921) wrote, 'In fifty short years, the world has been transformed by their discoveries.' A 'blissful optimism' surrounded public health. In the following decades, the advent of DDT, sulfa drugs, penicillin, and more recent antibiotics would endow public health doctors with unshakeable self-confidence. In contrast, the rapid expansion of health care systems during the 1960s signaled a decline for public health until the 'comeback' of infectious diseases, the prevalence of chronic illnesses, the increasing number of 'complex emergencies' (famines, wars, 'ethnic cleansing,' natural catastrophes), the growth of inequality, the development of resistance against proven drugs, the proliferation of technological risks, the economic recession and the spread of poverty—all proved the need for stronger structures and political support, especially for monitoring and controlling public health.

In the nineteenth century, sanitarians saw poverty as a product of disease. In the twentieth century, social medicine reversed the relation by affirming that destitution and exploitation bred disease. Although there is hardly any doubt that malaria, to take one example, is a cause and not an effect of underdevelopment (in Kenya and Nigeria, it costs from two to six percent of the GNP), can we not see the aggressive return of poverty in industrial societies since the 1980s or the ongoing impoverishment of the Third World as substantial evidence that increasing poverty is the major factor in current health crises?

Trends in health policy closely depend on the relation between the requirements of social justice and the objectives of political authorities. Debate about the utopia of peaceful cooperation among citizens and among nations along with the political decision to provide for national security—of which 'health security' is a part—have marked public health's history. What is original at the end of the twentieth century is that public health has been drawn off the sidelines of charity, its traditional quarters, and placed center field in world politics and nation-state strategies.

1. Health as a Local Concern

Under exceptional circumstances, public health rises to the rank of a duty for centralized states. Such has been the case when the purpose was nation building or the protection of the national territory and its population. But under usual circumstances, public health has been a local matter.

Owing to these deep local roots, the philosophical grounds for public health have been the science and art of preventing illness and of furthering the health and well-being of all thanks to an organized community effort. According to C. E. A. Winslow (1923), public health involves far more than granting health authorities police powers; it is 'not a concrete intellectual discipline, but a field of social activity.' This is still an accepted notion. In 1936, certain thinkers maintained that medicine was not a branch of science but that, if a science, it was then a social science. This position was decisive not only because it sparked debate about the history of health (as part of social history or of the history of science?) but also because it foreshadowed another debate, namely, the current controversy between public health as a social science and epidemiology as a biomedical science. Public health is a practical science halfway between the laboratory and the public administration. Public health doctors must be, all at once, experts in the field of prevention, judges in matters of community health, and leaders. More than just clinicians, they are (in Winslow's words) scientists, administrators, and statesmen.

At present, there is no consensus about public health, about its duties, jurisdiction, and qualifications. Historically, these have seldom been clearly defined in relation to medicine, bacteriology, epidemiology, and laboratories—a sensitive question in tropical medicine. Starting in 1948, and even more as of 1965 in the United States, the gap between biomedical research (National Institute of Health), epidemiology (Centers for Disease Control), and public health (US Public Health Service) has never stopped widening.

Public health has been understood as a government duty—by revolutionaries in 1848 or the architects of state medicine in Great Britain. This is still a generally accepted idea, even in the United States despite opposition in the past not just from doctors but from hygienists themselves. Despite a chronic staff shortage, public health in the USA still provides a wide array of services coordinated by federal, state, and local governments. As the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare declared in 1979, these health services represent 'a governmental presence at the local level.' Public health's history has been marked by swings back and forth between a narrow focus on issues and a broad public duty, between preventive and curative medicine, between hygienists and doctors.

Noting the epidemiological transition underway during the 1920s, Winslow wanted public health to restore the broken link between preventive and curative medicine, and to infuse students and practitioners with a 'spirit of prevention.' At that time, medical schools in Scandinavia and, of course, the Soviet Union offered courses in social medicine. In contrast, the 1933 declaration of the Committee of Administrative Practice of the American Public Health Association (of which Winslow had been the first president) deliberately split the field of health in two. Offices of hygiene were assigned the tasks to fight against contagious diseases and protect children's health, as reflected in the new definition of the 'basic six' duties of local health institutions (statistics, sanitation, contagious diseases, laboratories, maternal and child care, health education) and in the national plan ('Local health units for the nation') published by the aforementioned committee in 1940 and 1945.

Public health still has far to go to resolve its ambiguous assignment. Basing their argument on the variety and multiplicity of health determinants, the authors of WHO's 1999 Report stated that public health doctors should measure the effects on health of factors lying outside the field of medicine. But just as soon, they admitted that these doctors had quite limited qualifications, jurisdiction, and credibility outside their field, and that they could better concentrate their energy in the health field.

2. The People's War for Health

Public health cannot deny that it leaned for a long time toward social reform—specifically, toward sociology at a time when the latter was more a form of social and political analysis than the academic discipline it has since become. Even before World War I, Newsholme in Brighton, Calmette in working class areas in northern France, Goldberger and Sydenstricker in the mining towns of South Carolina and, following the war, Stampar in the Balkans, Rubinow, Sigerist, and the Milbank Memorial Fund in the USA, René Sand a little later in Belgium, a current was proclaiming itself the heir of Virchow (or rather of the threesome Frank–Virchow–Grotjahn) in Germany, social medicine's homeland. Eighty years later, the advocates of social medicine, public health, and human rights still lay claim to this heritage.

For Warren and Sydenstricker in 1918, overcrowding and insalubrious housing were the major determinants of inequality in health. Illness and health had social, economic, as well as biological causes; Sigerist vastly widened this range of health determinants by including cultural causes. Public health—a national health program—should set the goal of universal protection so as to 'equalize social classes in relation to health' in the words of the Pasteurist Étienne Burnet in 1935. More recently, an interpretation prevailing in some quarters following Alma-Ata (1978) has sought to 'put medicine where it belongs' by seeing public health as reaching far beyond illness treatment and prevention. But how to implement this 'social medical contract,' which called for redefining democracy?

The idea of social medicine was not at all unanimously approved. Typical of differing opinions was the debate about what caused malaria: an illness bred by poverty and poor hygiene, as some claimed, or a clinical and entomological problem that, as others asserted, called for eradicating the vector rather than poverty? The very phrase 'social medicine' was cause for debate. Did it not risk making people believe public health should be based on the medical profession, whereas its only true allies were local authorities and the people?

The 1929 depression had a part in this shift toward a more sociological conception of public health. Studies in nutrition or on the links between unemployment and health took sides with a movement opposed to eugenics. Social medicine was but a clinical medicine aware of the social determinants of a patient's state of health. This awareness would inevitably call for 'socializing' health systems and opening health care to everyone. But 'social' should not be confused with 'socialist.' The three terms 'social-socialized-socialist' tended to correspond to a political geography that might, on closer examination, turn out to be little more than a series of cultural gradients: Europe tended to be more socialist as one moved from areas using horse-power to areas using horses! The Russian 'example' must be set in this light. The Webbs, Winslow, Sigerist, like delegates at the 1978 Alma-Ata Conference, were enthusiastic about Soviet medicine (or even about community medicine in Russia since Alexander II's reign). Even though Moscow had proclaimed the doctrine of the social origins of disease, this guiding Eastern light could not outshine other sources of luminosity. In Socialist Berlin and Vienna—not to mention East Harlem—health centers and dispensaries were springing up that provided maternal and child care as well as birth control.

Once 'war Communism' came to an end, social medicine in the former USSR took a radical turn into state medicine. As conveyed to the USA under Franklin D. Roosevelt, it served, for a while, as a political alternative to the mercantile spirit of the American Medical Association. In the absence of a Federal health plan, Oklahoma and Maryland, with the backing of the Farm Security Administration, farmer organizations, labor unions, and medical cooperatives, actively defended rural interests. In its radical versions, social medicine focused on zones with high rates of poverty, malnutrition, and child mortality—areas abandoned by hospitals, which, located in cities, were too far away and too expensive. In the late 1960s once again, Tanzania gave priority to rural areas as it built a decentralized system, covering the whole country, of health stations and dispensaries, and appointed village health agents. In 1972, the proportion of funds appropriated there for rural compared with urban health services was 20:80. Eight years later, it stood at 40:60. But WHO did not reorient its primary health care strategy until 1989 in order to cope with massive rural flight toward urban areas.

3. Alma-Ata, the Peak of Convergence

Following World War II, social medicine experienced a golden age. The coming to power of the socialist Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in Saskatchewan, Canada in 1944, and the emergence of the New Democratic Party at the national level in 1961 opened the way for setting up, between 1962 and 1971, a national health insurance based on values of solidarity and social justice. Even in the United States, a hierarchical organization of health centers existed in New York City. In contrast, social medicine was losing wind in Europe even as it was attaining official recognition by international organizations.

Social medicine—'promotive, preventive, curative, and rehabilitative,' to borrow Sigerist's words—was crowned in Alma-Ata at the joint WHO–UNICEF conference on September 12, 1978. Potentially subversive ideas had been carefully defused by replacing certain phrases (e.g., 'health centers' with 'primary health care' or 'barefoot doctors' with 'community health workers') in the 'Health for all by the year 2000' declaration already approved by WHO's 30th General Assembly in May 1977. This 1978 Alma-Ata Conference represented a peak for the theory of convergence, itself the outcome of thawed relations between the two blocs, as the former Soviet Union sought to cooperate with the West in science and technology while still exporting its model of development toward the Third World. Shortly after the conference, WHO's regional committee for Europe would refer to this theory as 'Equity in care.' Borne by the expanding social sciences and by development theory (after all, 'Health for all by the year 2000' was intended to be an indispensable part of development), this theory stipulated that differing social systems would ultimately converge into a single 'human society' for satisfying all basic needs (food, housing, health care) after eliminating poverty. Current in the 1960s and 1970s, this ideology might be seen as a new form of the functionalism that had thrived 30 years earlier at the League of Nations. Food, housing, social insurance, paid holidays, cooperatives, leisure activities, education, and especially public health, all this would shrink the field of politics as welfare expanded. Would national administrations not be integrated into a single international system that would free Geneva from the domination of sovereign states?

The Alma-Ata conference defined the public for primary health care in terms of high morbidity and mortality rates and a socioeconomic status with risks for health. Health education, a safe water and food supply, maternal and child care (including birth control), and vaccination (against tuberculosis, diphtheria, neonatal tetanus, polio, and measles) were declared priorities along with universal access to health services and the necessity for coordinating health with education and housing. Primary health-care was to be based on the most recent scientific developments, which were to be made universally available—what Aneurin Bevan in 1946 had called 'universalizing the best.' Adopted by more than 100 states in 1981, the 1978 Alma-Ata Declaration sought to reflect criticisms both of the Western medical model and of the population explosion in poor lands. In particular, it systematically demolished the 'vertical' programs that WHO had, until then, undertaken with quite inconsistent results (success against smallpox but a relative setback in combating malaria). Based on participatory democracy, 'peripheral' services were to lie at the core of the new strategy, but were also to be integrated into 'districts' around a first referral-level hospital (140 beds, internal medicine, gynecology, obstetrics, a laboratory and blood bank, and the capacity for performing minor surgery and providing outpatient care). The aim was not to juxtapose primary care with a still centralized system but to combine the advantages of hospitals and of health centers so as to facilitate both prevention work and access to medical and social services for a poor, often scattered, population.

To its credit, primary health care has made major, though inconsistent, progress. In Colombia, the 1500 health centers set up as of 1976 were covering 82 percent of the population by the early 1980s. Between 1978 and 1982, the percentage of the vaccinated population rose from 23 percent to 41 percent for polio, 36–71 percent for tuberculosis, 21–50 percent for measles, and 22–37 percent for diphtheria, tetanus, and pertusis. If, by 1989, 90 percent of babies less than one year old had been vaccinated against polio in Cuba, Botswana, Brazil, Nicaragua, China, Tunisia, Egypt, Korea, and Saudi Arabia, in India this rate did not reach 20 percent in the two-thirds of the poorest strata of the population, where infant mortality is the highest.

True, the methods used were sometimes counter-productive. As we know, the Expanded Program on Immunization (launched in 1974 and broadened in 1987 to include polio) had better results in places with a solid health infrastructure. In continuity with the Rockefeller Foundation's campaigns against yellow fever in Latin America, and those against 'sleeping sickness' in the Belgian Congo or French Equatorial Africa, or the campaigns against smallpox organized by WHO in association with Indian and Bengali authorities in 1962 and 1967, international organizations still preferred mass vaccination programs conducted like military campaigns. Coercion was all the more willingly used insofar as vaccinators blamed the superstitious population for any opposition.

The installation of 'community health agents' elected by villagers, would, it was believed, overcome local opposition. This lightweight health auxiliary, a sort of 'barefoot doctor,' would bridge the gap between the health system and rural dwellers. These experiments were disappointing: this community health agent often turned out to be a 'transitional last resort' who fell victim to the envy aroused by power or fell into the 'voluntary help' trap. True, public health provided certain governments (in Cuba, Sandinist Nicaragua, or Nyerere's Tanzania) with means for mobilizing the population and nation building. But five years after the signing of the Alma-Ata agreement, only experimental or small-scale projects were in the works, mainly as a function of circumstances, when a local leader showed concern for his constituents' welfare.

Under the pressure of users, prevention work in health centers often deviated toward more curative purposes. Like state medicine in the Soviet Union, social medicine in the Third World represented a limited injection of 'collective vaccine' in an 'individualistic' village setting. Except for Scandinavia, where national identities are strongly imbued with concern for health and with eugenic ideas, Europe, too, has tended to resist this type of medicine.

Primary health care was originally intended to better distribute public expenditures by avoiding congestion in big urban hospitals—an objective that the Harare Conference, organized by the WHO, reaffirmed in 1987 but that has been a resounding failure. At the Bamako meeting organized by WHO and UNICEF in 1987, African ministers of Health had to admit this, but then went on to ratify a proposal for furthering decentralization and making health care users pay part of the costs. Applied in 33 countries by 1994 (28 of them in sub-Saharan Africa), the Bamako Initiative looks like an antidote to Alma-Ata.

4. Transnational Networks and the Territory's Revanche

Symbolized by the publication of the 1993 World Bank report, Investing in Health, the waning of WHO—which as recently as 1973 had been said to be the 'world's health conscience'—signals a turning point. In Africa, from 60 to 70 percent of health budgets come from outside sources: non-governmental organizations (NGOs), the World Bank, or the International Monetary Fund. The World Bank's centralized approach allows little room for a local or national diagnosis. Zimbabwe, where expenditures on prevention work had increased significantly from 1982 to 1990, was, in 1991, summoned to reduce its public health investments by 30 percent in line with the Bank's recommendations for shifting funds toward 'selective' and more productive primary health care activities and toward prevention work for reducing maternal and infant mortality (such as growth-monitoring, rehydration, breast-feeding, and immunization). The Bank's recommendation to start making users pay may well reduce the utilization of health services and thus worsen the prevalence of endemic diseases such as malaria or AIDS. Another drawback is as follows: the need to obtain fast results in order to please donors keeps governments who receive aid from acquiring the ability to manage in the long term.

The World Bank's growing role in financing the health field can but amplify its intellectual role and lead to neglecting WHO's abilities and experience. Unlike Geneva, whose relations with national administrations are still limited to (weak) ministries of Health, the Bank has direct access to the centers of power (ministers of National Planning or Finances). It may even, as happened in Bangladesh, take the place of the state in heading health policy. As happened with the interventions by the Rockefeller Foundation or the Milbank Memorial Fund in France during the 1920s or in several central European and Balkan lands, the organization of public health in low-income countries comes to be based on an imported state. Since the 1980s, however, the big foundations have given up their place in the field to other non NGOs specializing in humanitarian aid. The number of NGOs rose from 1,600 in 1980 to 2,970 in 1993. A trend on this scale is a sign of the times, namely: the proportion of funds reserved for emergency actions in war zones has increased constantly since 1990. In Asia, Africa, or the Balkans, public health is, once again, seen against the backdrop of warfare.

Welfare and warfare were, indeed, intimately connected between the two world wars. Interventionism thrived with World War I and the 'Spanish flu' epidemic. As a consequence of growing government interventionism between 1914 and 1918, the first health ministries sprung up in Europe, New Zealand, and South Africa. Following the Great War, there was a general awareness of the role of public health in reconstruction and the dangers of mass epidemics (such as cholera or typhus) for political stability. World War I stimulated reformers like Dawson, who can rightfully be considered to be a forerunner to the British National Health Service (1948). But by doing away with taboos surrounding the respect for life, the war also opened wide the doors for the excesses committed by a racial form of hygienics.

Throughout the inter-World War period, a tragic dialectics prevailed in the international health order (at least in Europe), a constant swinging back and forth between the triumph of networks of transnational experts and the revanche of the territory, i.e., the nation or 'race.' Hitler's regime did not hesitate to use public health for a policy genocide. Its fight against typhus in Poland led to 'the final consolidation of the notion of a quarantine' in the Warsaw ghetto (Browning 1992). This was proof of the potential lethality of the health sciences.

As the twenty-first century begins, war is, once again, menacing health. It has even been said that 'today's armed conflicts are essentially wars on public health' (Perrin 1999). Civilian populations are the first war casualties. Since the wars in Abyssinia and Spain during the 1930s (well before Rwanda and the first Chechnya war), 80 percent of the total 20 million persons killed and 60 million wounded in various conflicts have been civilians. Three out of five have been children. The most intense war zone in Africa lies at the heart of the continent, which is also the epicenter of new diseases (Ebola) and epidemics (HIV/AIDS). But civilians fall casualty not just as a result of war's toll on health, as it sets off mass migrations and disrupts food supplies. Between 1982 and 1986, fighting destroyed more than 40 percent of Mozambique's health centers. By interrupting routine activities related, in particular, to maternal and child care, war increases mortality and the number of premature births. It also reduces vaccination coverage, not to mention its long-run effects, such as outbreaks of malaria as people seek refuge in infested areas. According to a 1996 UNICEF estimate, war-related shortages of food and medical services in Africa, added onto the stress of flight from battle zones, accounted for 20 times more deaths than actual fighting. On the one hand, the renewed threat of infectious diseases (in particular, the interaction between HIV and tuberculosis in poor countries) and, on the other, the consequences of the epidemiological transition and the aging of populations in wealthy lands, this is the 'double burden' that, according to the WHO, public health will have to carry in the twenty-first century.

Prevention work now represents a very small percentage of public health expenditures: 2.9 percent in the United States, a statistic similar to that in most other industrialized lands. However, this percentage includes only prevention activities such as screening for disease or vaccinating. It is not to be confused with 'prevention education,' such as campaigns against smoking. 'Health for all by the year 2000' is still a far cry from reality, even in wealthy nations.

The somewhat vague phrase 'health promotion,' officially used in the British Health Ministry's 1944 report, refers, all at once, to health education, taxation as a health policy instrument, and the prohibition against advertising alcoholic beverages or tobacco. This phrase was revived in the 1970s by the Canadian Health Ministry to support the thesis that a population's state of health depends less on medical progress than on its standards of living and nutrition. The chapter devoted to the fight against nicotine addiction in the 'Health for all' program has been followed up on, since it does not cost the government anything and can even, as in Australia, help pay for 'health promotion' thanks to cigarette taxes. To its advantage, it also garners broad support for public health. The keynote of the 1986 Ottawa Charter, the phrase 'health promotion' indicates how closely prevention work in wealthy countries hinges on the system of medical care. The state itself participates in this trend to make individuals responsible for health. Witness the campaigns focused on tobacco, alcohol, or certain foodstuffs with the objective of changing 'lifestyles'—a far cry from the 'old' public health which depended on the dispensary and other facilities as the basic means of education.

Consequent to discussions in the late 1970s about women's role in the sociology of health, the awareness dawned that more persons are involved in health care in the often neglected 'informal' sector than in public or private health services. Everywhere around the world, family, kin, and neighbors bear the largest burden of care for the sick. Evidence of this awareness is, on the right, the defense of the family's role and, on the left, the activism of patients' associations (especially homosexual associations in the fight against AIDS). Owing to its ability to mobilize various sorts of actors with different opinions on anything other than health issues, thus 'civil' society is partly taking the state's place in both wealthy and poor countries. As this emergence of local actors once again proves, applying decisions in prevention work is not at all a purely administrative matter.

Have governments been put to rout? But public health raises problems directly related to the state's powers. Grounding its arguments in new bacteriological concepts, New York City's Health Service had no qualms at the start of the twentieth century about locking up a 37-year-old Irish cook ('Typhoid Mary' Mallon) for having infected 32 persons. Given the tragic affairs of blood transfusions in France and 'mad cow disease' in the UK, public health now seems to have become a fully fledged national security issue. The most recent evidence of this is the 'principle of precaution,' which—the ideology of national sovereignty tempered with expertise—would entail political decisions for strengthening public health. State security increasingly means taking into account not only political and military threats but also public health and environmental risks. As the concept of security expands into a 'shared human security,' monitoring transmissible diseases is becoming a major concern for public authorities.

On the threshold of the twenty-first century, a global public health strategy would entail relating the fight against transmissible diseases and environmentally related risks to the management of emergencies. But was this not also the issue 100 years earlier? The twentieth century started with the French–English dispute about cholera, which centered around the quarantine issue. The conflict between national independence and public health has persisted during controversial affairs all the way down through the century. Seen from Europe, the century seems to be ending with a clash about 'mad cow disease' between Great Britain, on the one hand, and Germany and France, on the other. By reviving the old Churchill myth of 'Britain alone against Europe,' the beef war (1996–2000) fully illustrates that public health, far from being an ordinary administrative matter, can turn into a fully fledged political controversy and field for government actions.

See also: Health Care Delivery Services; Health Economics; Health in Developing Countries; Cultural Concerns; Health Policy; Public Health as a Social Science

Bibliography

- Browning C R 1992 Genocide and public health: German doctors and Polish Jews, 1939–1941. In: The Path to Genocide. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Burnet E 1935 Médecine expérimentale et médecine sociale. Review of Hygiene 57: 321–42

Fee E, Brown T (eds.) 1997 Making Medical History: The Life and Times of Henry E. Sigerist. The Johns Hopkins University Press, Baltimore, MD

Gorham F P 1921 The history of bacteriology and its contribution to public health work. In: Porcher Ravenel M (ed.) A Half-Century of Public Health. American Public Health Association, New York

Perrin P 1999 The risks of military participation. In: Leaning J, Briggs S M, Chen L C (eds.) Humanitarian Crises: The Medical and Public Health Response. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA

Viselsteart A J 1982 Compulsory health insurance and the definition of public health. In: Numbers R L (ed.) Compulsory Health Insurance: The Continuing American Debate. Greenwood Press, Westport, CT

Warren B S, Sydenstricker 1918 The relation of wages to the public health. American Journal of Public Health 8: 883–7 [1999 American Journal of Public Health 89: 1641–3]

Webster C (ed.) 1995 Caring for Health: History and Diversity. The Open University Press, Buckingham, UK

Winslow C E A 1923 The Evolution and Significance of the Modern Public Health. Yale University Press, New Haven, CT

L. Murard and P. Zylberman

Public Health as a Social Science

Public health can be defined as:

the combination of science, skills and beliefs that are directed to the maintenance and improvement of the health of all people through collective or social actions. The programs, services, and institutions involved emphasize the prevention of disease and the health needs of the population as a whole. Public health activities change with changing technology and values, but the goals remain the same: to reduce the amount of disease, premature death and disability in the population (Last 1995, p. 134).

Health was defined by the World Health Organization (WHO) almost 40 years ago as a state of complete mental, physical, and social well-being, and not merely the absence of disease or infirmity (WHO 1964). From this definition, health is clearly more than just a physical state and is inextricably linked to personal well-being and potential, and incorporates other dimensions of human experience, such as quality of life, psychological health, and social well-being. Public health is different from many other fields of health as it focuses on preventing disease, illness and disability, and health promotion at the population level. Populations are groups of individuals with some similar characteristic(s) that unify them in some way, such as people living in rural areas, older people, women, an indigenous group, or the population of a specific region or country.

Contemporary public health is particularly concerned with the sections of the population that are typically under- or poorly served by traditional health services, and consequently, most disadvantaged and vulnerable in terms of health. Importantly, public health is therefore concerned with the more distal (i.e., distant from the person) social, physical, economic, and environmental determinants of health, in addition to the more proximal determinants (i.e., closer to the person), such as risk factors and health behaviors.

Another distinction is often made between primary, secondary, and tertiary levels of prevention in public health. Primary prevention reduces the incidence of poor health by means such as vaccinations to prevent disease. Secondary prevention (or early detection) involves reducing the prevalence of poor health by shortening its duration and limiting its adverse social, psychological, and physical effects, such as different types of screening to identify a condition in the early stages. Tertiary prevention involves reducing the complications associated with poor health and minimizing disability and suffering, such as cardiac rehabilitation programs for patients after a heart attack. The boundaries between different levels of prevention are often indistinct and blurred, and a specific intervention strategy might simultaneously address the three different levels of prevention in different individuals.

The application of behavioral and social science theories and methods to improve health and prevent disease and disability at a population level can occur at multiple levels and in many different settings throughout society. Many public health initiatives are aimed at the individual or interpersonal level, and are delivered through the primary care setting, workplaces, and schools. Such programs typically have a low reach, in that only a limited number of people are involved in the programs and/or have access. However, these programs have high levels of exposure for the individuals in that they are quite intensive. Other programs can be organized and implemented through whole organizations or systems. Finally, community-wide or societal-level interventions may involve media, policy, or legislative action at a national or governmental level, and have a very large reach; however, program exposure is typically quite low.

The practice of public health is therefore very broad and can include the delivery of many different types of programs and services throughout the whole community. It can include efforts to reduce health disparities, increase access to health services, improve childhood rates of immunization, control the spread of HIV/AIDS, reduce uptake of smoking by young people, implement legislation and policies to improve the quality of water and food supplies, reduce the incidence of motor vehicle accidents, reduce pollution, and so on. In fact, the combined health of the population is more directly related to the quality and quantity of a country's total public health effort than it is to the society's direct investment in health services per se.

This article discusses the extent to which theories and models from the behavioral and social sciences inform our understanding and practice of public health. The article provides a brief overview of the major public health problems and challenges confronting developed and developing countries; the contribution made by social and behavioral factors to many of these health problems; and how social and behavioral theories and models can be usefully applied to the development, implementation, and evaluation of public health programs.

1. Global Patterns of Health and Disease: The Major Public Health Challenges

Disease burden includes mortality, disability, impairment, illness, and injury arising from diseases, injuries, and risk factors. It is commonly measured by calculating the combination of years of life lost due to premature mortality and equivalent 'healthy' years of life lost due to disability. The past 100 years have seen dramatic changes in health and the patterns of disease burden. Most countries have experienced an increase in life expectancy, with greater numbers of people expected to reach late adulthood. In the last 40 years, life expectancy has improved more than during the entire previous span of human history, increasing from 40 years to 63 years during 1950 to 1990 in developing countries (World Bank 1993). The number of children dying before five years has similarly reduced by 50 percent since 1960 (World Bank 1993).

Developed countries in particular have seen a decline in the proportion of deaths due to communicable and infectious diseases such as smallpox and cholera. However, this decline has occurred simultaneously with a marked increase in noncommunicable diseases, particularly the chronic diseases. In the early 1990s, the chronic diseases of ischemic heart disease and cerebrovascular disease were identified as the leading causes of mortality, together accounting for 21 percent of all deaths in the world (WHO 1999). In 1998, 81 percent of the disease burden in high-income countries was attributable to noncommunicable diseases, in particular cardiovascular disease, mental health conditions such as depression, and malignant neoplasms, with alcohol use being one of the leading identified causes of disability (WHO 1999). Other major noncommunicable causes of death include road traffic accidents, self-inflicted injuries, diabetes, and drowning.

In developing countries, current major public health problems continue to include infectious diseases, undernutrition, and complications of childbirth, as well as the increasing prevalence of chronic diseases. Maternal conditions, HIV/AIDS, and tuberculosis

Table 1
Changes in ranking for the most important causes of death from 1990 to 2020

Disorder	Ranking		Change
	1990	2020
Ischemic heart disease	1	1	0
Cerebrovascular disease	2	2	0
Lower respiratory infections	3	4	−1
Diarrheal diseases	4	11	−7
Perinatal disease	5	16	−11
Chronic obstructive pulmonary disease	6	3	+3
Tuberculosis	7	7	0
Measles	8	27	−19
Road traffic accidents	9	6	+3
Trachea, bronchus, lung cancers	10	5	−5
Malaria	11	29	−18
Self-inflicted injuries	12	10	+2
Cirrhosis of the liver	13	12	+1
Stomach cancer	14	8	+6
Diabetes mellitus	15	19	−4
Violence	16	14	−2
War injuries	20	15	+5
Liver cancer	21	13	+8
HIV	30	9	+21

Source: Murray and Lopez, Lancet 1997, 349 (9064): 1498–504.

are three of the major causes of disease burden for adults in developing countries (WHO 1999). Among children, diarrhea, acute respiratory infections, malaria, measles, and perinatal conditions account for 21 percent of all deaths in developing countries, compared with 1 percent in developed countries (WHO 1999). Developing regions account for 98 percent of all deaths in children younger than 15 years; the probability of death between birth and 15 years ranges from 1.1 percent in established market economies to 22 percent in sub-Saharan Africa (Murray and Lopez 1997). Importantly, many of these conditions are preventable; at least two million children die each year from disease for which vaccines are available (WHO 1999).

Accidents and injuries—both intentional and non-intentional—are a significant and neglected cause of health problems internationally, accounting for 18 percent of the global burden of disease (WHO 1999). In high-income countries, road traffic accidents and self-inflicted injuries are among the 10 leading causes of disease burden (WHO 1999). In less developed countries, road traffic accidents are the most significant cause of injuries, and war, violence, and self-inflicted injuries are among the leading 20 causes of lost years of healthy life (WHO 1999).

The Global Burden of Disease Study has projected future patterns of mortality and disease burden (Murray and Lopez 1997). Life expectancy is anticipated to increase notably in females to 90 years, with a lesser increase for males. Table 1 presents the changes in ranking for the most important causes of death. Worldwide mortality from perinatal, maternal, and nutritional conditions is expected to decline. Noncommunicable diseases are expected to account for an increasing proportion of disease burden, rising from 43 percent in 1998 to 73 percent in 2020. HIV will become one of the 10 leading causes of mortality and disability, and this epidemic represents ‘an unprecedented reversal of the progress of human health’ (Murray and Lopez 1997, p. 1506). The leading causes of disease burden will include ischemic heart disease, depression, road traffic accidents, cerebrovascular disease, chronic obstructive pulmonary disease, lower respiratory infections, tuberculosis, war injuries, diarrheal disease, and HIV. Important health risk factors will include tobacco, obesity, physical inactivity, and heavy alcohol consumption. By 2020 tobacco is expected to cause more premature death and disability than any single disease, with mortality projected to increase from 3 million deaths in 1990 to 8.4 million deaths.

2. The Behavioral and Social Epidemiology of Health and Disease

There are a multitude of factors that can be used to explain the changing patterns of morbidity, mortality, and the spread of diseases, both globally and between regions and countries. Some of these factors are related to population growth and aging and social patterns, while others are more related to changes in the local and global environment. An impressive amount of epidemiological evidence collected over the past 50 years has also identified the importance of a range of behavioral determinants and modifiable risk factors such as physical inactivity, smoking, and poor nutrition. The social and behavioral sciences are key disciplines underpinning public health as they have generated theories and models which provide a link between our understanding of these modifiable determinants of disease and health and strategies for disease prevention and health promotion.

The modern era for this evidence base began with the publication of the landmark study that investigated the relationship between British doctors' smoking habits and disease (Doll and Hill 1964); the first reports from the Framingham Study that identified a number of 'risk factors' for cardiovascular disease (Kannel and Gordon 1968); and the United States Surgeon General's Report on Smoking and Health (US State Surgeon General's Advisory Committee 1964). The Lalonde report (1974) and the Alameda County study (Belloc and Breslow 1972) both identified the importance of wider environmental factors such as social support, social networks, and socioeconomic factors as influences on health. In 1980, the United States Centers for Disease Control released a report estimating that 50 percent of mortality from the 10 leading causes of death in the United States could be traced to lifestyle factors (Centers for Disease Control 1980). McGinnis and Foege (1993) assessed the relative contribution of important and potentially alterable health behaviors and social factors to mortality and morbidity in the USA, and concluded that for approximately half of all deaths in 1990, the actual cause of death was attributable to health behaviors. In 1996, the report from the US Surgeon on Physical Activity and Health stated that physical activity reduced the risk of premature mortality in general, and of coronary heart disease, hypertension, colon cancer, and diabetes mellitus in particular (US Department of Health and Human Services 1996).

This rapidly expanding evidence base has been used by many countries for setting public health priorities and recommended goals and targets for addressing national public health challenges and reducing premature mortality and the burden of disease via changing lifestyle and related risk factors. Lifestyle factors targeted to influence population health include physical inactivity, diet, smoking, alcohol and other drug use, injury control, sun protective behaviors, appropriate use of medicines, immunization, sexual and reproductive health, oral hygiene, mental health, and many others.

Behavioral and social researchers have contributed to our understanding of the broad array of ecological, social, and psychological factors that influence lifestyle and health behaviors, and in turn, the etiology and pathogenesis of disease and health. In a recent edited series of monographs, Gochman (1997) provides an extensive overview of the range of environmental, cultural, family and personal factors that have been shown to influence lifestyle and health behaviors.

Moving more upstream from individual behaviors, there is also increasing interest in the ways in which the broader environment influences health, in particular the specific role played by social and economic factors. The Ottawa Charter (WHO 1986) recognized the importance of adopting a more social view of health by stressing that in order for public health programs to be effective they must incorporate the following elements: the development of personal skills; the creation of environments which are supportive of health; the refocusing of health and related services; an increase in community participation; and finally, the development of public policy which is health enhancing. The trend towards trying to understand more about the social, economic, and environmental determinants of health is probably one of the most fundamental developments to occur in mainstream public health over the past 20 years.

Recently there has been a very explicit research focus on socioeconomic health inequalities, social disadvantage, and poverty as major influences of health risk factors, disease, and reduced life expectancy. Poverty is undoubtedly one of the most important, single causes of preventable death, disease, and disability; the major variations and disparities in health observed both within and between countries can be explained to a large measure by social and economic disparities. Two key reports from the United Kingdom, the Black Report (Department of Health and Social Services 1980) and the Acheson Report (Acheson 1998), have emphasized the importance of these issues and ameliorative strategies.

Future social and behavioral epidemiological research into public health will need to address more adequately the multiplicity of factors contributing to health and disease. This will involve not only studying factors at the level of the individual, such as their beliefs and behavior, but also the full array of economic, social, environmental, and cultural factors as well.

3. Theories and Models for Prevention and Change

Social and behavioral theories and models not only help to explain health-related behavior and its determinants, they can also guide the development of interventions to influence and change health-related behavior and ultimately improve health. Theories can help understand adherence to a health regime, identify the information needed to develop an effective intervention program, provide guidelines on effective communication, and identify barriers to be overcome in implementing an intervention. While some theories are most usefully applied to understanding the role and influence of personal-level factors, others are more useful for understanding the importance of families, social relationships, and culture, and how these can be influenced in a positive fashion to promote improvements in health.

Models of individual health behavior such as the Health Belief Model and the Theory of Reasoned Action/Planned Behavior, as well as models of interpersonal behavior such as Social Cognitive Theory, have been used widely in public health and health promotion over the past 20 years and are reviewed in various publications (e.g., Glanz et al. 1997). Staging models, such as the Transtheoretical Model, have often been used to improve the potency of health promotion programs (e.g., see Glanz et al. 1997). A combination of models or theories can often assist in the development of more individually tailored and targeted strategies (see Health Behavior: Psychosocial Theories).

While these theories and models focus primarily on achieving changes in health behaviors, other models are more concerned with communication and diffusion of effective programs, so as to benefit the health of a larger population. McGuire's communication-behavior change model and Rogers' diffusion of innovations model are examples of these types of theories (see Glanz et al. 1997). Health behaviors, and the broad array of environmental and social influences on behavior, are usually so complex that models drawing on a number of individual theories to help understand a specific problem in a particular setting or context are usually required to develop, implement, and evaluate effective public health responses. For example, Green and Kreuter's PRECEDE-PROCEED model, social marketing theory, and ecological planning approaches are models and approaches that are used commonly in public health and health promotion (see Glanz et al. 1997).

However, within the behavioral sciences, much less attention has been given to models or theories that understand change strategies and programs within the broader environment, groups, organizations, and whole communities. This is despite increasing research evidence indicating that social and environmental factors are critically important in understanding individual attitudes, behavior, and health. The design of programs to reach populations requires an understanding of how social systems operate, how change occurs within and among systems, and how large-scale changes influence people's health behavior and health more generally. A combination of theories and models of individual behavior can be used to shift the focus of intervention strategies beyond a clinical or individual level to a population level by their application via a range of settings in the community, such as the workplace and primary health care (Oldenburg 1994). This increases the reach of intervention programs beyond a relatively small number of individuals. Many of the social and behavioral theories or models that have been used extensively to understand and describe change at an individual or small group level can also inform our understanding of the change and diffusion process at an organizational or population-based level.

4. Wider Implementation of the Social and Behavioral Science Evidence Base in Public Health

With the development, implementation, and evaluation of a series of major community-based cardiovascular prevention trials during the 1970s and 1980s, widespread use was made of multilevel intervention or change strategies underpinned by behavioral and social science theories and research for the first time. Importantly, these strategies did not focus exclusively on change in the individual. Instead, preventive strategies using multiple approaches were directed at the media, legislation, and the use of restrictive policies, and involved specific settings such as schools, the workplace, health care settings, and other key groups in the community, with the aim of reducing population rates of risk behaviors, morbidity, and mortality.

The North Karelia Project in Finland (Puska et al. 1985) was initiated in response to concern that the community, at that time, had the highest risk of heart attack worldwide. Strategies included tobacco taxation and restriction, televised instruction in skills for nonsmoking and vegetable growing, and extensive organization and networking to build an education and advocacy organization. After 10 years, results indicated significant reductions in smoking, blood pressure, and cholesterol, and a 24 percent reduction in coronary heart disease mortality among middle-aged males. The Stanford Three Community Study (Farquhar and Maccoby 1977) demonstrated the feasibility and effectiveness of mass media-based educational campaigns and achieved significant reductions in cholesterol and fat intake. The Minnesota Heart Health Project (Mittelmark et al. 1986), the Pawtucket Heart Health Program (Lefebvre et al. 1987), and the Stanford Five-City Project (Farquhar et al. 1990) used interventions aimed at raising public awareness of risk factors for coronary heart disease, and changing risk behaviors through education of health professionals and environmental change programs, such as grocery store and restaurant labeling.

Worksite intervention trials, such as the Working Well Trial (Sorensen et al. 1996) and an Australian study with ambulance workers (Gomel et al. 1993), have utilized interventions aimed at favorably altering social and psychological factors known to influence health-related behaviors, including increased awareness of benefits, increased self-efficacy, increased social support, and reduced perception of barriers. Strategies in this setting can include promotion of nonsmoking policies, increasing the availability of healthy foods in canteens and vending machines, group education sessions, and access to exercise facilities. School-based interventions provide an established setting for reaching children, adolescents, and their families to address age-pertinent health issues such as smoking, teenage pregnancy, and substance use. Strategies have targeted social reinforcement, school food service, health-related knowledge and attitudes, local ordinances, peer leaders, and social norms.

5. Evaluation of Public Health Intervention Trials

In evaluating the effectiveness of such trials, Rose (1992) states that it is important to acknowledge the differences between clinical and more population-based approaches. Clinical approaches, while more likely to result in greater mean changes in individuals, are less significant at a population level because fewer individuals are involved. In contrast, the small mean changes achieved by population-based approaches, if applied to a large number of people, have the potential to impact much more significantly on population rates of disease and health.

One of the difficulties in evaluating population-based approaches is the length of time required to demonstrate changes in population rates of health outcomes. While researchers can readily measure changes in a behavioral outcome—such as the rate of smoking cessation—following a widespread and well-conducted program, the time required for such behavioral changes to impact upon long-term morbidity and mortality—such as lung cancer—is much more problematic. Nevertheless, many of the above identified behavior-based trials demonstrate the value of social and behavioral theories and the feasibility of activating communities in the pursuit of health.

6. Diffusion and Dissemination of the Evidence Base

The ultimate value of this research must be determined by the extent to which the knowledge generated is widely disseminated, adopted, implemented, and maintained by 'users,' and ultimately, by its impact on systems and policy at a regional, state, and/or national level (i.e., institutionalization). While considerable effort and resources have been devoted to developing effective interventions, relatively little attention has been given to developing and researching effective methods for the diffusion of their use. It is important to acknowledge that the availability of relevant research findings does not in itself guarantee good practice. Such knowledge transfer involves the development of formal research policies, formalized organizational structural support, appropriate and targeted funding, formal monitoring of activity, and ongoing training.

In essence, achieving the effective diffusion of innovations, both within the general community and in organizational settings, involves change, and the change principles which underpin the diffusion process are not so different to those previously identified for understanding change at the individual, organizational, or community levels (see Oldenburg et al. 1997). At the level of the individual, family, or small group, uptake of a health promotion innovation typically involves changes in behaviors or lifestyle practices which will either reduce risk factors or promote health. At an organizational level, such as the workplace, school, or the health care setting, successful uptake of an innovation may require the introduction of particular programs or services, changes in policies or regulations, or changes in the roles and functions of particular personnel. At a broader community-wide or even societal level, the change process can involve the use of the media and changes in governmental policies and legislation, as well as coordination of a variety of other initiatives at the individual and the settings level.

However, in considering the principles that underpin the diffusion of innovations at a population level, further complexity arises from the need to consider change occurring at multiple levels, across many different settings, and resulting from the use of many different change strategies. This requires the application of multiple models and theories in order to develop frameworks with sufficient explanatory power.

7. Looking to the Future

It is difficult to be certain about the public health challenges that lie ahead in this new millennium. In all countries, there is a need to reduce preventable disease and premature death, reduce health inequalities, and develop sustainable public health programs.

Much of the social and behavioral science research that has been conducted with individuals is still relevant in the field of public health, as are many of the models and theories that have been developed and tested over the past 30 years. To move to a population-based focus, we need innovative means of implementing such knowledge and methodologies so as to increase the reach of such programs to more people, particularly those individuals and sections of society who are most disadvantaged.

Adopting a preventive approach to health, acknowledging and acting on the importance of social and environmental factors as major determinants of population health, and reducing health inequalities provides a substantial challenge to public health in the coming years. Furthermore, limited resources place an added emphasis on evaluating the affordability and sustainability of public health interventions. Public health should be at the forefront of developing and researching effective intervention methods and strategies for current and future health challenges, with global sharing of information in terms of monitoring health outcomes and development of the evidence base. However, this research should not focus solely on developing strategies and testing their efficacy and effectiveness. There is an urgent need for research that examines larger-scale implementation and diffusion of these strategies to whole communities and populations, through the innovative use of a variety of psychological, social, and environmental intervention methods, including evidence from the social and behavioral sciences.

See also: Behavioral Medicine; Epidemiology, Social; Health Behavior: Psychosocial Theories; Health Behaviors; Health Education and Health Promotion; Health Interventions: Community-based; Health Psychology; Mental Health: Community Interventions; Public Health; Socioeconomic Status and Health; Socioeconomic Status and Health Care

Bibliography

- Acheson D 1998 Independent Inquiry into Inequalities in Health. The Stationary Office, London
- Belloc N B, Breslow L 1972 Relationship of physical health status and health practices. Preventive Medicine 1: 409–12
- Centers for Disease Control 1980 Ten Leading Causes of Death in the United States 1977. US Government Printing Office, Washington, DC
- Department of Health and Social Services 1980 Inequalities in Health: Report of a Research Working Group Chaired by Sir Douglas Black. DHHS, London
- Doll R, Hill A B 1964 Mortality in relation to smoking: Ten years' observations of British doctors. British Medical Journal Vol.(i): 1399–410
- Farquhar J W, Wood P D, Breitrose H 1977 Community education for cardiovascular health. Lancet 1: 192–5
- Farquhar J W, Fortmann S P, Flora J A, Taylor C B, Haskell W L, Williams P T, Maccoby N, Wood P D 1990 Effects of community-wide education on cardiovascular risk factors: The Stanford Five-City Project. Journal of the American Medical Association 264: 359–65
- Glanz K, Lewis F M, Rimer B K (eds.) 1997 Health Behavior and Health Education: Theory, Research, and Practice. Jossey-Bass, San Francisco, CA
- Gochman D S (ed.) 1997 Handbook of Health Behavior Research. Plenum, New York
- Gomel M, Oldenburg B, Simpson J, Owen N 1993 Worksite cardiovascular risk reduction: A randomised trial of health risk assessment, education, counselling, and incentives. American Journal of Public Health 83: 1231–8
- Kannel W B, Gordon T 1968 The Framingham Study: An Epidemiological Investigation of Cardiovascular Disease. US Department of Health Education and Welfare, Washington, DC
- Lalonde M 1974 A New Perspective on the Health of Canadians: A Working Document. Government of Canada, Ottawa, ON
- Last J M 1995 A Dictionary of Epidemiology. Oxford University Press, New York
- Lefebvre R C, Lasater T M, Carleton R A, Peterson G 1987 Theory and delivery of health programming in the community: The Pawtucket Heart Health Program. Preventive Medicine 16: 95
- McGinnis J M, Foege W H 1993 Actual causes of death in the United States. Journal of the American Medical Association 270: 2207–12
- Mittelmark M B, Luepker R V, Jacobs D R 1986 Community-wide prevention of cardiovascular disease: Education strategies of the Minnesota Heart Health Program. Preventive Medicine 15: 1–17
- Murray C J L, Lopez A D 1997 Alternative projections of mortality and disability by cause 1990–2020: Global Burden of Disease Study. Lancet 349(9064): 1498–504
- Oldenburg B 1994 Promotion of health: integrating the clinical and public health approaches. In: Maes S, Leventhal H, Johnston M (eds.) International Review of Health Psychology. Wiley, New York pp. 121–44
- Oldenburg B, Hardcastle D, Kok G 1997 Diffusion of innovations. In: Glanz K, Lewis F M, Rimer B K (eds.) Health Behavior and Health Education: Theory, Research, and Practice. Jossey Bass, San Francisco, CA
- Puska P, Nissinen A, Tuomilehto J, Salonen J T, Koskela K, McAlister A, Kotke T E, Maccoby N, Farquhar J W 1985 The community-based strategy to prevent coronary heart disease: Conclusions from ten years of the North Karelia Project. Annual Review of Public Health 6: 147–93
- Rose G 1992 The Strategy of Preventive Medicine. Oxford University Press, Oxford, UK
- Sorensen G, Thompson B, Glanz K, Feng Z, Kinne S, DiClemente C, Emmons K, Heimendinger J, Probart C, Lichtenstein E 1996 Worksite based cancer prevention: primary results from the Working Well Trial. American Journal of Public Health 86: 939–47
- US Department of Health and Human Services 1996 Physical Activity and Health: A Report of the Surgeon General. US Department of Health, Washington, DC
- US State Surgeon General's Advisory Committee 1964 Smoking and Health. US Department of Health, Washington, DC
- The World Bank 1993 World Development Report 1993: Investing in Health. Oxford University Press, New York
- World Health Organization 1986 The Ottawa Charter for Health Promotion. Health Promotion International 1(4): iii–v
- World Health Organization 1964 World Health Organization Constitution. WHO, Geneva
- World Health Organization 1999 World Health Report: Making a Difference. WHO, Geneva

B. Oldenburg

Public Interest

Scholars debate the question of the public interest somewhat less than they once did, but it remains an important issue. As is true of other central concepts, the passage of time does not always lead to an increase in acuity, although it does lead to changes in emphasis (Friedrich 1962, Lewin 1991). Much that might be considered under the rubric of the public interest, moreover, continues to be discussed in terms of associated ideas such as justice, responsibility, and community. This ambiguity complicates a topic that is itself elusive.

1. What is the Public Interest, Conceptually?

The issue of the public interest is best organized under four headings. First is the formal or conceptual question. This includes problems such as the meaning of public as opposed to private, self or common interest, and the meaning of interests as distinguished from other goods. 'Public' sometimes is taken as anything that is not private, so that regard for the public interest means any regard for interests or groups that are not strictly or exclusively one's own (Lewin 1991). Less broadly, a public often is said to be those affected by private groups, in the sense that people who are neither labor nor management are affected by strikes. Such publics, moreover, sometimes are taken to refer to those potentially and not just actually affected as, say, any potential passenger might be inconvenienced by a strike of air traffic controllers.

(Someone can, therefore, have both a private and a public interest in the same matter, and 'self' interest need not be identical to private interest.) In this sense we are all members of many publics. Often, however, the public interest is taken to be what is in the interests of 'all' of us, presumably as citizens within some boundary, although the questions of scope and authority are often curiously undiscussed. There are not many publics in this view but, finally, one public (Friedrich 1962, Barth 1992). The public is the group that makes law. Of course, its interests may be the sum of those of the many affected publics into which it can be divided.

Many discussions of the 'public' in these terms have in mind economic matters, or the point of view of academic economics (Friedrich 1962). A public is seen as an affected or lawmaking group of individuals that seeks satisfaction in economically calculable terms. Publics want things that market failures cause them to receive inadequately. It is serving such publics that defines the responsibilities of professionals and of businesses 'affected with the public interest.' One strength of this conception is that since the 1950s it has brought to bear an increasingly sophisticated understanding of economically rational action, both strategic and straightforward.

There are, however, limits to this perspective. They are evident in the narrowness of the economic view of the public when it is compared to other notions of what is potentially common in common goods. For, what is common is not limited to what each independently and equally can use or enjoy, as we use markets. The common also can involve things of which we are only parts, sometimes equal or identical and sometimes not, as a face is common to its different parts or a team or family common to its members. The ties that characterize what is common, moreover, are not limited to what covers or blankets us universally, but include attaching, placing, fitting, ordering, attracting and other links integral to images of politics from Plato through Hegel. Practical and economically based notions of the public interest will, of course, often take these distinctions for granted, but deeper exploration of the concept of the public interest cannot.

Just as 'public' is often narrower than common, so too are 'interests' conceptually different from goods more broadly conceived. Discussions of the public interest often refer to Adam Smith and, therefore, to a view of what is good as what satisfies desire in the somewhat flat, calculable, and exchangeable manner of post-Hobbesian or Lockean bourgeois life. Interests are linked to what is merely interesting, not to goods as objects of passion, longing, pride or nobility or to the character and institutions that support and direct these. Public interests are what several of us happen to desire, or means to satisfaction that we generally want. Part of the conceptual task in understanding the public interest is to consider the different ways of experiencing goods so that we can grasp how interests are goods conceived in a limited manner that is linked to the premises of liberal individualism.

2. What is the Public Interest, Substantively?

A second question about the public interest is what it is substantively. This issue involves both scope and content. Some scholars seek to limit questions of the public interest only to certain kinds of public goods. Others use it to stand for national goals, purposes or goods more comprehensively. In practice, too, speaking of the public interest generally differs from considering the public's interest in assuring the provision to all of some specific good such as telephone service.

When the scope of the public interest is limited to economic concerns, so too is the content of what is said to comprise it; for some the public interest does not even include protecting rights. To limit the concept in this way risks confusion when 'public interest' retains its broad use in practice and even in theory; to use it broadly, however, seems to involve every question of human purpose and to require some other concept to take the place of the idea used narrowly.

Just as our understanding of the public interest conceived narrowly has benefited from developments in economic understanding, so too has substantive discussion about the public interest conceived broadly undergone notable developments since the 1950s. The triumph of liberal democracies in the Cold War has directed the concerns of the left away from socialism simply to expanding the place of egalitarianism and community within liberal democracy itself. A wish among those who reject the revived concept of natural rights to nonetheless ground the place of rights and defend them from simple utilitarian calculations has become widespread. Concern with the place of virtue and nobility in liberal democracies and, indeed, concern with these phenomena simply has been renewed (Rawls 1971, Strauss 1952). All these trends have enriched and re-energized discussions of the public interest.

3. Can the Public Interest be Implemented?

The third question is how the public interest might be implemented concretely and used as a guide for action. Some thinkers argue that the 'public interest' is too vague to be used other than rhetorically or that it is merely a name that sums up a country's political and economic life at some moment frozen in analytical time (Friedrich 1962). More charitably, one might concede that it means a certain level of economic satisfaction and political freedom but that these are best reached through private and political competition, that is, when no one aims at them directly.

When we conceive the public interest broadly, however, it is not always so difficult to discern how it might guide action. Constitutions, for example, cannot be formed well without explicit attention to more than private concerns: Charles Beard's worm's eye view of the framing of the American Constitution has been debunked by more thoughtfully elevated judgments (Kesler 2000, Mansfield 1991). Once constitutionally secured, individual rights and liberties must be exercised individually, but steps to protect these rights publicly must be attended to explicitly by jurists. National defense is a public interest that guides specific legislative and executive action.

To say that the public good often receives explicit attention is not to say that it goes without debate, but to call it debatable is not to call it meaningless. The deliberations and result of the US' constitutional convention prove the contrary. Similarly, if we take our private interest to include moral and intellectual excellence and not only economic opportunity and satisfaction we would not say that the disputability of these ends makes them pointless. On the contrary, their subtlety may make our attention to them all the more intense.

If we conceive the public interest more narrowly as assuring some equitable or safe provision and distribution of certain goods then it is again clear that the public interest can be a concrete guide. Are expanding access to communications and increasing public health served better by explicit government regulation with a defined public interest in mind of such and such a level of drug safety and computer ownership, or are they better served by discovery and application fueled largely by private desires for wealth, knowledge, and mastery, with little regulatory adjustment of the private application of resources? Is improved education secured better by unfunded parental choice, by funded choice, or by public provision or standards? Explicit attention to health, education and responsible choice as public interests seems necessary to help secure their sufficient provision and fair distribution, if only to ward off excessive regulation and allow private efforts to flourish.

4. Is the Public Interest Followed?

The fourth question is whether anyone in practice pays attention to the public interest or whether private interest in fact dominates even in public matters. It is argued that the actions of voters, representatives, and bureaucrats all can be explained as attempts to enhance private goods; this analysis can be expanded to professionals, journalists, and intellectuals who do public talking, if not public business, for a living. Even if the public interest could guide us, in this view it does not.

Some recent research in the US and Western Europe indicates that voters do not simply or usually vote their immediately selfish economic concerns, that the behavior of representatives cannot always or primarily be explained by their wish for re-election, that bureaucrats do not always want to increase their agency's size, and that groups and individuals sometimes do seek benefits for publics from which they and their members do not receive special advantages (Lewin 1991, Wilson 1989). Of course, a link between private and public interest is to be expected and largely desired in liberal democratic regimes, for the responsibility we encourage in citizens and officials is meant to benefit not just others but oneself as well (Kesler 2000).

Obviously, whether political action actually attempts to serve public interests requires continued study. Only the excessively naive would believe that unbridled devotion to a clearly conceived common good directs each and every political choice. But only the false or foolish sophisticate would believe the public interest to be as fleeting and airy as the summer snow.

See also: Communitarianism: Political Theory; Democracy; Environment and Common Property Institutions; Interest: History of the Concept; Political Culture; Political Representation; Political Sociology; Public Interest Law; Public Opinion: Political Aspects; Public Reason; Representation: History of the Problem

Bibliography

Antitrust and the Economics of the Public Interest 1997 Symposium: Economics of Antitrust Enforcement. Antitrust Bulletin 42(Spring)

- Barth T J 1992 The public interest and administrative discretion. American Review of Public Administration 22: 289–300
- Blitz M 2000 Liberal freedom and responsibility. In: Boxx W T, Quinlaven G (eds.) Public Morality, Civic Virtue and the Problem of Liberalism. Eerdmans, Grand Rapids, MI
- Box R C 1992 The administrator as trustee of the public interest: Normative ideals and daily practice. Administration & Society 24: 323–45
- Dewey J 1927 The Public and Its Problems. Holt, New York
- Friedrich C J (ed.) 1962 The Public Interest. Atherton, New York
- Goodin R E 1996 Institutionalizing the public interest: the defense of deadlock and beyond. American Political Science Review 90: 331–43
- Kesler C (ed.) 2000 Alexander Hamilton, John Jay and James Madison, The Federalist Papers. Random House, New York
- Lewin L 1991 Self Interest and Public Interest in Western Politics (trans. Lavery D). Oxford University Press, Oxford, UK
- Mansfield Jr. H C 1991 America's Constitutional Soul. Johns Hopkins University Press, Baltimore, MD
- Rawls J 1971 A Theory of Justice. Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Strauss L 1952 Natural Right and History. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
- Wilson J Q 1989 Bureaucracy. Basic Books, New York

M. Blitz

Public Interest Law

Public interest law is a branch of legal practice committed to representing traditionally unrepresented groups and interests. It went through a period of rapid growth in the USA in the 1970s and at the beginning of the twenty-first century is an important, though small component of the legal system in the USA and many other countries. Public interest law is often advanced through test case litigation designed to not merely effect the outcome of a particular dispute, but to influence public policy. In tandem with the litigative work, public interest lawyers frequently engage in advocacy before government administrative agencies and legislative bodies.

Public interest law can be distinguished from legal services that focus on representing the personal legal needs of individual clients. The outcome of a public interest lawsuit is likely to reshape public policy or affect the interests of a substantial population. The class action device is sometimes used in such cases, although similar results can be had by representing an organization or, in appropriate cases, even by representation of a single individual on a matter where substantial issues of legal principle are involved. Moreover, a lawsuit in which a doctrinal innovation is made is likely to be followed by strategic efforts to elaborate, or expand, the new principles. For example, the principle that an involuntarily confined mental patient is entitled to receive adequate treatment, which has far-reaching consequences for mental health delivery systems, was established in the case of an individual mental patient (Rouse vs. Cameron).

Subsequently, the principle was developed in class actions in other jurisdictions, and expanded to cover mentally retarded people. The right to refuse treatment was explored in other settings. Legislative, budgetary, and administrative activities also were catalyzed by the judicial decisions.

During the last third of the twentieth century there were significant shifts in public policy in the USA in critical areas such as race relations, environmental protection, and womens rights. In each of these shifts in public policy, public interest lawyers played an important role in tandem with citizen organizing and political action. When legislatures and other agencies of government were closed to citizen advocates, courts were often available. Moreover, the courts frequently, through their decisions in public interest cases, precipitated action in administrative agencies, legislatures, and the executive branch, which would otherwise not have come about.

1. Antecedents

Although the name public interest law was not coined until 1969, its antecedents existed as a set of practices for much of the twentieth century. Historically, public interest law in the USA grew out of four movements, some of which were concerned with broad societal issues, others of which were more concerned with the individual's access to basic legal representation.

The first of the precursors to modern public interest law is the decades-long campaign to redress racial discrimination and racist institutional structures. In this arena, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and its Legal Defense and Education Fund (LDEF) were the paradigm. The LDEF was established in the mid-1930s, and a brilliant group of civil rights lawyers led by Thurgood Marshall (later a Supreme Court Justice) devised a strategy to bring a succession of test cases through the federal courts to the Supreme Court that would gradually undermine the legal foundations for racial segregation. The sequence of cases led to the landmark decision in 1954 of Brown vs. Board of Education, which ended formal, legally mandated segregation in American public schools. In subsequent decades, a series of lawsuits followed to apply the principles of Brown in specific situations and to carry them forward into other areas where racial discrimination was practiced such as employment and housing.

The second pillar upon which public interest law rests is the movement for freedom of expression centered around the American Civil Liberties Union, which grew out of the National Civil Liberties Bureau's defense of anti-war advocates during the World War I years. Third, modern-day consumer advocacy, which is central to much public interest law and is embodied in the various organizations founded by Ralph Nader, traces its lineage back to Supreme Court Justice Louis Brandeis and progressive-era anti-trust legislation. Those years, at the start of the twentieth century, saw the emergence of the idea that the American government had a right, and often a duty, to regulate the marketplace and ameliorate some of the injustices thrown up by a laissez-faire economic structure. Brandeis developed the idea that a 'private attorney general' could go to court to enforce the law if government failed to act.

The last is the legal aid movement that began in the late nineteenth century in New York as a way of providing charity-based legal representation for people too poor to pay private attorneys. Legal aid expanded in the post World War I period in the wake of Reginald Heber Smith's 1919 book Justice and the Poor. In the 1960s, as part of President Lyndon Johnson's War on Poverty, a major federally funded legal services program supplemented legal aid. With the expansion of federal anti-poverty programs in the 1960s, many lawyers within legal services developed public interest law strategies and highly specialized knowledge, litigating on such issues as welfare policy, health care for the poor, and the availability of subsidized housing. They used class actions and other litigation strategies to achieve important policy shifts.

Since the 1960s, public interest law has broadened its scope to include such areas as environmental law, an area where public interest advocacy groups have been particularly successful in building a framework of effective judicial precedents, federal statutes, and regulations. There have also been public interest law efforts addressing gender-based and sexual preference-based discrimination, and legal work on behalf of prisoners. In the 1970s, public interest groups litigated suits that delayed the construction of the Trans-Alaska oil pipeline and forced re-design; this challenged, and eventually halted, the domestic use of the pesticide DDT; and that won stricter oversight of nuclear power plants. In the following decades, public interest law centers specializing in environmental issues have developed into large membership organizations with increasingly sophisticated technical expertise, and a range of coordinated strategies involving litigation, administrative advocacy, grassroots organizing, political advocacy, and public relations.

2. 1969: The 'Public Interest Law Firm'

Sarat and Scheingold (1998) describe public interest law as using 'legal skills to further a vision of the good society.' Most legal work is, in theory, value-neutral, and the attorney representing a fee-paying client without regard to the merits of his claim. Public interest law is, at its core, a systematic effort to bring new voices into policy formulation, and to use the law to attain certain public policy objectives, such as the abolition of legally authorized segregation or the implementation of better environmental protection. Lawyers who accept lower levels of remuneration in exchange for having the freedom to pursue social goals and to represent only clients whose causes they believe have genuine merit practice it.

Most public interest lawyers in the USA work in non-profit public interest law firms, granted tax-exempt status by the Internal Revenue Service on the condition that they are paid a salary by the firm instead of fees by their clients, that they take on cases broadly defined as having implications for the public good, and that their firm operates under a Board of Trustees. The firms' efforts are supplemented by the work of lawyers in private firms who are willing to take on a limited number of pro-bono cases; and by law students who receive academic credit for their work in law school clinics.

The Internal Revenue Service's recognition of the charitable status of public interest law firms has allowed foundations to channel money to these centers. Philanthropic organizations such as the Ford Foundation, the Rockefeller Brothers Fund and the Edna McConnell Clark Foundation donated millions of dollars to public interest law groups. Foundations were particularly important in providing seed money to the public interest movement in the 1970s. Subsequently, many of them became reluctant to fund public interest law activities, especially litigation, because of the controversy such activities engender. Nonetheless, many progressive foundations have continued to support regional organizations to provide funds for local and regional public interest law activities.

The first of the new generation of public interest law firms, and one representative of the genus, is the Center for Law and Social Policy (CLASP) established in 1969. It was founded by four attorneys (including the author) experienced in the distinctive legal culture of Washington, DC. They had backgrounds in corporate law practice and the executive and legislative branches of the federal government. They believed that the effective legal advocacy on behalf of corporations often subverted the mechanisms of government; that the process was impoverished by the absence of effective advocacy on behalf of citizen interests consumers, environmentalists, the poor, the victims of discrimination and others. They organized a bipartisan group of eminent bar leaders, led by Arthur Goldberg, a former Supreme Court Justice and cabinet member, to serve as a Board of Trustees for CLASP. Within a year, CLASP had won landmark victories in two major environmental lawsuits. Early CLASP clients included Ralph Nader, the Wilderness Society and the American Public Health Association.

The CLASP model inspired other public interest law firms, and over time, spun off public interest law groups which served other constituencies among them the Mental Health Law Project (renamed the David L. Bazelon Center for Law and Mental Health) and the National Womens Law Center. It also was a co-founder of the Project on Corporate Responsibility which pioneered in the use of stockholder initiatives to promote socially significant issues, such as environmental protection, consumer interests, and civil rights, and which sponsored Campaign GM in the early 1970s, an effort to elect a slate of independent directors to the Board of General Motors.

Historically, public interest law centers have focused on issues that can be broadly defined as progressive or liberal, acting as a counterbalancing force to corporate power and serving the needs of the poor and powerless. Public interest lawyers frequently provided a counterweight to corporate advocacy. As such, it was essential that they render top-flight legal services and that they be backed up by the specialized technical expertise that was vital in many complicated cases.

Progressive public interest law thrives on both publicity and broader citizen participation. Often litigation launched on behalf of individuals or groups by public interest lawyers is one element in broad campaigns involving political lobbying, sophisticated media campaigns, and sometimes direct action.

3. The Evolution of Public Interest Law

In 1961, Rachel Carson's book Silent Spring was published, putting environmental pollution firmly into American public consciousness. Five years later, Ralph Nader's book Unsafe at Any Speed (1966) did the same for unsafe automobiles. Coming at a time of dramatic social change and political unrest, the two books helped create two new constituencies in American politics: the environmental and the consumer. In the following decades, both issues have joined civil rights, women's rights, and poverty issues at the core of public interest law. When public interest lawyers brought these issues to the courts, they were framed in a way that required decision by judges and other policy makers.

The 1970s were a decade of growth for public interest law, and by 1975 there were more than 90 public interest law firms employing over 600 lawyers. But, although the number of progressive public interest law firms continued to increase in the 1980s, and to spread beyond their traditional bases of the Northeastern USA and California, they did so at a slower rate.

The political climate during the Reagan and Bush presidencies (1981–93) was hostile to many of the constituencies represented by such groups; and their administrations made a concerted effort to counter public interest law activity, through cutting the federal legal services program, limiting government grants to 'advocacy' organizations and appointing federal judges hostile to the interests represented by public interest lawyers.

That the public interest movement weathered these years as well as it did, and was able to enter a new period of growth in the 1990s, reflects the sophisticated fund-raising and publicity techniques it developed, as well as the institutionalization of this branch of law that had been regarded only a decade earlier as a somewhat marginal voice of conscience to the legal profession. Indeed, so successful have some Washington public interest firms become that critics argue that they have become policy 'insiders' and lost touch with the grassroots groups, which they originally set out to serve. As the courts have become less receptive to public interest litigation, public interest lawyers have turned more often to other forms to legislative advocacy, coalition building, initiatives and referenda, and public education. Litigation remains an important dimension of public interest law activity, but it is only one element in developing advocacy strategy.

3.1 The Different Forms of Public Interest Law Practice

Although the main vehicle for public interest law is the nonprofit public interest law firm in which salaried lawyers are employed full-time to handle public interest cases, other forms also exist. Many public interest law firms, such as the Natural Resources Defense Council, have become membership organizations and rely heavily on dues. Some began as affiliates of existing membership organizations, such as the Sierra Club Legal Defense Fund (later spun off and renamed the Earth Justice Legal Defense Fund). Some, like the Institute for Public Representation at Georgetown Law Center, function as clinics in law schools. Some, like the Environmental Defense Fund, integrate scientists and other experts into their staff operations.

Some private lawyers have established public interest practices, without tax exemption, and rely on court-ordered attorney's fee awards in successful cases. The private public interest law firm may also combine public interest law with traditional, financially more profitable cases on behalf of fee-paying clients. What is characteristic of the public interest law firm in its various permutations is the sense of social mission and the prominent role that lawyers play in establishing policy, even in areas where technical expertise is critically important.

Many large corporate firms encourage their lawyers to do a certain amount of 'pro bono work,' although conflict of interest considerations disqualify them from some kinds of cases. Some firms, such as Skadden, Arps in New York, have set up their own public interest fellowship program. The Skadden Fellowship Foundation has awarded 25 such fellowships each year since 1988 to newly graduating law students who are paid to work on public interest matters for a year in connection with a public interest law firm.

Federally funded legal service offices, although facing financial cuts and stringent restrictions on their advocacy strategies (e.g., no class actions), still sometimes, though increasingly rarely, litigate public interest cases.

3.2 New Forms of Financial Support

Many law schools defer or cancel the tuition loans owed by graduates who choose public interest law as a career, and have also set up public interest legal foundations, which raise money among students and alumni to support public interest law work by recent graduates and student interns. The National Association of Public Interest Law, based in Washington, DC, awards student fellowships in the field, and over 120 law schools now belong to the Public Service Law Network (PSL Net), which steers students toward work in approximately 10,000 law-related public service organizations throughout the world. In the case of large membership-based groups such as the Environmental Defense Fund and the Natural Resources Defense Council money is also raised through membership dues. Government grants are sometimes awarded for specific projects. Some regulatory laws, such as the Clean Water Act, have built-in provisions that allow public interest law firms to be awarded fees in successful cases to be paid by the losing party.

3.3 The Divergent Politics

Traditionally, public interest law has promoted progressive causes and the rights of the powerless. But a parallel development has been the development of conservative public interest law firms with an entirely different, generally pro-business agenda. From the mid-1970s a number of aggressively conservative public interest legal centers have emerged in the USA. These law groups the Pacific Legal Foundation, the National Legal Center for the Public Interest, the National Chamber Litigation Group and others represent interests, such as timber companies, that they define as being under attack in a world of environmental protections. However, because of their link to affluent business interests through leadership and financing, it is by no means accepted that these groups meet the traditional criteria for public interest law. Other groups, which represent conservative social positions, such as opposition to abortion and affirmative action, are sometimes grouped with public interest law firms.

3.4 The Internationalization of Public Interest Law

Although public interest law is most widely practiced in the USA, there has been a gradual expansion into other countries. Many groups, especially in the Third World, are funded by Western foundations and non-governmental organizations. During the apartheid era in South Africa, Geoffrey Budlender toured the USA interviewing public interest lawyers on their strategies. Then, funded by the Carnegie and Ford Foundations, he returned to South Africa to participate in the founding of the Legal Resource Center (LRC). Although fighting in a system that had appropriated to itself emergency powers, the LRC litigated over the Pass Laws and issues such as internal banishment. In post-apartheid South Africa, several lawyers who practiced public interest law during the apartheid years have risen to positions of power: Arthur Chaskelson, for example, one-time chair of the LRC board is chief judge of the country's constitutional court.

In Bangladesh, the Madaripur Legal Aid Association represents poor rural Bangladeshis. Likewise, in Nepal, the Women's Legal Services Project works with abused women in a society that is overwhelmingly patriarchal. In India, lawyers from Action for Welfare and Awakening in Rural Environment (AWARE) have litigated against the oppression of lower caste bonded laborers in a culture still heavily influenced by the caste system.

Public interest law has also begun in Latin America; the Latin American Institute of Alternative Legal Services works with over 6,000 lawyers, paralegals and social workers throughout the continent, bringing to public attention issues such as environmental protection and the treatment of street children and indigenous peoples. In Eastern Europe, public interest law groups funded by financier George Soros' Open Society Institute, the German Marshall Fund, the Ford Foundation and others, have worked to solidify freedom of expression, and to counteract racism against groups such as the Roma (Gypsies).

Public interest lawyers are also active in the UK. They have established a Law Centres movement, and worked on immigration issues, trying to halt deportations and to secure refugee status for more asylum-seekers.

In recent years, one promising arena for public interest law has been on a transnational level: international human rights law and the attempts by labor unions to have labor protections introduced into treaties such as NAFTA and the WTO.

4. Summary

Public interest law is an assertion of a commitment within the justice system to fairness, open process, and diversity of viewpoints. It has significantly shaped public policy debates in the USA, even during the Reagan and Bush presidencies. Their administrations helped to make access to the courts a less significant tool for citizen organizations. In response to these developments, many public interest lawyers developed a range of alternate strategies; working more directly in the legislative and administrative processes; filing suits in state courts; and relying more heavily on citizen actions.

The turn of the federal courts in a conservative direction was matched by increasing sophistication and resources in the advocacy effort of large corporations. No longer content to rely on the skills of legal advocates to shape public policy, corporations drew more heavily on public relations professionals. They relied more heavily on political action committees and the financing of political candidates and campaigns, and on massive advertising campaigns to shape public opinion.

Despite these challenges, public interest law in the USA continued to thrive, affecting policy decisions, and providing a measure of balance in the legal system. There are many more law school graduates seeking public interest law work than there are jobs; and there are many situations in which effective public interest advocacy, were it available, would lead to better policy outcomes. The development of public interest law in other countries holds significant promise for fair processes and broader public participation in critical policy decisions ranging from environmental protection to the protection of racial minorities. Globalization creates new needs and opportunities for public interest lawyers to function in transnational settings.

See also: Democracy; Discrimination; Equality and Inequality; Legal Aspects; Justice and Law; Justice, Access to; Legal Representation of the Poor; Law and Democracy; Law and Society; Sociolegal Studies; Law as an Instrument of Social Change; Law: Overview; Political Lawyering; Public Interest; Race and the Law

Bibliography

- Aron N 1989 Liberty and Justice for All: Public Interest Law in the 1980s and Beyond. Westview Press
- Carson R 1961 Silent Spring
- Council for Public Interest Law 1976 Balancing the Scales of Justice: Financing Public Interest Law in America. Council for Public Interest Law
- McClymont M, Golub S (eds.) 2000 Many Roads to Justice: The Law Related Work of Ford Foundation Grantees Around the World. The Ford Foundation
- Nader R 1966 Unsafe at Any Speed
- Sarat A, Scheingold S (eds.) 1998 Cause Lawyering: Political Commitments and Professional Responsibilities. Oxford University Press

Weisbrod B A et al. 1978 Public Interest Law: An Economic and Institutional Analysis. University of California Press, CA

C. Halpern

Public Management, New

A term coined in the late 1980s to denote a new (or renewed) stress on the importance of management and 'production engineering' in public service delivery, often linked to doctrines of economic rationalism (see Hood 1989, Pollitt 1993). The apparent emergence of a more managerial 'mood' in several (mainly but not exclusively English-speaking) countries at that time created a need for a new label. The new term was intended to denote public service reform programs that were not confined to the 'new right' in a narrow sense, but also came from labor and social-democratic parties and in that sense could be considered as part of what was later labeled a 'third way' agenda.

New Public Management is sometimes (understandably) confused with the 'New Public Administration' movement in the USA of the late 1960s and early 1970s (cf. Marini 1971). But though there may have been some common features, the central themes of the two movements were different. The main thrust of the New Public Administration movement was to bring academic public administration into line with a radical egalitarian agenda that was influential in US university campuses at that time. By contrast, the emphasis of the New Public Management movement a decade or so later was firmly managerial in the sense that it stressed the difference management could and should make to the quality and efficiency of public services. Its focus on public service production functions and operational issues contrasted with the focus on public accountability, 'model employer' public service values, 'due process,' and what happens inside public organizations in conventional public administration. That meant New Public Management doctrines tended to be opposed to egalitarian ideas of managing without managers, juridical doctrines of rigidly rule-bound administration and doctrines of self-government by public-service professionals like teachers and doctors.

However, like most divinities, the core of New Public Management is somewhat mystical in essence, despite or perhaps because of the amount that has been written about its central content. Different authors give various lists of its key traits (e.g., Hood 1989, Pollitt 1993). Some have identified different styles of public-sector managerialism over time (see Ferlie et al. 1996). How far the small-government economic-rationalist agenda that went together with more stress on public-sector management in the 1980s and 1990s was integral to those managerial ideas is debatable (see Barzelay 2000). But it is hard to separate these elements historically, since the advent of a new generation of public-sector managerialism coincided with concern by numerous OECD governments to reduce the power of public service trade unions, increase regulatory transparency and tackle perceived inefficiencies of public enterprises. A commonly-cited view of New Public Management's central doctrinal content is Aucoin's (1990) argument that it comprised a mixture of ideas drawn from corporate management and from institutional economics or public choice. To the extent that Aucoin's characterization is accurate, it suggests New Public Management involves a marriage, if not exactly of opposites, at least of different outlooks, attitudes, and beliefs that are in tension. Savoie (1995) argues that the central doctrinal theme of public-sector managerialism is the idea of giving those at the head of public organizations more discretionary decision space in exchange for direct accountability for their actions.

Despite the label, many of the doctrines commonly associated with New Public Management are not new. Jeremy Bentham's voluminous philosophy of public administration developed in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth century provides the locus classicus for many supposedly contemporary ideas, including transparent management, pay for performance, public service provision by private organizations, and individual responsibility. The idea that more effective public services could be obtained by judicious application of private-sector management ideas is also a theme going back at least to the US city-manager movement of the late nineteenth century (cf. Downs and Larkey 1986). It was advanced early in the twentieth century by figures like Taylor (1916) and Demitriadi (1921). The idea that public services can be improved by giving some autonomy to managers operating at arms length from political standard-setters was often invoked in the nationalized public enterprise era. It was central to Beatrice and Sydney Webb's early twentieth-century Fabian idea of the proper way of organizing the 'social' tasks of government. Some have argued the contemporary doctrine of creating 'managerial space' in public services harks back to the US Progressive-era doctrine of a politics-administration dichotomy and independent regulators (cf. Overman 1984).

Like feminism or environmentalism, New Public Management is both a social movement and a subject of academic study. Indeed, during the 1990s, New Public Management has become a major academic industry across the world, filling bookshelves and websites with writings and conference proceedings using the term in their titles. It has its advocates and its critics, its analysts, morphologists and epistemologists, its evaluators and case-historians. Advocates stress the value to citizens and consumers to be gained by enlightened managers moving beyond what is claimed to be an outdated 'bureaucratic paradigm,' paying more attention to how to satisfy citizen demands and to service delivery through organizations other than traditional public bureaucracies (see Barzelay and Armajani 1992, Osborne and Gaebler 1992, Jones and Thompson 1999). A sophisticated defence of public-sector managerialism is Moore's (1995) exposition of a 'strategic triangle' (of political possibility, substantive value, and administrative feasibility) within which skillful and entrepreneurial public managers can 'add value' to public services. Critics of public-sector managerialism stress the virtues of traditional Weberian bureaucracy for rule-of-law or public accountability (cf. Goodsell 1994) or see managerialism as a 'wrong problem problem' (Frederickson 1996) diverting governments' attention from hard policy choices. Some critics of New Public Management doctrines see them as too heavily based on business-school and private-sector management perspectives, and some public-choice scholars have offered 'rent-seeking' explanations of contemporary public sector reforms (see Dunleavy 1992).

Morphologists and analysts of New Public Management have several concerns. They include exploring different forms and types of public-sector managerialism, identifying how managerialism varies cross-nationally, and explaining the observed commonalities and differences (cf. Savoie 1995, Aucoin 1995). A key debate (to date inconclusive because of poor benchmarking of historical points of origin) concerns how far or in what ways contemporary public management reforms represent convergence on some global paradigm. Some stress the international commonality of public-sector management reform themes while others stress the different political motivations that prompt reforms (Cheung 1997) or argue that New Public Management represents an 'Anglo-Saxon' reform agenda that does not resonate in other contexts (Derlien 1992, Kickert 1997). A related explanatory enterprise is represented by a search to understand why management-reform ideas became popular when and where they did (cf. Hood and Jackson 1991). Epistemological debates concern the appropriate disciplinary framework for reasoning about contemporary public sector management and the rival claims of different schools or approaches to intellectual ownership of the subject, particularly in the US context of competing schools of public policy, public administration and political science (see Lynn 1996, Barzelay 2000).

Evaluators and case-historians of public-sector managerial change track the processes of reform and explore their effects. Much of this work is pitched at the level of single agencies (such as Jones and Thompson 1999), but there have been some attempts to evaluate government-wide changes (see Schick 1996). Evaluation of the effects of new managerial techniques has been patchy, but several scholars have identified 'managerial paradoxes' of one kind or another. One of those paradoxes is Maor's (1999) observation that the development of a more managerial approach to public service produced more, not less, politicization of the senior public service in six countries. A second is Gregory's (1995) controversial claim that orthodox managerial approaches foster a 'production' approach to public services that leads to several unintended effects, including downgrading of responsibility and what he termed 'careful incompetence.' A third is the claim, redolent of Tocqueville's paradox of administrative development in post-revolutionary France, that contemporary public management may in fact involve more rather than less 'rules-based, process-driven' bureaucracy, as a result of increasing oversight and regulation and continuing stress on compliance-based rather than result-based evaluation (see Light 1993, Jones and Thompson 1999, Hood et al. 1999, Pollitt et al. 1999).

In spite of the scale and growth of the New Public Management 'industry,' or perhaps because of it, the term New Public Management has probably outlived its analytic usefulness. The term is ambiguous because the agenda of public sector reform has moved in some respects beyond the traits identified by scholars of public management in the 1990s reflecting the various cultural cross-currents that have swept through managerial debate. The term is also too crude for the fine-grained distinctions between different sorts and themes of managerialism that academic scholars need to make as the study of public services develops and the public sector reform movement becomes professionalized. Just as Eskimos are said to have many different terms to distinguish different types of snow, we need more words to describe the cultural and technical variety of contemporary managerialism. So it is not surprising that there have been numerous attempts to proclaim a move beyond New Public Management (e.g. Minogue et al. 1998). Nevertheless, in spite of its oft-proclaimed death, the term refuses to lie down and continues to be widely used by practitioners and academics alike.

See also: Administration in Organizations; Bentham, Jeremy (1748–1832); Planning, Administrative Organization of; Public Administration: Organizational Aspects; Public Administration, Politics of; Public Bureaucracies; Public Sector Organizations

Bibliography

- Aucoin P 1990 Administrative reform in public management: paradigms, principles, paradoxes and pendulums. Governance 3: 115–37
- Aucoin P 1995 The New Public Management. IRPP, Montreal, Canada
- Barzelay M 2000 The New Public Management. University of California Press, Berkeley, CA
- Barzelay M, Armajani B J 1992 Breaking Through Bureaucracy. University of California Press, Berkeley, CA
- Cheung A B L 1997 Understanding public-sector reforms: Global trends and diverse agendas. International Review of Administrative Sciences 63(4): 435–57
- Demitriadi S 1921 A Reform for the Civil Service. Cassell, London
- Derlien H-U 1992 Administrative reform in Europe—Rather comparable than comparative. Governance 5(3): 279–311
- Downs G W, Larkey P D 1986 The Search for Government Efficiency. 1st edn. Temple University Press, Philadelphia, PA
- Dunleavy P 1992 Democracy, Bureaucracy and Public Choice. Harvester Wheatsheaf, Aldershot, UK
- Ferlie E, Pettigrew A, Ashburner, Fitzgerald L 1996 The New Public Management in Action. Oxford University Press, Oxford, UK
- Frederickson G H 1996 Comparing the reinventing government movement with the new public administration. Public Administration Review 56(3): 263–70
- Goodsell C T 1994 The Case for Bureaucracy, 3rd edn. Chatham House, Chatham, NJ
- Gregory R 1995 Accountability, responsibility and corruption: Managing the 'public production process'. In: Boston J (ed.) The State Under Contract. Bridget Williams Books, Wellington, New Zealand
- Hood C 1989 Public administration and public policy: Intellectual challenges for the 1990s. Australian Journal of Public Administration 48: 346–58
- Hood C, Jackson M 1991 Administrative Argument. Aldershot, Dartmouth, UK
- Hood C, Scott C, James O, Jones G W, Travers A 1999 Regulation Inside Government. Oxford University Press, Oxford, UK
- Jones L, Thompson F 1999 Public Management. JAI Press, Stamford, CA
- Kickert W J 1997 Public management in the United States and Europe. In: Kickert W J M (ed.) Public Management and Administrative Reform in Western Europe. Edward Elgar, Cheltenham, UK, pp. 15–38
- Light P Q 1993 Monitoring Government. Brookings Institution, Washington, DC
- Lynn Jr. L E 1996 Public Management as Art Science and Profession. Chatham House, Chatham, NJ
- Marini F 1971 Toward a New Public Administration. Chandler, Scranton, PA
- Maor M 1999 The Paradox of Managerialism. Public Administration Review 59(1): 5–18
- Minogue M, Polidano C, Hulme D (eds.) 1998 Beyond the New Public Management. E Elgar, Cheltenham, UK
- Moore M H 1995 Creating Public Value. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Osborne D, Gaebler T 1992 Reinventing Government. Addison-Wesley, Reading, MA
- Overman E S 1984 Public management. Public Administration Review 44: 275–8
- Pollitt C 1993 Managerialism and the Public Services, 2nd edn. Blackwell, Oxford, UK
- Pollitt C, Girre X, Lonsdale J, Mul R, Summa H, Waerness M 1999 Performance or Compliance? Oxford University Press, Oxford, UK
- Savoie D J 1995 Thatcher, Reagan, Mulroney. Pittsburgh University Press, Pittsburgh, PA
- Schick A 1996 The Spirit of Reform. State Services Commission and NZ Treasury, Wellington, New Zealand

Taylor F W 1916 Government efficiency. Bulletin of the Taylor Society 2: 7–13

C. Hood

Public Opinion: Microsociological Aspects

Although the insight that public opinion is a powerful force goes back to premodern social thought, the task of modeling how public opinion evolves through the interdependent choices of individuals was not taken up until the last quarter of the twentieth century. Through the ensuing theorizing, the term has acquired a more precise meaning than it holds in everyday language. In choice-based, microsociological theory, a group's 'public opinion' now refers to the distribution of the preferences that its members express publicly. By contrast, 'private opinion' signifies the corresponding distribution of genuine preferences. Where individuals choose to misrepresent their actual desires in public settings, these two distributions may differ.

1. Theoretical Foundations

The theoretical literature on public opinion addresses diverse phenomena that have puzzled social thinkers. They include its resistance to changes in social structures and policy outcomes; its capacity for immense movement if ever this resistance is overcome; its sensitivity to the ordering of social shocks; and its imperfect predictability.

Most variants of the theory draw on a class of constructs known as 'threshold,' 'critical mass,' 'bandwagon,' or 'cascade' models. Originally designed to explain epidemics, these were subsequently applied most influentially by Schelling (1978) and Granovetter (1978) to various social phenomena that exhibit periods of stability punctuated by sudden change, for example, stock market bubbles, bank runs, cultural fashions, corporate conservatism, and academic fads. The common feature of these phenomena is that they are shaped by interdependencies among individual decisions.

Public opinion harbors two distinct interdependencies. Wherever individuals lack reliable information of their own, they look to others for clues about the reality they are seeking to grasp. Such 'free-riding' on publicly available knowledge makes people's genuine wants interdependent. Also, in articulating preferences and conveying knowledge, individuals frequently tailor their choices to what appears socially acceptable. This conformism, which is motivated by the wish to earn acceptance and respect, creates interdependencies among the wants that individuals convey publicly.

2. The Public Opinion of a Poorly Informed Group

The essential contributions of the theory may be sketched through a model drawn from Kuran (1995), which contains additional details. Certain initial assumptions will be relaxed further on.

2.1 Thresholds and Expressive Equilibria

Consider a 10-person society that must decide a certain issue, say, the government's crime-fighting budget. Two alternatives present themselves: low (L) and high (H). Each individual will support whichever option appears socially optimal. Everyone will want this budget increased if crime seems to be rising but decreased if crime appears to be falling.

By assumption, no one has perfectly reliable private information. Consequently, every individual's judgment will depend partly, if not largely, on the apparent judgments of others. This does not mean that individual beliefs must converge. Because of differences in private information, any given common signal about the distribution of preferences may make some people favor H and others L.

For any individual, the minimum share that must consider H optimal for him or her to concur constitutes what is called that individual's responsiveness threshold. This threshold is a number between 0 and 100. Listing all 10 thresholds in ascending order yields society's threshold sequence (T). Here is an example:

T: (0, 10, 30, 30, 40, 50, 50, 60, 70, 80)

These individuals may be labeled a, b, ..., j, with a considered female, b male, and so on, in alternating fashion.

Given the heterogeneity reflected in this sequence, the perceived division between the supporters of H and those of L can influence dramatically the realization of public opinion. For a demonstration, suppose that initially only 10 percent of society is thought to favor H. Whatever the source of this perception, a and b will favor H, because their thresholds lie at or below 10; and the remaining eight members of the group will favor L, because their thresholds lie above 10. The resulting public opinion will thus lean heavily against H, which will enjoy the support of only 20 percent of the 10 individuals. The outcome will not impel anyone to switch positions, so it represents an expressive equilibrium. The knowledge that only two of the 10 individuals favor H will make exactly that share do so.

This particular expressive equilibrium is not the only possible self-sustaining outcome. If initially society was believed to be divided evenly between the two options, the first seven members of the sequence (all except those with thresholds above 50) would have favored H. Observing that 70 percent favor H, the two individuals with thresholds of 60 and 70 would then have joined the majority, raising this support to 90 percent. Finally, completing the learning process, this second adjustment would have impelled the lone hold-out to join in. As with the above case of a divided public opinion, the resulting unanimity would have been self-reproducing.

2.2 Properties of Public Opinion

This pair of illustrations highlights several characteristics. Public opinion is path dependent, in that changing its historical starting point might alter the outcome. It is also sensitive to small events, which are intrinsically insignificant happenings that an analyst seeking a retrospective explanation would probably overlook. Whereas an initial perception of 20 percent support for H would be self-confirming, a perception of 30 percent would lead to a consensus in favor of H. The difference in these two outcomes is vastly disproportionate to the difference in their starting conditions, whose determinants would not necessarily register on a historian's viewscreen. Finally, public opinion may be unrepresentative of the available private information. Where the outcome is a consensus, it conceals the existence of substantial private information favorable to the unanimously rejected option.

2.3 Informational Cascades

The iterative process through which a self-reproducing public opinion takes shape generally is known as an informational cascade (Bikchandani et al. 1992). Under certain conditions, an informational cascade will enhance social efficiency. For example, where the first people to articulate their views are those with the most accurate information, the consequent interdependent learning will help to dampen private ignorance. However, such a fortuitous outcome cannot be guaranteed. Instead of educating the poorly informed, the informational cascade might serve to un-educate the most knowledgeable. This finding points to yet another characteristic of public opinion. It is sensitive to the order in which people express themselves.

Insofar as the evolution of public opinion influences policy decisions, it may weaken the political system's effectiveness in addressing social concerns. For example, it might induce the government to pour resources into solving a problem widely considered serious only because the pertinent social learning was spearheaded by the ignorant. Yet, the resulting allocation would not be undemocratic. Whatever the reason why public opinion has come to favor the allocation, and however wasteful an outsider might consider the instituted policy, the members of society would only be exercising the freedom to make their own mistakes. Moreover, the government would simply be responding to the popular will.

3. Reputational Determinants of Public Opinion

Though analytically useful, the above account provides an undersocialized view of human nature. In practice, people do not express their potentially controversial views mechanically, without considering how their social standings might be affected. As social beings who wish to be liked and accepted, they may refrain from expressing beliefs or preferences that are likely to offend powerful groups. Some evidence lies in Asch's (1957) line experiment, in which subjects contradicted the evidence of their own senses to avoid isolation and criticism, and in Noelle-Neumann's (1984) pre-election surveys, in which the publicly acknowledged party preferences of respondents, though not necessarily their private sentiments, varied according to their perceptions of which party was running ahead. Additional evidence comes from Scott's (1985) ethnographic research, which finds that peasants may profess loyalty to their political regime, yet also work to undermine it in settings where they can do so with impunity.

The activists who direct society's pressure groups seek to exploit the reputational concerns that such studies highlight. They do so partly by treating people differently according to their public expressions and partly by providing incentives for criticizing, belittling, perhaps even ostracizing, overt opponents of the groups they are promoting. Insofar as such tactics are successful, individuals tailor their public positions to the prevailing social demands, and public opinion is thereby affected.

3.1 Private and Public Preferences

Depending on the nature of the information distorted to obtain social rewards and escape social punishment, such misrepresentation is called either preference falsification or knowledge falsification. On any given issue, preference falsification occurs when an individual's publicly expressed preference, or simply public preference, differs from the corresponding privately held preference, or private preference. Similarly, knowledge falsification entails a discrepancy between the communicator's private knowledge and public knowledge.

Whereas a person's private preference always reflects the relevant private knowledge, this person's public preference and public knowledge need not be mutually consistent. In practice, however, the two choices tend to be tightly coordinated in order to make the former credible. Someone who pretends to favor one particular option, but then proceeds to give reasons for another option's superiority, will hardly come across as sincere; the person's intended audience will sense that they are concealing something.

3.2 Reputational Cascades

For further insights into how individual expressions both mold public opinion and are molded by it, reconsider the threshold sequence of Section 2.1, adding the assumption that if the 10 individuals were polled anonymously, H would be favored five-to-three, with two abstentions. Specifically, the five members with thresholds of up to 40 would support H , the two with thresholds of 50 would be indifferent, and the three with the highest thresholds would support L . These preferences expressed under the cover of anonymity are private preferences. Thresholds depend partly on private preferences, because submitting to others' demands causes psychological discomfort, albeit of a magnitude subject to variation across contexts and individuals. A second determinant of thresholds is sensitivity to social pressures. Under this section's more realistic scenario, then, a threshold reflects not only the nature and depth of an individual's private preference but also that individual's preparedness to pay the price of joining an underprivileged expressive minority. Put differently, a threshold captures an individual's tradeoff between the benefits of truthful self-expression and those of reputationally advantageous preference falsification. If person c 's threshold is 30, the sum of their expected satisfaction from all sources, including truthful self-expression and both favorable and unfavorable reputational consequences, is maximized by expressing a preference for H whenever the share of its supporters appears to be at least 30. Otherwise, their expected satisfaction is maximized by publicly favoring L .

This threshold sequence produces, as already noted, two stable equilibria that represent highly different realizations of public opinion. Under the current assumptions, the selection among these equilibria occurs through a reputational cascade. In the course of a reputational cascade, people conform to the apparently popular choice not because they see wisdom in numbers but merely to maintain a favorable reputation. In so doing they make it increasingly difficult for others to remain nonconformist.

3.3 The Possibility of Inefficiency

Like the social learning mechanism described earlier, this social adaptation mechanism driven by reputational concerns makes public opinion path dependent, unrepresentative of the available private information, and sensitive to both small events and the order of individual choices. Additionally, it may make public opinion unrepresentative of private opinion. In the illustration of Section 3.2, neither of the possible outcomes matches what an anonymous opinion survey would identify as the 'popular will.' Whereas three members privately favor it, H could achieve either unanimous support or the support of just a two-person minority. Either way, social policies designed to accommodate public opinion would be responding to signals distorted by preference falsification. As such, these policies could be inefficient.

3.4 Availability Cascades

There are contexts in which public opinion is shaped by either purely informational or purely reputational cascades. As a rule, however, the outlined informational and reputational mechanisms feed on each other, or at least interact. The composite mechanism whereby public opinion evolves through both social learning and conformism aimed at securing social acceptance is known as an availability cascade (Kuran and Sunstein 1999).

4. Feedback from Public Discourse to Private Opinion

Reputational cascades treat private preferences as fixed. For their part, informational and availability cascades recognize the plasticity of private preferences, but only during the transition to a self-sustaining public opinion. In reality, this plasticity is not limited to periods of disequilibrium. Whether public opinion is at rest or in flux, the private knowledge that undergirds private preferences is ordinarily shaped and reshaped by public discourse, which consists of the suppositions, observations, and arguments that are communicated publicly (Coleman 1990).

Preference falsification affects this private learning through two channels. As both informational and availability cascades posit, the state of public opinion, whatever its inconsistencies with private opinion, molds individual interpretations of reality. In addition, the knowledge falsification that accompanies preference falsification sows ignorance and confusion by corrupting information in the public domain through the substitution of facts that people know to be false for ones they consider true. Over time, knowledge falsification may even make once-common objections to a publicly popular option disappear from society's collective memory.

Under diverse conditions, population renewal will facilitate such an outcome. If public discourse excludes criticisms of the fashionable option, its drawbacks will tend to be forgotten as society's composition changes through births and deaths, or simply entries and exits. This is because new cohorts will not be exposed to the unfiltered private knowledge of previous cohorts but only to the reconstructed knowledge that was considered safe to communicate. The previous cohorts may have disliked the option yet refrained from challenging it. The younger cohorts will preserve it not only because they are afraid to object but also, perhaps mainly, because the impoverished public discourse of the past has blunted their capacity to criticize the inherited social order and imagine better alternatives. Insofar as past preference falsification removes individual inclinations to want something different, current preference falsification will cease to be a source of public opinion's stability. People will support established arrangements genuinely rather than to make a good impression (Kuran 1995).

A complementary mechanism leading to intellectual impoverishment and the absence of dissent is driven by individual decisions to choose 'exit' over 'voice.' When people withdraw from a troubled society to avoid the costs of speaking up, the society's ability to institute reforms diminishes (Hirschman 1970).

The foregoing dissent-dampening mechanisms have universal relevance. Customs, norms, laws, and other institutions that keep societies poor, organizations ineffective, and inequalities unchallenged often owe their stability to the paucity of overt demands for reform. By the same token, other institutions that promote growth, efficiency, and equality are held in place through pressures that diminish both the desire and the willingness to work toward their overthrow. As Tocqueville (1945) observes, these mechanisms even contribute to the stability of traits that give nations and cultures their unique identities.

5. The Imperfect Predictability of Public Opinion

If public discourse were the only determinant of private knowledge, once a public consensus had taken shape, it would become frozen. In fact, private knowledge has other determinants, including the material consequences of prevailing policies. By sowing doubts about established structures, these other factors can induce changes in private preferences and, ultimately, also in public preferences. However, the unraveling of an established consensus need not track the escalation of private opposition to the status quo. As long as the prevailing social pressures keep preference falsification optimal for all potential dissenters, private opposition will intensify without any change in public opposition. Yet, as the undercurrent of opposition swells, a shock that affects the right people's thresholds in the right manner will stimulate switches in certain public preferences. Even without further shocks, these switches will then encourage individuals with slightly higher thresholds to join the growing chorus of dissent. Once put in motion, then, open opposition can feed on itself, with each addition generating further additions until much of society publicly identifies with the reformist camp.

Because preference falsification had concealed the opposition brewing under the surface, this revolutionary transformation will not have been anticipated. Even so, the massive change in public opinion may easily be explained with the benefit of hindsight. The revolution's success will have lowered the personal risk of acknowledging past acts of preference falsification. It will also have created incentives for people who had supported the status quo ante sincerely to pretend that they had simply been waiting for a safe opportunity to speak out for change. Examples of largely unanticipated revolutions include the French Revolution of 1789, the Iranian Revolution of 1978, and the East European Revolutions of 1989. Each of these earth-shaking transformations entailed a massive shift in public opinion that stunned its beneficiaries, victims, and observers.

6. Methodology

A distinction of the choice-based, microsociological analysis of public opinion is that it admits circular relationships generated by feedback effects. For one thing, it links the social pressures that determine the extent to which private and public opinion diverge to the very collective process that shapes public opinion. For another, it recognizes that public opinion shapes the private preferences that are among its own determinants. By virtue of these characteristics, the microsociological approach differs methodologically from social scientific traditions in which either culture or the motives of individuals are fixed. Another salient distinction of this approach lies in its multidimensional conception of individual motives. In recognizing that individuals make tradeoffs between their expressive and reputational needs, it stands out from analytical traditions, including most variants of the public choice school, that treat individuals as invariably sincere (Downs 1957). At the opposite extreme, it stands out from self-presentation theories that view individuals as one-dimensional agents interested only in making a good impression (Goffman 1973).

Nothing in the arguments surveyed here presuppose that certain cultures promote truthfulness and others mendacity. Because people everywhere express themselves with an eye toward balancing diverse objectives, the identified social processes may be observed in any society—economically developed or advanced, democratic or undemocratic, large or small. Where public opinion shows variations across societies—as it often does markedly—the variations do not stem from differences in the underlying basic mechanisms. Rather, they reflect historical contingencies that generated persistent differences in institutions, social pressures, and private knowledge.

See also: Collective Beliefs: Sociological Explanation; Democracy; Influence: Social; Lazarsfeld, Paul Felix (1901–76); Media Effects; Opinion Formation; Political Discourse; Political Sociology; Polling; Popular Culture; Public Opinion: Political Aspects; Public Sphere and the Media; Rational Choice Theory in Sociology; Tocqueville, Alexis de (1805–59)

Bibliography

- Asch S E 1957 Studies of independence and conformity: I. A minority of one against a unanimous majority. Psychological Monographs 70: 416
- Bikchandani S, Hirshleifer D, Welch I 1992 A theory of fads, fashion, custom, and cultural change as informational cascades. Journal of Political Economy 100: 992–1026
- Coleman J S 1990 Foundations of Social Theory. Belknap Press, Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Downs A 1957 An Economic Theory of Democracy. Harper, New York
- Goffman E 1973 The Presentation of Self in Everyday Life. Overlook Press, Woodstock, NY
- Granovetter M 1978 Threshold models of collective behavior. Am. J. Soc. 83: 1420–43
- Hirschman A O 1970 Exit, Voice, and Loyalty: Responses to Decline in Firms, Organizations, and States. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Kuran T 1995 Private Truths, Public Lies: The Social Consequences of Preference Falsification. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Kuran T, Sunstein C R 1999 Availability cascades and risk regulation. Stanford Law Rev. 51: 683–768
- Noelle-Neumann E 1984 The Spiral of Silence: Public Opinion—Our Social Skin. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
- Schelling T C 1978 Micromotives and Macrobehavior. Norton, New York
- Scott J C 1985 Weapons of the Weak: Everyday Forms of Peasant Resistance. Yale University Press, New Haven, CT
- de Tocqueville A 1945 Democracy in America. Knopf, New York

T. Kuran

Public Opinion: Political Aspects

1. Scope and Methods

Public opinion has been usefully defined by V. O. Key Jr. as ‘those opinions held by private persons which governments find it prudent to heed’ (Key 1961). Scholars of public opinion attempt to describe and account for the politically relevant preferences and beliefs of ordinary citizens, and to assess the political impact of those preferences and beliefs. They investigate a wide range of subject matter, including broad ideologies, specific policy preferences, evaluations of political parties and candidates, assessments of self-interest and collective interest, attributions of political responsibility, and attitudes toward social groups and political institutions (Kinder 1998).

The study of public opinion draws upon and overlaps the study of political psychology, but tends to focus on collective preferences and beliefs in their broad political context rather than on individual mental processes (see Opinion Formation). For example, the most notable work in the field begins with a psychological account of ‘how citizens acquire information and convert it into public opinion,’ but ‘pays vastly more attention to the social sources of mass attitudes—in particular, the availability of information in elite discourse—than to the largely autonomous operation of people’s minds and psyches’ (Zaller 1992, p. 3).

Obviously, which opinions held by private persons governments will find it prudent to heed, depends significantly upon the political setting. It should not be surprising that systematic attention to the workings of public opinion has been most common in modern liberal democracies, where the preferences and beliefs of ordinary citizens are supposed to be broadly and routinely consequential, whether through elections of public officials, voting in referenda, interest group activities, or other mechanisms. By the same logic, the proliferation of new democracies in Eastern Europe, Latin America, and Asia since the 1980s may be expected to stimulate unprecedented scholarly attention to public opinion in those parts of the world.

Contemporary studies of public opinion are profoundly shaped by insights and concerns stemming from the rise of mass politics in the nineteenth century and from the intertwined evolution of modern democratic states and societies. For example, Zaller’s (1992) influential model of the dynamics of opinion change builds upon Bryce’s (1888) distinction between the ‘active class’ of political entrepreneurs and the ‘passive class’ of ordinary citizens who have ‘been told what to think, and why to think it,’ and upon Lippmann’s (1922) analysis of the role of the mass media and political elites (including government bureaucrats) in shaping ‘the pictures in our head’ that govern our reactions to complex and distant public affairs.

While long-standing insights and concerns are readily recognizable in modern scholarship on public opinion, empirical research in the field has been transformed since the 1940s by the development and proliferation of increasingly ambitious and sophisticated opinion surveys. Semistructured in-depth interviews, focus groups, and laboratory experiments continue to generate valuable insights, but their relatively small scale and problems of external validity make them better suited to the study of individual political psychology than of collective public sentiment. By comparison, an opinion survey with several hundred randomly selected respondents can provide a reasonably accurate representation of the preferences and beliefs of millions of ordinary citizens—public opinion on a scale which governments may well find it prudent to heed.

2. Pioneering Analysis

The pioneering analyses of public opinion based upon survey data were conducted in connection with US presidential elections of the 1940s (Berelson et al. 1954) and 1950s (Campbell et al. 1960). Berelson et al. concluded that election campaigns mostly activate pre-existing political preferences rooted in ethnic, sectional, class, and family traditions and reinforced by social interactions with like-minded acquaintances (see Campaigning: Political; Voting: Class). Campbell et al. emphasized the central importance of long-standing psychological attachments to the political parties (see Party Identification), while also acknowledging the significance of such short-term forces as Dwight Eisenhower's personal popularity, which overcame but did not supplant the Democratic advantage in party identification dating from the New Deal era. Both of these studies portrayed public opinion as surprisingly thin and unsystematic, arguing, for example, that 'many people know the existence of few if any of the major issues of policy' (Campbell et al. 1960, p. 170) and that political preferences 'are characterized more by faith than by conviction and by wishful expectation rather than careful prediction of consequences' (Berelson et al. 1954, p. 311).

These uncomplimentary characterizations of public opinion were refined and elaborated in what remains the single most influential (and controversial) work in the field, Philip Converse's essay on 'The nature of belief systems in mass publics' (Converse 1964). Converse's analysis was based on three primary sorts of evidence. First, he showed that survey respondents answering open-ended questions only rarely made spontaneous use of systematic ideological concepts or language. Second, he showed that respondents' political views were only weakly constrained by conventional notions of 'what goes with what': liberals on one issue often took conservative positions on other issues, even within the same policy domain (see Issue Constraint in Political Science). Third, repeated interviews with the same respondents demonstrated a great deal of instability in their opinions, and the pattern of that instability suggested that it was caused more by random fluctuation than by systematic responses to political events. On the basis of this evidence, Converse (1964, p. 245) concluded that 'large portions of an electorate do not have meaningful beliefs, even on issues that have formed the basis for intense political controversy among elites for substantial periods of time.'

3. Civic Competence

The civic competence of ordinary citizens has remained a central issue of scholarly debate in the decades since Converse's devastating analysis. One line of revisionist argument accepted the accuracy of Converse's characterization of public opinion in the USA of the 1950s, but denied its relevance to other times and places. Most notably, Nie et al. (1976) and others argued that the political upheavals of the 1960s had produced a 'new American voter' more sophisticated, more ideological, and more attuned to political issues than the one portrayed by Campbell et al. (1960) and Converse (1964) (see Voting: Issue). While this thesis has been subjected to vigorous methodological critiques—and has come with the passage of time to seem at least as time-bound in its own right as the portrayal it aimed to supplant—it focused attention on the potential responsiveness of public opinion to such powerful contextual factors as social change and the nature of political rhetoric.

A newer wave of revisionist scholarship has acknowledged that most citizens in most circumstances are relatively inattentive to politics and uninformed about public affairs, but has interpreted these facts as evidence of 'rational ignorance' in Anthony Downs's sense of avoiding costly information gathering in a realm in which individual investment can have only negligible collective consequences. This interpretation is nicely conveyed by the titles of three notable works of the early 1990s: The Reasoning Voter (Popkin 1991), Reasoning and Choice (Sniderman et al. 1991), and The Rational Public (Page and Shapiro 1992). These and other works argued that ordinary citizens make sense of the political world despite their lack of detailed information about ideologies, policies, and candidates. In some cases, the emphasis is on how citizens use 'information shortcuts' and 'gut reasoning' (Popkin 1991) to deal efficiently with political complexity. In others, the emphasis is on the tendency of statistical aggregation to iron out individual errors and idiosyncrasies in mass publics, building upon an argument first set forth by Condorcet in the eighteenth century. This 'extenuationist' literature (to use a label coined by Robert Luskin) has in turn inspired attempts to measure the extent to which information shortcuts and aggregation actually do mitigate the political effects of 'rational ignorance.' For example, Bartels (1996) estimated that individual vote choices in a series of US presidential elections fell about half way between random behavior and hypothetical 'fully informed' choices (imputed to each voter by observing the choices of better-informed voters with similar demographic and social characteristics). Deviations from 'fully informed' behavior at the individual level were mitigated but not eliminated at the aggregate level: on average, Democrats did almost two percentage points better and incumbent Presidents did almost five percentage points better than they would have if all voters were, in fact, 'fully informed.'

Normative concerns about the quality of public opinion have also led to the development by James Fishkin and others of 'deliberative opinion polls' designed to combine the efficiency and representativeness of conventional opinion surveys with the informative and deliberative aspects of a seminar or town meeting. Rather than simply reporting their existing opinions, respondents are brought together with policy experts, public officials, moderators, and each other to consider political issues in depth. The aim is to find out—and then to publicize—'what the public would think, if it had a more adequate chance to think about the questions at issue' (Fishkin 1991, p. 1).

4. Political Consequences of Public Opinion

Political scientists have been more successful in characterizing and accounting for public opinion than in specifying its role in the broader political process. The path-breaking study by Miller and Stokes (1963) of representation in the US Congress provided a model for much subsequent research examining the relationship between public opinion and elite attitudes and behavior. However, the basic research design employed in these studies—cross-sectional analysis of the impact of constituents' opinions on the opinions or behavior of individual legislators—is arguably ill-suited to answering questions about the political impact of public opinion in the aggregate, especially in legislative systems marked by strong party discipline or proportional representation, or when crucial policy decisions are made by executives or bureaucrats rather than by legislatures.

An alternative research design focuses on co-variation between aggregate public opinion and policy outcomes across political units or in a single political unit over time. The analysis of 'dynamic representation' by Stimson et al. (1995) is an ambitious example of this approach, relating variations in the liberalism of America's 'public mood' over a 35-year period to subsequent variations in the behavior of Presidents, Congresses, and courts. A more specialized literature treats fluctuations in presidential popularity not only as a product of political, economic, and international events (as in the pioneering work of Mueller (1973)), but also as a factor in accounting for the varying ability of Presidents to get things done (see Presidential Popularity).

Efforts to specify the broad political causes and consequences of public opinion will no doubt be facilitated by the continuing accumulation of survey data over time and space. For example, the cumulative data file of the American National Election Studies project now includes more than 40,000 individual survey respondents in more than two dozen national elections spanning half a century, while the Eurobarometer series includes biannual surveys since 1973 in each of the member states of the European Union. By merging these enormous survey data sets with aggregate-level data reflecting variations in national economic conditions, electoral laws, party platforms and campaign appeals, policy initiatives, media coverage of public affairs, and many other contextual factors, analysts should be able to illuminate important connections between mass opinion and elite behavior, as well as the role of social and political institutions in shaping those connections.

On the other hand, the availability of richly detailed survey data has probably distracted scholarly attention from crucial aspects of public opinion that are not readily operationalized in surveys. For example, Converse's (1964, pp. 245–6) 'issue publics'—the various minorities of the public whose 'activated' opinions on particular issues of interest are 'expressed in the writing of letters to the editor, the changing of votes, and the like'—have seldom been subjected to detailed scrutiny. Even more notably, the elusiveness of what Key (1961) referred to as 'latent opinion'—the preferences and beliefs politicians expect to confront in future elections, after today's policies have had their effects and tomorrow's political opponents have had their say—has discouraged political scientists from giving it attention commensurate with its undoubted political significance. In these cases, among others, scholars will have to be more ingenious and eclectic in collecting and analyzing relevant data if they are to place the study of public opinion more squarely in the mainstream of political science.

See also: Attitude Measurement; Attitudes and Behavior; Issue Constraint in Political Science; Issue Evolution in Political Science; Party Identification; Political Advertising; Political Communication; Polling

Bibliography

- Bartels L M 1996 Uninformed votes: Information effects in presidential elections. American Journal of Political Science 40: 194–230
- Berelson B R, Lazarsfeld P F, McPhee W N 1954 Voting: A Study of Opinion Formation in a Presidential Campaign. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
- Bryce J 1888 The American Commonwealth. Macmillan, New York

- Campbell A, Converse P E, Miller W E, Stokes D E 1960 The American Voter. Wiley, New York
- Converse P E 1964 The nature of belief systems in mass publics. In: Apter D E (ed.) Ideology and Discontent. Free Press of Glencoe, Glencoe, IL
- Fishkin J S 1991 Democracy and Deliberation: New Directions for Democratic Reform. Yale University Press, New Haven, CT
- Key V O 1961 Public Opinion and American Democracy. Knopf, New York, 1st edn.
- Kinder D R 1998 Opinion and action in the realm of politics. In: Gilbert D, Fiske S, Lindsey G (eds.) Handbook of Social Psychology, 4th edn. McGraw-Hill, Boston
- Lippmann W 1922 Public Opinion. Macmillan, New York
- Miller W E, Stokes D E 1963 Constituency influence in Congress. American Political Science Review 57: 45–56
- Mueller J E 1973 War, Presidents and Public Opinion. Wiley, New York
- Nie N H, Verba S, Petrocik J 1976 The New American Voter. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Page B I, Shapiro R Y 1992 The Rational Public: Fifty Years of Trends in Americans' Policy Preferences. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
- Popkin S L 1991 The Reasoning Voter: Communication and Persuasion in Presidential Campaigns. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
- Sniderman P M, Brody R A, Tetlock P E 1991 Reasoning and Choice: Explorations in Political Psychology. Cambridge University Press, New York
- Stimson J A, MacKuen M B, Erikson R S 1995 Dynamic representation. American Political Science Review 89: 543–65
- Zaller J R 1992 The Nature and Origins of Mass Opinion. Cambridge University Press, New York

L. M. Bartels

Public Policy Schools

1. What is Policy Analysis?

Before describing public policy schools, it is first necessary to describe the field of policy analysis. Although neither academics nor practitioners of policy analysis have been able to agree on a common formal definition, almost all would agree that policy analysis involves the use of formal reasoning to formulate advice for the solution of problems faced by governmental and nonprofit sectors. Of course, political leaders, decision-makers, managers, and administrators have relied on advisors over recorded time. Scholars and practitioners in many fields, particularly in the professions such as law, medicine, public health, social welfare, and urban planning, claim to incorporate policy analysis as part of their task. How then do public policy schools and their graduates differentiate themselves from the mass of advisors? They do so by using formal analytic techniques to make informed guesses about the outcomes of alternative choices, as they would be implemented on the ground in the real world.

The modern policy analysis movement had its genesis in the United States and has spread very slowly, if at all, to other countries. For that reason, the history of public policy as it evolved into an academic curriculum is a history of the application of policy analysis in the United States.

The staffing effort of the Second World War and the subsequent Cold War with the Soviet Union brought the policy analysis movement into existence. Although many historians of the policy analysis movement point to Daniel Lerner and Harold Lasswell's call for a policy sciences field that would apply reasoned advice to all stages of the policy process (deLeon and Steelman 1999, Lerner and Lasswell 1951), in practice the field developed with the application of what might be called the optimization sciences—particularly micro-economic analysis and the techniques of operations research—to policy choices. These techniques were first used in this way during the Second World War when the need for war mobilization led to a planned economy significantly replacing the market economy. After the war the new techniques found a home at a newly formed home for defense analysis (the RAND Corporation). Ultimately these techniques, and many defense analysts, found a home in offices or ministers of defense and then diffused throughout government. The analytic offices that were set up became an established source of policy advice using the techniques of benefit-cost analysis, cost-effectiveness analysis, operations research, and policy evaluation. These techniques became the heart of the new policy analysis curriculum.

Since the 1970s in the United States, public policy schools have become major centers for graduate education for service in the public and nonprofit sectors in the United States. At many prestigious US universities they have replaced schools and programs of public administration. Their number has grown from under 10 in 1970 to over 60 in 2000. Many existing public administration programs, moreover, have incorporated parts of the public policy curricula, and in some cases have adopted public policy concentrations.

The growth in public policy schools and programs has been associated with the creation of an academic field complete with an association—the Association for Public Policy Analysis and Management (APPAM)—and a journal—the Journal of Policy Analysis and Management (JPAM). Of equal if not greater importance has been the spread of the intellectual approach of policy analysis as graduates of policy schools have replaced traditional public administrators in high-level staff positions at the US federal, state, and local governments.

As graduates of policy programs have replaced students of accounting and public administration in various governmental staff agencies—particularly budget offices—the policy analysis movement and approach have been institutionalized within the governmental service. This institutionalization was reinforced by the slow economic growth and resulting budgetary constraints of the 1970s and 1980s which forced decision-makers to continually face tighter constraints and tradeoffs. New institutions, such as the Congressional Budget Office of the US Congress, were largely staffed by those with policy analysis training obtained either in schools of public policy or Ph.D. programs in economics.

These new staff organizations reflected the norms and values of their dominant staff professions—the graduates of economics departments and policy analysis schools and programs. Chief among these was a belief that, all things being equal, markets are the best way to allocate society's goods and services. That a decision to use other allocation mechanisms was justified only on grounds of equity or rights (the distribution of benefits and costs and/or the existence of some activities that society believed should not be freely exchanged), or when one could show that markets had failed and that governmental intervention would (not could) lead to a more economically efficient allocation than was the case under the failed market. This reliance on markets separated the new policy analysis movement from the traditional planning approach and built within the policy analysis framework a conservative bias when it came to justification of public sector activity.

The centrality of the norms of economics to the new policy analysis movement led to a belief that analysis of policy requires the laying out of the tradeoffs inevitable in the creation and implementation of policy. These tradeoffs are reflected in the centrality of two ideas of economics—opportunity costs and the margin. The policy analyst relies on opportunity cost to inform the decision-maker that no option is free, that one can always use the resources for other activities. The concept of the margin allows the economist or policy analyst to tell the decision-maker what she/he can obtain from adding or subtracting one unit of resources. The use of these concepts separates the economist and policy analyst from the political analyst, who often seeks to suppress tradeoffs so as to increase the membership of political coalitions.

A third effect was a conscious attempt to present decision makers with analyses of policy options that make choices concrete by clearly defining problems, setting out possible solutions, and specifying the criteria to be used to judge those solutions so that those decision-makers can evaluate the solutions in a comparative, predictable manner. Although students of policy analysis often wrote about qualitative as well as quantitative indicators, in practice practitioners of the new field found that their comparative advantage vs. other advisors was in the use and presentation of quantitative measures—particularly those in a benefit/cost format.

The reliance on analytic techniques and on policy options separated economists and policy analysts from traditional American public administrators. Since the progressive era and the early academic writings of Woodrow Wilson on public administration (Wilson 1887), students of public administration had operated under the belief that it was possible to separate the creation of policy from its efficient administration. Although by the 1960s most public administrators knew that this dichotomy between politics and policy on the one hand and administration on the other was a myth, much, if not most, of the public administration approach still centered on the efficient running of bureaus and departments. Consequently, to a great extent, the educational core of masters in public administration programs reflected this approach with required courses on the functional skills needed by a line manager—budgeting, organizational behavior, personnel management, and the role of an unelected civil servant in representative government.

2. What Are Public Policy Schools and How Do They Differ From Other Programs?

The first public policy schools and programs were created in the US in the late 1960s. With considerable philanthropic support, 1971 had founded nine schools or programs in the United States. In a pattern that has continued to this day, several existing programs quickly adopted the new approach and curricula of the policy school movement.

The advocates and sponsors of these new schools and programs sought to apply the new optimizing techniques of policy analysis to the problems facing nations in the late 1960s—particularly the problems facing urban areas. At this time it was still widely believed that government could solve social problems if the right policies were found, created, adopted, and implemented. Thus, the initial educational effort sought to support positive public sector activity to solve problems, a view that has much less support today. The creators of the new programs also sought to do for education towards public service what the changes in business administration education had done for business administration in the mid-1950s—replace a curriculum centered on institutional description and anecdotes with one grounded on analytics.

2.1 Similarities Across the Schools

Although one can point to many differences among the original nine policy schools and programs—one had a heavy emphasis on undergraduate education, a second only offered a Ph.D.—viewed from afar their similarities far outweighed their differences. With the exception of the one that only offered a Ph.D., all focused their graduate education efforts on a Masters degree that was viewed as a terminal professional degree rather than a step toward a doctorate. In most cases they labeled this primary degree the masters in public policy (MPP).

2.2 Concentration on Analytics and Professionalism

The basic analytic public policy core set of courses has remained quite similar since the founding of the nine original schools. It centers on a combination of three yearlong sequences of analytic skill offerings—in economics, quantitative methods, and political and organizational analysis—one or more workshops in which students undertake policy analyses for real, as against hypothetical, clients, and a required summer internship. Some programs also required courses in individual and/or policy ethics. Others required courses in legal analysis. Initially the economics sequence centered on microeconomics, although several of the programs required a microeconomics–macroeconomics sequence. Although centered on courses on descriptive and inferential statistics, many of the initial required curricula also included material drawn from decision analysis, game theory, and operations research.

The political and organizational analysis sequences were included so that students trained in technical skills would also graduate from the programs with the political and managerial skills needed to enact, implement, and administer policies. Of all the required sequences in the policy analysis curriculum, political and organizational analysis has remained the most problematical. From their inception public policy programs rejected the public administration separation of politics from administration. Instead it was assumed that to be an effective analyst one had to be an effective political actor and manager. But unlike economics with its instrumental approach, the academic discipline of political science was largely descriptive and as such was less useful for a professional curriculum. This posed and still poses a great challenge to the public policy faculty charged with the political and managerial core of the policy curriculum. Attempts have been made at a number of institutions to take the findings of political science and public administration research and, through the use of decision forcing case studies, to build a prescriptive and strategic approach to management. Students were challenged to go from answering the descriptive question, ‘What are the political forces or organizational tendencies which affect the kind of policy we can formulate?’ to the more instrumental question, ‘What do I, as analyst or manager, need to do, as I shape my policy prescriptions or implement the chosen policy, to ensure that the political forces and organizational tendencies do not succeed in frustrating or changing desirable policy in undesirable ways?’ (Fleishman 1990, pp. 743–4).

Many observers have felt that this attempt has been only partially successful, however. To overcome this deficiency some scholars have focused on identifying examples of ‘best practice’ that might form the basis of improved political and organizational behavior (Bardach 1994, 2000). Others, criticizing the lack of scientific rigor in this approach, have urged their colleagues to create a body of knowledge in which statements of appropriate political and organizational actions are subject to formal hypothesis testing (Lynn 1994).

The professional nature of public policy programs is reflected in the fact that, unlike the traditional pattern in which professional masters students simply take graduate courses offered by the economics and political science departments, the required policy analysis courses were and are especially designed for a professional program. The goal in most cases is to recast traditional material in a policy centered, problem solving framework and to present the material in an instrumental rather than descriptive manner. As indicated, political science approaches are largely descriptive, and the new programs, therefore, had to take this material and turn it on its head by presenting it in a fashion that would allow future practitioners to use it as a lever to achieve policy and managerial goals—what might be called political and managerial engineering.

One constant across nearly all the original courses was the focus on domestic policy. Over time international material slowly entered the curricula, but this occurred largely through applications of the analytic skills of the curricula (such as benefit/cost analysis) to international situations, such as whether a water project should be built in another country. In recent years several policy schools have moved into the area of economic development, but almost all have avoided the traditional subjects of international relations and country analysis.

2.3 Differences Between Public Policy and Public Administration Programs

The new public policy programs sought to replace the existing public administration educational model of public administration. In addition to their focus on analytic skills, the new programs differed from their public administration counterparts in their large required set of core courses, the absence of required concentrations, and the greater number of economists and statisticians on the faculty.

Existing public administration programs had a small set of core required programs (four to five courses) and lasted a year to a year and a half. The new public policy programs were two-year programs with a large number of required core courses (at least a full year's worth at a minimum and in some cases up to two-thirds of a standard two-year course load). In most cases students were required to take these courses in a set sequence. The average public administration program (MPA) offered many specialties or concentrations (with a mean of five in 1984). (Ellwood 1984). Initially at least, public policy masters (MPP) programs almost totally focused on the analytic techniques taught in their large cores. In 1971, in the United States, the average MPA program faculty member's doctorate was either in political science or public administration (21 and 20 percent in 1971). Economists represented only 9 percent. In the new public policy schools and programs economists represented a plurality (31 percent in 1971) and in some cases a majority of the faculty with political scientists being the second most represented discipline (23 percent) (Ellwood 1984).

3. Changes and Challenges to Public Policy Schools

Masters programs in public policy currently dominate graduate education for public and nonprofit service in the United States. Graduates from the programs are now found in key decision-making positions throughout government and the nonprofit sector. However, recent developments provide a challenge to the future of the approach and the field.

3.1 The Decline in the Belief that the Public Sector Can Solve Problems

The public policy school initiative was fostered by the belief that better public policies could lead to the solution of public problems—particularly those of the poor and of urban areas. Over the past three decades this belief has attenuated if not disappeared in the United States and elsewhere. To paraphrase Ronald Reagan, in the United States government is now seen as the problem, not the solution. Public service itself has become less attractive. The private sector increasingly has come to be seen as the creator and locus of heroes. Private sector remuneration has grown at a far faster pace than public or nonprofit sector pay.

The effect of all these changes has been to draw graduates of public policy programs away from careers in the public and nonprofit sectors toward jobs in the private sector. One recent study found that between 1973 and 1993, in the United States, the percentage of MPP graduates taking jobs in the public sector declined from 76 to 49 percent (Light 1999). At the largest US MPP program this percentage dropped to 28 percent for one year in the late 1990s before rebounding to the mid-40 percent range. This trend poses this question, will policy programs continue to attract the 'best and the brightest' as they have over the past three decades?

3.2 The Difficulty of Management and Leadership Education

As indicated above, from the beginning of the policy school movement it was understood that high technical skill was but a necessary condition for an effective policy analyst. The sufficient condition was the acquisition of political, leadership, and managerial skills. The inclusion of a required sequence of political analysis and management in most programs was meant to impart these skills. But this effort has always been the most problematic endeavor of public policy education. Academics simply know less and have a more difficult time imparting what they know to practitioners in these areas than they do when it comes to technical skills. Moreover, from the beginning, management skills were grafted on to a curriculum focusing on the skills needed by staff analysts. In contrast to masters of business administration (MBA) programs in business schools, where the entire curriculum (or at least the first year of required courses) was seen as management education, policy schools sought to condense courses in accounting, finance, marketing, and operations into one or two required offerings. The result has never been totally satisfying.

3.3 The Tradeoff Between Breadth and Depth

The original public policy curricula focused on imparting the skills that would be needed by policy analysts who, acting as advisors to decision-makers, would create policies that would hopefully solve society's problems. Over time policy schools have moved away from this narrow focus on the training of staff to a broader focus of training future managers and leaders. Moreover, the initial narrow focus on domestic policy has also broadened. Today the policy schools seek to serve the needs of students with a wide set of career goals. Some want to become elective officials, some political activists, some social activists, some career civil servants, some managers of nonprofit organizations, and some private sector consultants. The percentage seeking careers in technical policy staff positions has become smaller and smaller. As the programs have tried to meet the needs of this increasingly diverse set of students, they have to some extent lost the coherence and depth of the required set of skills that made up the core of their curricula.

As they have tried to serve future elected officials, political activists, public and nonprofit managers, as well as policy analysts, some policy schools have dropped such topics as decision analysis and operations research from their core set of requirements. Others have moved to the creation of tracks or concentrations, with some providing more quantitative, analytic rigor. Some have approved these changes as responding to the needs of a new set of students while others fear that public policy by trying to be relevant to all will lose its distinctive purpose.

3.4 The Intellectual Challenge

Professional education always faces the challenge that it is simply an applied or less rigorous version of the material offered by the traditional academic professions. Frequently this charge is misplaced. The need to apply theory to actual situations often leads to new breakthroughs—sometimes theoretical breakthroughs. Such was the case with the creation of the modern theory of finance in business schools.

It was hoped that implementation theory or principal-agent theory would be the public policy equivalents of the business schools' finance theory. But this has not occurred. Implementation theory has never got beyond its inductive beginnings and principle-agent theory is limited when applied to the multiple-goal, multiple-agent world of the public sector (Moe 1984). This has meant that public policy education has remained derivative and applied. For the long-term health of the public policy movement within the academy, overcoming this weakness is perhaps the greatest challenge to the field.

See also: Policy Knowledge: Advocacy Organizations; Policy Knowledge: Epistemic Communities; Policy Knowledge: Nonprofit Institutions; Policy Knowledge: Universities

Bibliography

- Bardach E 1994 Comment: the problem of best practice research. Journal of Policy Analysis and Management 13(2): 260–8
- Bardach E 2000 A Practical Guide for Policy Analysis: the Eightfold Path to More Effective Problem Solving, Part III, Chatham House Publishers, New York
- deLeon P, Steelman T A 1999 The once and future public policy program. Policy Currents: Newsletter of the Public Policy Section of the American Political Science Association 9(2): 1–9
- Ellwood J W 1984 A Morphology of Graduate Education for Public Service in the United States. Report for the Study of Trends and Innovations in Graduate Education for Public Service. National Association of Schools of Public Affairs and Administration
- Fleishman J L 1990 A new framework for integration: policy analysis and public management. American Behavioral Scientist 33(6): 733–54
- Lerner D, Lasswell H D 1951 The Policy Sciences. Stanford University Press, Palo Alto, CA

Light P C 1999 The New Public Service. The Brookings Institution Press, Washington, DC

Lynn L E 1994 Public management research: the triumph of art over science. Journal of Policy Analysis and Management 13(2): 231–59

Moe T M 1984 The new economics of organization. American Journal of Political Science 28(4): 739–77

Wilson W 1887 The study of administration. Political Science Quarterly 2: 197–222

J. W. Ellwood and E. Smolensky

Public Psychiatry and Public Mental Health Systems

Public psychiatry in the US encompasses several different elements: buildings, such as state mental hospitals; programs, such as community mental health centers; and insurance mechanisms, such as Medicaid and Medicare, that enable poor or elderly recipients (respectively) to receive care in private facilities. Public mental health systems are found at all levels of government: the federal government runs one of the largest health care systems in the world, the Veterans' Administration Medical System, all individual states run state psychiatric hospitals and systems, and local governments (e.g., cities and counties) run hospitals and clinics. In this article, both public psychiatry and public mental health systems will be discussed simultaneously, starting with their historical context and moving on to a more detailed examination of their elements.

1. The History of Public Psychiatry and Public Psychiatric Systems

For many years after the US was colonized, there were no services for the mentally ill. In time, local communities built jails, workhouses, and almshouses or poorhouses, intended for 'rogues and vagabonds,' the 'idle and disorderly,' and the needy, respectively, to which mentally ill persons were sent if violent, disruptive, or simply wandering. While the first facility for the mentally ill, the 'Publick Hospital' in Williamsburg, Virginia, opened in 1752, it was not until the 1840s that Dorothea Dix, a pioneering advocate for the mentally ill, sought higher governmental responsibility for this population, and as a consequence, state mental hospitals and systems flourished (Talbot 1978). The federal government entered the scene in the eighteenth century with the creation first of Public Health Service Hospitals for the Merchant Marine,

Figure 1
Structure and funding of governmental services then Veterans Hospitals and finally, in 1963, Community Mental Health Centers. In some ways, the federal government's commitment to returning the treatment and care of the mentally ill back to their communities represented a coming full-circle from the jails, workhouses, and almshouses or poorhouses of colonial days, but now this responsibility was coupled with the technology, programs, and staffing necessary to provide effective care nearer to home, family, and work. Thus, by the turn of the twentieth century there was a rich variety but often confusing multiplicity of mental health services sponsored by different governmental levels and agencies extant in this country (Fig. 1).

2. City and County Care

As mentioned above, the very first public institutions in which the mentally ill were cared, were county or city jails, workhouses, and almshouses or poorhouses. While these 'houses' existed for a number of decades (Rothman 1971), in the 1880s the mentally ill began to be cared for and treated in separate psychiatric hospitals, established by individual states. However, to this day, some cities (e.g., New York, New Orleans, San Francisco) and some counties (e.g., Cook (Chicago), Milwaukee, San Diego) have city and county general and/or psychiatric facilities. In addition, as also was mentioned above, the federal legislation in the 1960s creating community mental health centers plus the devolution of the state's single authority to counties in the 1980s (Hogan 1999) have ensured a prominent role for local entities in taking public responsibility for the mentally ill at the close of the twentieth century. In terms of numbers, at their height in 1955, city and county mental health facilities cared for only 100,000 persons, compared to the 460,000 persons residing in state hospitals. Today there are fewer than a dozen city or county facilities remaining, caring for 10,000 patients. Recently, the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation initiated a project in nine cities to 'devolve' mental health services from state to city 'quasi-public authorities' (Goldman et al. 1990). Because of these and other initiatives to move from (state) institutional to (local) community care, the majority of moneys allocated by each state now goes to community-directed mental health care (Fig. 2).

Figure 2
State Mental Health Agency controlled expenditures for state mental hospital inpatient (◆) and community-based (■) services: 1981–1996

3. State Mental Health Services

As mentioned above, the first facility for the mentally ill, the 'Publick Hospital' in Williamsburg, Virginia, opened in 1752. Called 'public(k),' the hospital was actually private and it was not until the 1820s and 1830s that state governmentally supported and run psychiatric hospitals came into being. While Massachusetts and New York pioneered in opening new facilities to accommodate for the need for treatment and care of the mentally ill, other states lagged behind until the 1840s when Dorothea Dix, a Sunday-school teacher, sought first federal and then state initiatives to care for all the mentally ill in America. From this point to 1955, state mental hospital systems grew; first slowly, and then with the waves of new immigrants, more quickly (Talbot 1978). By 1955, about 460,000 Americans were housed in such facilities (Fig. 3).

The role of the state mental hospital throughout its first century was comprehensive and inclusive; it provided almost everyone almost all the care and treatment then imaginable and available, including housing, food, clothing, supervision, social services, medical, psychiatric and dental services, and leisure time activities. If the number of admissions grew, new hospitals were built. Alternatives to state hospitals began to appear in the US starting in 1855 beginning with the Farm of Sainte Anne's in Illinois, and eventually encompassed cottages on the grounds, 'boarding out,' 'aftercare,' or outpatient clinics, traveling clinics, crisis intervention, satellite clinics, day, night, and weekend hospitals, social and vocational rehabilitation, home care, and halfway houses. However, the creation of all these 'alternatives' did not reverse or halt the increasing population treated in state facilities—until 1955. In that year, deinstitutionalization of these large facilities began as the result of a combination of technological (a new, the first, antipsychotic medication) and philosophical (that care in the 'community,' nearer family, work, and friends, was better than that in 'asylums') initiatives, soon to be joined by legal (the rights to treatment, to refuse treatment, and to be treated in less restrictive settings) and economic (medical insurance via Medicaid and Medicare for treatment in the community and income support via Supplemental Security Income for housing in the community) forces. In the next 30 years, the population in state hospitals fell 80 percent. Thus, at present, there are fewer than 90,000 residents in state facilities. It must be noted, however, that state governments were not only responsible for state mental hospitals (Fig. 1), but for 'aftercare' and outpatient clinics, as well as facilities and clinics for children and persons suffering from alcohol and drug abuse and mental retardation/developmental disorders, and these services have continued to this day.

4. Federal Mental Health Services

4.1 Veterans' Hospitals

While pensions, cash payments, and land grants were awarded to veterans of the Revolutionary War by grateful states and the federal government, it was not until the American Civil War (1861–1865) that national veterans' homes were established (Godleski et al. 1999) and not until after World War I, in the 1920s, that health benefits were offered to all veterans.

Figure 3
State hospital population

By 1930, 4.7 million veterans were being served by 54 hospitals and in 1995 the 'Veterans Administration' system of care included 172 medical centers, 375 outpatient clinics, 133 nursing homes, 39 'domiciliary' care facilities, and 202 'Vet Centers' (largely urban drop-in centers).

4.2 Military Psychiatric Services

Physicians have always accompanied American forces during war. The recognition of the role of stress in combat was first documented in America during the Civil War when 'combat heart' was often diagnosed. In World War I, psychiatrist Thomas Salmon visited the battle lines in France before America's entry and it was his observation of the difference in the practices and outcomes of the French (treatment near the lines, expectation of recovery; with low resultant disability) and English (evacuation; with high disability) in treating 'shell-shock' victims that predicated the American military's practice henceforth. In World War II and in Korea, these lessons had to be re-learned but by Vietnam, American psychiatrists were inducted into the Armed Forces in significant numbers and assigned to both (a) hospitals in combat and evacuation areas and (b) line troop divisions, where they practiced 'preventive psychiatry' (Talbot 1966). Currently, to serve a 'peacetime military' of almost 1 million men and women, there are approximately 300 psychiatrists on active duty.

4.3 Public Health Service Hospitals

In 1798, Congress established the US Marine Hospital Service—the predecessor of today's US Public Health Service—to provide health care to sick and injured merchant seamen (History of the Office of the Surgeon General 1999). Eventually, 25 hospitals were established across the country (Mullen 1989). In 1981 these hospitals began being phased out and at present the Surgeon General's Office and the Public Health Service, while active in articulating policy (on smoking, the treatment of schizophrenia, etc.) and employing 6,000 persons who serve as a 'uniformed cadre of health professionals on call 24 hours a day, 7 days a week in the event of a public health emergency,' does not run nonresearch related clinical services.

4.4 The National Institutes, Administrations, and Centers

The first element in the federal array of research laboratories and agencies to be established was the Laboratory of Hygiene in 1887; the first psychiatric component was the Division of Mental Hygiene of the US Public Health Service in the 1930s. The National Cancer Institute was the first of the now 25 national institutes now comprising the National Institutes of Health (NIH) to be established for research; the National Institute of Mental Health (NIMH) coming into being in 1946. The research mission was broadened in the 1950s and 1960s to include teaching and services (e.g., community mental health centers) as well as alcohol and substance abuse treatment and prevention. Soon there were Institutes on Drug Abuse (NIDA) and Alcohol Abuse (NIAA) and in 1968 the Health Services and Mental Health Administration was established as an umbrella organization to house all of them. In 1973, NIMH rejoined the NIH and later came under a new 'umbrella,' the Alcohol, Drug Abuse and Mental Health Administration (ADAMHA). Finally, in 1992, prevention, services, and services research were separated off into a new agency—the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration (SAMSHA), while the NIMH, NIDA, and NIAA remained in the NIH as 'research institutes.'

4.5 The Community Mental Health Center

As mentioned above, since colonial days, localities had always provided some services. But, in 1963, the shift from localities to states to federal auspices came full circle, and it was the federal government that legislated the establishment of what was intended originally by President John F. Kennedy's administration to be about 750 community mental health centers (CMHCs), each of which was to serve 75,000–150,000 persons through the provision of 10 essential services (inpatient, outpatient, partial hospital, emergency, consultation and education, diagnostic, rehabilitative, precare and aftercare, training and research, and evaluation) (Glasscote et al. 1969). While the 1963 legislation had to be amended in 1975 to include care for children and the elderly and those suffering from alcohol and drug abuse as well as transitional housing, follow-up care, and screening for courts and agencies prior to hospitalization, the model of the CMHC was a powerful one in the US for most of the last half of the twentieth century. At present, while the US cannot claim to have either comprehensive or universally available, federally initiated community mental health centers, there are 675 in the nation (Ray and Finley 1994).

4.6 Federal Entitlements for Community Care

The blind and needy aged have been provided federal 'Social Security' to enable them to make ends meet since 1935, and in 1950 persons suffering from other disabilities, including mental disorders, were included under two additional programs: Supplemental Security Income (SSI) and Social Security Disability Income (SSDI). In 1966, two other large 'public' populations, the poor and the aged and disabled were guaranteed medical insurance through two federal entitlement programs, Medicaid and Medicare, respectively. What no one had realized at the time was the fact that with these four massive federal entitlement programs, the mentally ill could 'afford' to live and receive treatment from 'private' clinics and general hospitals rather than 'public' state hospitals. This further added to the technological, philosophical, and legal forces moving psychiatric care and treatment in America from institutional to community care; albeit publicly financed. In 1997, 13.4 percent (37,514 million) of the population was covered by Medicare and 13 percent (35,028 million) by Medicaid; by 1994, 16.5 percent (42,878 million) of the population was covered by Social Security, 10 percent (26,281 million) by SSI, and 1.5 percent (5,893 million) by SSDI (US Bureau of the Census 1998).

4.7 Community Support and Case Management

Starting in 1977–1978, the NIMH provided grants to community agencies to initiate community support programs. Such a system was to include: identification of the population, assistance in applying for entitlements, crisis-stabilization, psychosocial rehabilitation, supportive services, medical and mental health care, back-up support to families, involvement of concerned community members, protection of client rights, and case-management (Shaftstein et al. 1978). Like the CMHC, this model was compelling and moved community services to adopt such strategies and services even in the absence of federal moneys. Most widely undertaken have been case management programs for high-intensity and average utilizers. It is impossible to estimate how many community support and case management systems there are in America today, but it is in the tens of thousands.

4.8 The Indian Health Service

Members of Federally recognized Indian tribes and their descendants have been eligible for services provided by the Indian Health Service (IHS) since 1787. The IHS, part of the US Public Health Service, Department of Health and Human Services, operates a comprehensive health service delivery system for approximately 1.5 million of the nation's two million American Indians and Alaska Natives and in 1999 its annual appropriation was approximately $2.2 billion.

There are more than 550 federally recognized tribes in the US whose members live mainly on reservations and in rural communities in 34 states, mostly in the western US and Alaska. IHS services are provided in three ways; by the IHS directly, through tribally contracted and operated health programs, and by purchasing care from more than 2,000 private providers. As of March 1996, the federal system consisted of 37 hospitals, 64 health centers, 50 health stations, and five school health centers. In addition, 34 urban Indian health projects provide a variety of health and referral services. The IHS clinical staff consists of approximately 840 physicians (approximately 80 of whom are psychiatrists), 100 physician assistants, and 2,580 nurses. As of March 1996, American Indian tribes and Alaska Native Corporations administered 12 hospitals, 116 health centers, three school health centers, 56 health stations, and 167 Alaska village clinics.

5. The Correctional System

The correctional system in America cuts across all governmental levels: federal, state, and local (city/county). It may well house more mentally ill persons than any other 'governmental health system.' There are about 10 million adults booked into US jails each year and more than 1.5 million persons currently incarcerated. The US Bureau of Justice estimates a rate of mental illness in local and state jails of over 16 percent and in federal prisons of over 7 percent; thus over 250,000 mentally ill persons are in prison and jail on any one day (Ditton 1999). It is not known how many psychiatrists are employed in the correctional system nor how many services are rendered.

6. Public Managed Care

In the 1930s the Kaiser Corporation, a large industrial concern, formed the first employer-run group practices in America to reach its employees working in rural areas. These tightly run group practices became known as health maintenance organizations (HMOs) and in the 1970s were promoted by the Nixon Administration. HMOs, along with other forms of tightly managed forms of service provision, have grown and expanded from their original base serving employed persons through industry or 'private' insurance to serving 'public' populations, e.g., the aged, disabled, and poor who are insured by Medicare and Medicaid. The popularity of such 'managed care' as a method of cost-control and provision is apparent from the fact that, in 1992, the percentage of Americans covered by managed-care programs exceeded those covered by 'traditional' (e.g., Blue Cross/Blue Shield) insurance plans. In the 1990s, the federal and state governments have actively sought to enroll their publicly funded populations (e.g., those receiving Medicaid and Medicare) in such programs. Estimates of the percentage of Medicare recipients enrolled in managed care programs are at present over 10 percent nationally; regarding Medicaid, at present every state in the union has begun a 'managed Medicaid program,' has applied for federal government permission to do so, or is actively discussing it.

7. The Future

The future of public psychiatry and public mental health systems is unknown. While some systems (e.g., county and state systems) have endured for almost the entire three centuries of our young country's existence, others (such as public managed care) are growing at a rate that will surely diminish the importance and even existence of these traditional systems. What is known, however, is that until poverty and severe mental illness no longer exist there will be public psychiatrists and public mental health systems.

See also: Mental Health: Community Interventions; Mental Health Programs: Children and Adolescents

Bibliography

- Ditton P M 1999 Mental health and treatment of inmates and probationers. Bureau of Justice Statistics, NCJ 174463
- Glasscote R M, Sussex J N, Cumming E, Smith L H 1969 Community Mental Health Center: An Interim Appraisal. Joint Information Service of the American Psychiatric Association and the National Association for Mental Health, Washington, DC
- Godleski L S, Vadnal R, Tasman A 2001 Psychiatric services in the veterans' health administration. In: Talbott J A, Hales R E (eds.) The Textbook of Administrative Psychiatry: New Concepts for a Changing Behavioral Health System. American Psychiatric Press, Washington, DC
- Goldman H H, Morrissey J P, Ridgely M S 1990 Form and functions of mental health authorities at RWJ Foundation program sites: Preliminary observations. Hospital and Community Psychiatry 41: 1222–30
- History of the Office of the Surgeon General 1999 <http://www.surgeongeneral.gov/osg/sghist.htm>
- Hogan M F 2001 State and county agencies. In: Talbott J A, Hales R E (eds.) The Textbook of Administrative Psychiatry: New Concepts for a Changing Behavioral Health System. American Psychiatric Press, Washington, DC
- Indian Health Service Internet Home Page 1999 <http://www.ihs.gov>
- Mullen F 1989 Plague and Politics: The Story of the United States Public Health Service. Basic Books, New York
- Ray C G, Finley J K 1994 Did CMHCs fail or succeed? Analysis of the expectations and outcomes of the community mental health movement. Administration and Policy in Mental Health 21(4): 283–93

- Rothman D J 1971 The Discovery of the Asylum: Social Order and Disorder in the New Republic, 1st edn. Little, Brown, Boston
- Shaftstein S S, Turner J E, Clark H W 1978 Financing issues in providing services for the chronically mentally ill and disabled. In: Talbot J A (ed.) Ad Hoc Committee on the Chronic Mental Patient. The Chronic Mental Patient: Problems, Solutions, and Recommendations for a Public Policy. American Psychiatric Association, Washington, DC
- Talbott J A 1966 Community psychiatry in the army. Journal of the American Medical Association 210(7): 1233–7
- Talbott J A 1978 The Death of the Asylum: A Critical Study of State Hospital Management, Services, and Care. Grune and Stratton, New York
- US Bureau of the Census 1998 Statistical Abstract of the United States, 18th edn. Washington, DC

J. A. Talbott

Public Reason

'Public reason' implies a contrast to 'nonpublic' or 'personal reason.' Identifying a distinctly public or shared notion of reason is only important—indeed is only intelligible—when the concept of reason is understood in ways which allow that individuals, employing good reasoning, may come to divergent conclusions. This article begins by examining the lines of inquiry that have led many to question whether all fully-informed and fully-competent inquirers would come to the same conclusions about science and morals. According to some philosophers and social scientists, the very concept of reason has broken apart, leaving different individuals and groups with different conceptions of rationality, and so of reasons for belief and action. The article then considers the different ideals of public reason that have been advanced to overcome worries about the 'fragmentation of reason.'

1. The Diversity of Reason

1.1 The Enlightenment

Before considering different conceptions of public reason, it is important to grasp what the very idea of public reason presupposes. According to the conception of reasoning that dominated the European Enlightenment of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, reason is inherently universal, and so shared and public. On this Enlightenment conception, reason is a shared capacity of all human beings, and norms of good reasoning are universal. Any premise p that is true for one person is necessarily true for all others; if the inferential rule ' $(p \cdot (p \rightarrow q)) \rightarrow q$ ' is valid for one person, it is necessarily valid for all. The true and valid results of one person's reasoning are thus necessarily true and valid for all. According to this standard Enlightenment view, the use of common human reason not only produces consensus on scientific beliefs, it also leads to convergence of moral and political opinions. To be sure, people might disagree on matters of science or ethics, but that would be due to mistaken beliefs or irrationality: some have arrived at the wrong answer. The process of Enlightenment was the only remedy for this—the increasingly better use of reason to uncover truths about the natural and the social world. The ideal or model was that of Newtonian physics: just as our common reason had uncovered the laws of matter and motion, so too could it be expected to uncover the laws of human nature, society, morals, and politics. Each field was awaiting its Newton.

1.2 Relativism and Social Science

It is a familiar story how the systematic study of cultures with radically different norms from those of Europe gave rise to cultural relativism. When confronted with the very different mores of the Zuni and Kwakiutl Indians and Dobu Islanders of Papua New Guinea, Ruth Benedict (1934) endorsed a relativistic view—their norms were justified for them, just as Western norms were for Europeans. As anthropologists began to study non-European cultures in more depth, and became increasingly more sophisticated and self-reflective in their techniques, disputes arose about the proper method for anthropologists to interpret the belief systems of other cultures. For example, was a belief in magic or a deity to be understood as simply a false belief on which the 'natives' relied? John Stuart Mill (1974 [1843], pp. 766–7) believed that an investigator could best understand the magical beliefs of other cultures by attributing to them erroneous beliefs and invalid inferential rules. Others, adopting a principle of charity, have insisted that the best interpretation of a culture minimizes the number of false beliefs attributed to its members (Davidson 1973). Thus the best interpretation—which makes sense of the 'native's' metaphysical theories, religious convictions, and their beliefs about nature—might seek to show that a belief in spirits is, after all, rational given their world view. Thus the second step in the relativist attack on the Enlightenment's ideal of reason was to endorse relativism concerning what beliefs are rational in different cultures. The last step in the relativistic project is to apply tolerance to the idea of reason itself. Can Western anthropologists properly interpret other cultures if they apply their Western conception of reason in their interpretation? Is the very idea of reason culturally relative?

Independently, psychological studies of human reasoning led to doubts about whether everyone shares the same norms of reasoning. The work of, among others, Richard Nisbett, Lee Ross, Paul Slovic, and Amos Tversky showed that normal adults often do not employ the norms of reasoning long advocated by philosophers as correct. For example, many normal adults adhere to the 'gambler's fallacy.' According to standard probability theory, the odds of independent events occurring do not depend on whether that type of event has occurred in the past: if the odds of a 'six' being rolled by a fair dice is one-in-six, this probability in no way depends on whether no sixes have been rolled or all sixes have been rolled in the past. Yet many normal reasoners believe that, after a long run of sixes, the odds of another six are less than one-in-six, or if none recently have been rolled, many are convinced that a six is 'due.' Based on a variety of studies of such ordinary reasoners, some philosophers advocate 'normative cognitive pluralism.' According to Stephen Stich, 'Normative cognitive pluralism is not a claim about the cognitive processes people do use; rather it is a claim about good processes—the cognitive processes that people ought to use. What it asserts is that there is no unique system of cognitive processes that people should use, because various systems of cognitive processes that are very different from each other are equally good' (1990, p. 13).

1.3 Pluralism and Indeterminacy

Social science thus provided one source of the 'fragmentation of reason.' Of course there was, and still is, lively debate within social scientific and philosophical circles about whether any such relativistic view of reasoning is justified, and if so to what extent individuals employ different, but equally good, norms of reasoning. Nevertheless, some form of cognitive relativism is widely accepted. Concurrently, developments in the philosophy of science were challenging the idea of common, human, reasoning in the very citadel of the Enlightenment—science itself. Whatever doubts may be entertained about the application of Western reason to other cultures, or departures from expert norms by ordinary reasoners, surely science is still the model of rational discourse tending to convergence of opinion leading to the truth. To many, Thomas Kuhn's analysis of scientific practice demonstrated that, rather than a shared project of pursuit of the truth, judged by rules of reason held by all, scientific inquiry takes place within 'paradigms' that determine not only what constitutes research problems but what constitutes success in a research program. Within a group of scholars sharing a paradigm the Enlightenment's ideal of common norms of reason and consensus on the truth will be approximated; and insofar as 'normal science' is dominated by a single paradigm in each field, there often is a common mode of reasoning. But in times of scientific crisis, when paradigms compete, some have insisted that there is no rational, impartial way to adjudicate among the competing theories.

The crux of Kuhn's analysis is that because data underdetermines theories, scientists draw on values in adjudicating among theories. 'To a greater extent than other sorts of components of the disciplinary matrix,' writes Kuhn, 'values may be shared by men who differ in their application. Judgments of accuracy are relatively, though not entirely, stable from one time to another and from one member to another in a particular group. But judgments of simplicity, consistency, plausibility, and so on often vary greatly from individual to individual ... Even more important, in those situations where values must be applied, different values, taken alone, would often dictate different choices. One theory may be more accurate but less consistent or plausible than another' (Kuhn 1970, p. 185). The crucial claim is that there is no uniquely rational way to order these various desiderata—simplicity, consistency, plausibility—and different orderings endorse different scientific theories upholding competing truth claims. Equally well-informed scientists employing their reasoning in perfectly legitimate ways can arrive at different judgments about what is true. Fred D'Agostino has generalized the analysis. In any field of inquiry, when there exists both a plurality of criteria and no impartial way to order the criteria, the criteria are apt to be indeterminate in their application. Different orderings produce different outcomes—reasons for belief. According to D'Agostino, the criteria only yield a determinate result when an ordering is provided, but impartial reason cannot give us that. Much of post-modernism is based on this key idea. Reason is inherently perspectival because of the inherent plurality of relevant considerations for which there is no rational, impartial ranking.

1.4 Reasonable Pluralism

Kuhn's analysis of scientific practice and D'Agostino's generalization rely on the idea of indeterminacy: reason undetermines choice between various theories and perspectives. A more modest view maintains that our powers of reasoning are inconclusive on many complex matters of science, morality, and politics. Claim C is characterized by reasonable pluralism if some perfectly reasonable agents do, while others do not, have good reasons for accepting C. For a controversy to be characterized by reasonable pluralism it is not simply the case that people actually disagree about the merits of C, but that it is reasonable for one person to assert C and another not-C. This is a far less radical claim than was examined in the last section: it is not argued that the question 'C or not-C?' is inherently indeterminate but only that present beliefs about C are inconclusively justified. According to John

Rawls, our disputes about value seem subject to reasonable disagreement because our understanding of what is good and valuable is especially subject to what he has called the 'burdens of judgment.' According to Rawls, reasonable judgments so often are at odds because:

- (a) the evidence is often conflicting and difficult to evaluate;
- (b) (as in Kuhn's example) even when we agree on the relevant considerations, we often weigh them differently;
- (c) because our concepts are vague, we must rely on interpretations that are often controversial;
- (d) the manner in which we evaluate evidence and rank considerations seems to some extent the function of our total life experiences, which of course differ;
- (e) because different sides of an issue rely on different types of normative considerations, it is often hard to assess their relative merits;
- (f) in conflicts between values, there often seems to be no uniquely correct answer (Rawls 1993, p. 57).

Because these matters are so complex and uncertain, different people will reach different, competing, credible, or reasonable conclusions. In the face of complexity, our powers of reasoning do not produce convergence.

2. Conceptions of Public Reason

2.1 Public Rationality and Public Reasons

Important movements in social science, the philosophy of science, and moral and political philosophy thus have combined to cast grave doubt on the Enlightenment's confidence that the free exercise of human reason leads us to agree. In the face of these challenges to the ideal of common human reason, theories of distinctly public reason have been advanced to show how people can share reasons (Korsgaard 1996, Chap. 10). However, this idea is ambiguous. It may constitute a response to relativistic social science (Sect. 1.2), which challenges the very idea of a shared conception of human reason. Understood thus, the ideal of public reason is an ideal of public rationality, or a shared conception of rationality. The challenge posed by reasonable pluralism (Sect. 1.4) is more modest. Advocates of reasonable pluralism maintain that even if we apply shared standards of reason, our deliberations will not yield shared reasons for belief. In a weaker sense, then, the ideal of public reason is an ideal of public reasons, or how we can arrive at shared reasons to believe and act. A theory of public reason may advance a theory of public rationality and/or public reasons.

Three main conceptions of public reason stand out: (a) the epistemic, (b) the consensual, and (c) the political.

2.2 Epistemic Theories of Public Reason

In philosophy, 'epistemology' refers to the theory of knowledge or, more broadly, the theory of justified belief. Epistemic theories of public rationality, then, maintain that at least some common norms of reasoning can be justified to everyone. The Enlightenment view was that all valid norms of reasoning can be justified to everyone—reason was inherently public. Epistemic theories of public rationality need not, however, advance such a sweeping claim. Importantly, an epistemic theory of public rationality may adopt a modest version of the 'relativism of reasons' (Sect. 1.2), according to which in some cases person Alpha may have a fully justified norm of reasoning N while Beta accepts a fully justified norm of reasoning M, where it is the case that N and M are inconsistent. In cases where only N and M are relevant to deliberation, a relativism of rationality will manifest itself; Alpha may have reasons based on N that Beta will deny on the basis of M, and both will be justified. However, to establish a thoroughgoing relativism of reasoning that undermines the possibility of public reason, it is not enough to establish that this can sometimes occur; it must be shown that no common norms of rationality can be justified to all—that it is always (or at least usually) the case that for any justified norm of reasoning held by Alpha, some person Beta will be justified in accepting a competing norm. That is the sweeping relativistic claim rejected by epistemic theories of public rationality (Gaus 1996).

Advocates of epistemic public rationality can reply to both the anthropological argument for the relativism of reasons, and psychological studies uncovering the diversity of norms employed in reasoning (Sect. 1.2). In reply to the anthropological argument, advocates of public reason can embrace Martin Hollis' view that an anthropologist must build up an interpretation of an alien language by locating a 'bridgehead.' The assumption underlying the bridgehead strategy is that others generally perceive what we perceive and tend to say about it the sorts of things we would say. Relying on these assumptions, the anthropologist begins by translating everyday, basic perceptual sentences such as 'Yes, this is a brown cow' and 'No, it is not raining right now.' Now, Hollis insists, this bridgehead not only includes translations of such basic beliefs, but basic logical rules, since 'what a sentence means depends on how the beliefs which they express are connected, and that to justify a claim to have identified a belief one must show the belief is connected to others.' Consequently, in the main, the logic employed by those in different cultures must either be very similar to our own or unintelligible. Axioms such as ' $p \rightarrow p$ ' ' $\sim(p \sim p)$ ' and ' $(p \cdot (p \rightarrow q)) \rightarrow q$ ' are more than simply our norms of reasoning. They are constituents of any system that we can identify as a way of reasoning (Hollis 1970a, pp. 214–15, 1970b, p. 232.) If 'natives' reason logically at all, then they reason as we do. The point, then, is that the context that sets the stage for the possibility of relativism—that we confront others, different from us but of whom we can make some sense—presupposes widespread shared norms of inference as well as beliefs. Thus the very possibility of mutual intelligibility sets a limit on the extent to which we can understand others as employing cognitive processes different from our own.

In reply to psychological studies showing the diversity of norms employed by normal reasoners, advocates of public reason can rely on evidence supporting the hypothesis that people employ a mental logic—a system of mental inference rules—in their actual reasoning. Indeed, most psychologists studying actual reasoning suppose some version of the mental logic theory. To be sure, mental logic may depart from the standard propositional calculus. Psychologists studying English reasoners, for instance, have found that English speakers do not interpret connectives in a way consistent with standard logic. Particularly troubling are interpretations of 'if, then' statements (as well as 'or' connectives), which are not typically used in ways that correspond to standard analyses in logic. In response to these findings, psychologists such as Lance J. Rips and Martin D. Braine have developed sets of natural inferential rules that correspond to the way in which speakers of English employ connectives. Rips has gone beyond this to develop rules modeling causal reasoning as well.

Mental logic views strongly incline toward the hypothesis that these logics are in some way natural or innate, though to precisely what extent is open to investigation. There may well be a complicated interplay between language and logic, such that English speakers tend to employ some inferential rules not utilized by others. A plausible hypothesis is that the capacity to develop a mental logic is innate, though the precise developmental path taken depends on a variety of factors, including one's native language. If so, however, this is sufficient to undermine the plausibility of a radical relativism of norms of rationality. The set of possible mental logics—laws governing thought—is apt to be pretty severely constrained.

2.3 Consensus Theories of Public Reason

Epistemic accounts of public reason uphold our ability to reason together because they insist that we do, indeed must, share basic rules of inference. In contrast, consensual accounts of public reason conceive it as arising out of a shared social life and/or shared discourse (see Shared Belief). A number of otherwise diverse philosophers such as Ludwig Wittgenstein, Jürgen Habermas, Richard Rorty, Susan Hurley, and Philip Pettit all point to the idea that reasoning is a social phenomenon. In order to be a deliberator, one must be a member of a community in which one's beliefs and rules are intelligible to others. One comes to understand what is a justified or unjustified belief, and what is a good or a bad way of reasoning, by sharing the norms and standards of communities, including communities of inquirers. Thus some insist that 'ultimately, there is only one criterion by which beliefs can be judged valid, and that is that they are based on agreement reached by argumentation'—we converge on them (this is Habermas's 1991, p. 14 gloss on Rorty's 'particular version of discourse theory'). Habermas draws an intimate connection between mutual understanding (Verständigung) and agreement (Einverständnis). It would seem that to understand others we must in some way arrive at intersubjective agreement about norms of rationality and good reasons. Consequently, the phrase of 'public reason' becomes almost redundant: something can only be identified as reason because it is the object of public, interpersonal, agreement.

Wittgenstein and his contemporary followers such as Hurley (1989) and Pettit (1993) suggest a broadly similar view. Reasoning itself presupposes a 'community'—common rules of thought. Wittgenstein (1958) argued that one could not have a private rule that one only followed once—for in such a case we could not know whether the rule was actually followed. More generally, it has been argued that one cannot have a purely private rule, for one needs to be able to distinguish when one has correctly followed the rule and when one has gotten it wrong. But, assert Wittgensteinians, the difference between correct and incorrect application of a rule cannot be located in individual belief systems, but only by the individual comparing her application of the rule to those of her fellows: each must look to others to check and correct her rule-based performances. Since thinking is necessarily rule driven, the analysis applies to reason itself. Thus it seems that the very idea of rule-following—and, so, of reasoning—supposes convergence with others. If so, the search for reason is a search for consensus.

In one respect this view, somewhat surprisingly perhaps, returns to the basic idea of the Enlightenment—all reason is public reason. But whereas the Enlightenment was confident in asserting this because of the widespread faith in a universal, common, human faculty of reason that could accurately represent reality, consensual theorists see reason as arising out of a shared public life. To put it crudely, rather than reason producing consensus, consensus generates reason. Thus the publicness of such reason, unlike that of the Enlightenment's, is consistent with a cultural relativistic conception of rationality. The public, intersubjective agreement, reached by one culture—which is constitutive of their very conception of rationality—may be very different from that upheld by another.

Because consensual accounts of public reason stress the constitutive nature of public consensus to the very idea of reason, and because public consensus may be promoted by political institutions, more radical consensual theorists such as D'Agostino give political institutions a constitutive role in determining what reason is (1996, Chap. 9). This is a radical view indeed—however, it is not entirely novel, perhaps going back as far as Hobbes. For Hobbes ([1651] 1948), the conflict in the state of nature arises from conflicting private judgments; people's private reasoning yields conflicting judgments of right and wrong, as well as matters of fact, and this leads to the less intellectual conflict that characterizes the state of nature. Hobbes's solution is to appoint an 'arbitrator.' This 'judge,' says Hobbes, provides 'public reason' to which private reason 'must submit.' The arbitrator proclaims what each has reason to do, and so defines a single, coherent conception of reason. Because, in Hobbes' view, we have authorized the judge (i.e., sovereign) to define public reason for us, the sovereign's pronouncements constitute a shared public reason on which there is consensus.

2.4 Public Reason qua Political Reason

D'Agostino's radical view allows the political to shape the rational. A more modest proposal with which this radical view is easily confused maintains that the notion of public reason is a purely political idea, in the sense that it concerns only how we reason together about politics. This understanding of public reasons lies at the heart of what is commonly known as 'political liberalism.'

Rawls's political liberalism is a response to the problem posed by reasonable pluralism (Sect. 1.4). For Rawls the crucial problem is that citizens in democratic societies entertain a plurality of what he calls reasonable 'comprehensive doctrines'—overall philosophies of life centered on religious, philosophical, or moral beliefs. This pluralism seems a permanent feature of modern societies. 'Political liberalism assumes that, for political purposes, a plurality of reasonable yet incompatible comprehensive doctrines is the normal result of the exercise of human reason within the framework of free institutions of a constitutional regime' (Rawls 1993, p. xvi). The reasonable pluralism of comprehensive views renders such views unacceptable as bases for the justification of political power. Rawls endorses the 'liberal principle of legitimacy,' i.e., that 'our exercise of political power is fully proper only when it is exercised in accordance with a constitution the essentials of which all citizens as free and equal may be reasonably expected to endorse in the light of principles and ideals acceptable to their common human reason' (p. 137). Thus, because there exists a reasonable plurality of comprehensive doctrines, basing the justification of political power on any of them violates the liberal principle of legitimacy. This leads Rawls to seek a political conception that 'all affirm' and that is 'shared by everyone.' Such a conception would be supported by the diverse reasonable comprehensive doctrines that characterize our democratic societies. It would generate public reasons that would fit into our many reasonable, but irreconcilable, comprehensive views. Some version of the principle of political legitimacy motivates the search for public reasons in contemporary liberal political philosophy: if the exercise of coercive political power relies on nonpublic reasoning, it is oppressive and illegitimate in relation to those who do not share those reasons.

Rawls's core argument—and so his entire political liberalism—apparently depends on the contrast between comprehensive views and the shared, political, conception. Whereas comprehensive conceptions produce diverse reasons that conflict, the political point of view provides public reasons—reasons that all reasonable comprehensive views can endorse.

Habermas (1995) suggests that Rawls posits an 'a priori' distinction between the political and non-political spheres. At least at times Rawls seems to suggest that the political point of view can be conceptually distinguished from moral, religious, and philosophical matters; whereas the former identifies a common point of view that can be affirmed by all, when human reason is applied to moral, religious, and philosophical issues it leads to reasonable disagreement. It is difficult, however, to accept the claim that some single conception of the political is shared by all reasonable persons in modern democratic societies. Political theorists have often pointed to the 'political' as an 'essentially contested' concept—one that is open to divergent, reasonable, interpretations (Connolly 1983, Chap. 1). If citizens of modern democratic societies disagree about the concept of the political, it cannot serve the function of identifying public reasons that overcome reasonable pluralism. Like the moral and philosophical, the nature of the political itself seems a matter of reasonable disagreement.

An alternative interpretation of Rawls' view is to take the political conception as constructed out of that which is shared. On this reading the nonpolitical is, by definition, those matters on which the free use of reason by citizens in democratic societies leads to different, reasonable conclusions. It is, by its very nature, the realm of reasonable pluralism. In contrast, one might define the political as those matters on which reason converges in democratic societies, and so necessarily generates constitutional principles that satisfy the principle of liberal legitimacy. The political is thus characterized as the overlapping consensus of those diverse comprehensive views characterizing modern societies. The problem for this interpretation is that Rawls himself indicates that the free use of human reason leads us to reasonable disagreement about conceptions of justice and constitutional essentials. The 'political' qua 'shared perspective' is limited to the abstract concept of a 'liberal political order' (Rawls 1993, p. 241). 'By this [Rawls says] I mean three things: first, it specifies certain basic rights, liberties, and opportunities (of the kind familiar from constitutional democratic regimes); second, it assigns a special priority to these rights, liberties and opportunities, especially with respect to claims of the general good and of perfectionist values; and third, it affirms measures assuring all citizens' adequate all-purpose means to make effective use of their basic liberties and opportunities' (p. 223). Thus stated, the content of public reason seems sparse indeed. Unfortunately, if a more detailed articulation of this idea is provided, Rawls indicates that the use of human reason again leads to disagreement. Apparently modern democratic societies agree on only the most abstract of public—political—reasons.

3. Conclusion: Reasoning in a Plural Society

Puzzles about the possibility of shared, public rationality and reasons derive from a variety of sources: social science, the philosophy of science, and the moral pluralism of modern societies. Although developments in all these fields serve to cast doubt on the Enlightenment's ideal of a common universal reason, they pose different challenges. The findings of anthropology call into question universal norms of rationality; psychology questions whether so-called universal norms are actually employed in human reasoning. Kuhnian philosophy of science suggests an irreducible indeterminacy of the application of our general standards, even in science itself. Worries about reasonable pluralism focus on the possibility of shared moral and political norms in societies that disagree deeply on questions of value and the nature of the good life.

Just as the challenges arise from multiple sources, so do theories of public reason. Epistemic theories dispute that modern social science casts serious doubt on the necessity of shared norms of rationality in the interpretation of other cultures and in individual deliberation. Although some divergence in justified norms of reasoning no doubt occurs—and can be made sense of—radical divergence is implausible. Consensus theories of public reason maintain that to make sense to each other we must think alike—we must employ common rules of thought. The application of such common rules, say neo-Wittgensteinians, only makes sense in the context of shared social practices. Reason arises out of shared social life; reason is inherently public because it is necessarily a product of social consensus. Finally, political liberalism seeks to establish that, amid the diversity of moral and philosophical views that characterize modern societies, a common political point of view can generate shared public reasons to regulate coercion.

The ideal of public reason, then, is as diverse as the sources of our doubts about the possibility of shared ways of reasoning in contemporary societies. In all its manifestations, however, the ideal of public reason seeks to maintain the heritage of the Enlightenment—the free use of human reason will lead us to converge on the best justified beliefs.

See also: Bioethics; Examples from the Life Sciences; Economics and Ethics; Ethics and Values; Prisoner's Dilemma, One-shot and Iterated; Utilitarian Social Thought, History of; Utilitarianism: Contemporary Applications; Welfare

Bibliography

- Benedict R 1934 Patterns of Culture. Houghton Mifflin, Boston, MA
- Braine M D S 1978 On the relation between the natural logic of reasoning and standard logic. Psychological Review 85: 1–21
- Connolly W E 1983 The Terms of Political Discourse, 2nd edn. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Davidson D 1973 Radical interpretation. Dialectica 27: 314–28
- D'Agostino F 1996 Free Public Reason. Oxford University Press, New York
- D'Agostino F, Gaus G F 1998 Public Reason. Ashgate, Aldershot, UK
- Gaus G F 1996 Justificatory Liberalism: An Essay on Epistemology and Political Theory. Oxford University Press, New York
- Habermas J 1990 Moral Consciousness and Communicative Action. MIT Press, Cambridge, MA
- Habermas J 1995 Reconciliation through public reason: remarks on John Rawls's political liberalism. Journal of Philosophy 92: 109–31
- Hobbes T 1948 [1651] Leviathan. Basil Blackwell, Oxford, UK
- Hollis M 1970a The limits of irrationality. In: Wilson B R (ed.) Rationality. Blackwell, Oxford, UK, pp. 214–20
- Hollis M 1970b Reason and ritual. In: Wilson B R (ed.) Rationality. Blackwell, Oxford, UK, pp. 221–39
- Hurley S 1989 Natural Reasons: Personality and Polity. Oxford University Press, New York
- Kahneman D, Slovic P, Tversky A (eds.) 1982 Judgments Under Uncertainty: Heuristics and Biases. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Korsgaard C M 1996 Creating the Kingdom of Ends. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Kuhn T S 1970 The Structure of Scientific Revolutions, 2nd edn. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
- MacIntyre A C 1988 Whose Justice? Which Rationality? University of Notre Dame Press, Notre Dame, IN
- Mill J S 1974 [1843] A System of Logic. In: Robson J M (ed.) The Collected Works of John Stuart Mill. University of Toronto Press, Toronto, ON, Vols. 7 and 8
- Nisbett R, Ross L 1980 Human Inference: Strategies and Shortcomings of Social Judgment. Prentice-Hall, Englewood Cliffs, NJ
- Pettit P 1993 The Common Mind: An Essay on Psychology, Society and Politics. Oxford University Press, New York
- Rawls J 1993 Political Liberalism. Columbia University Press, New York
- Rorty R 1991 Objectivity, Relativism and Truth. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Rips L J 1983 Cognitive processes and propositional reasoning. Psychological Review 90: 38–71

Stich S P 1990 The Fragmentation of Reason. MIT Press, Cambridge, MA

Wittgenstein L 1958 Philosophical Investigations, 3rd edn. Macmillan, London

G. F. Gaus

Public Relations in Media

Of all the many factors that shape the news appearing in the media, the rise of source professionals or public relations experts is one of the most dramatic. Known under a variety of titles, from public relations practitioners, communications managers, and political consultants, to pollsters, spin doctors, and lobbyists, their job is to manage the news on behalf of their employers, ensuring their visibility, boosting their image, or repairing their reputation. These cultural intermediaries also help to feed the growing appetite for stories generated by the twenty-first century's proliferating media and, as such, have a significant influence on both the agenda and content of current journalistic output (for further references see Political Advertising; Political Communication).

It was the establishment of universal suffrage that gave the biggest fillip to the spread of modern day public relations activity in the public sphere. For, just as the newly enfranchised citizens began to seek information about their country's power bases—over which they could now exercise some control—their opinions began to assume an impact that they did not have before. Public opinion became worth swaying by those who needed popular support. This coincided with increasing literacy that initially promoted the spread of newspapers and subsequently the development of the broadcast media, all of which were hungry for news items.

In early definitions of the role of the professional source, Bernays—one of the profession's founding fathers—commented that the job of those brought in to court this newly influential public opinion was to isolate ideas and develop them into events that could be used as news items by the media (1923, p. 171). Writing in 1922, Lippmann, observed that a new age of opinion management had arrived and the creation of consent among the governed had begun to develop beyond anything seen before in the political organization of human affairs. Public relations thus emerged in the early decades of the twentieth century particularly to link the political actor as a source of news with the media who would produce it, in a relationship that met the needs of both (McNair 1998, p. 146).

The role of public relations in swaying public opinion has since been regarded as crucial to those seeking to gain or maintain political power. Consequently, as an instrument in manipulating a powerful public opinion consensus, the professional source operating within the political arenas of liberal democratic states has attracted increasing attention.

1. Source–Media Relations

News that influences public opinion is heavily affected by the nature of the relationship between source and media. Throughout the 1970s and for much of the 1980s, two contrasting sociopolitical paradigms prevailed. One was the Marxist view, which argued that media content was governed by elite sources representing the dominant classes of society with the result that their ideology permeated the media to the virtual exclusion of alternative views. This dominance was achieved with the compliance of journalists who readily accepted, and often sought, their input because these elite sources were perceived as authoritative and even objective. Furthermore, the dominant class learnt to deliver stories that conformed to the criteria of newsworthiness and the regularity of their news supply could be relied upon by the news media. In contrast, the pluralist view maintained that there was a wealth of groups and interests all competing for influence. The media were thus acting as a marketplace of ideas, none predominating to the exclusion of others.

However, recent research on public relations has delved into the question of access and the degree of openness and closure of the communications system, revealing a more complex picture than either of these early paradigms suggested. To what extent does the dominant class, characterized by the corporate and state elite, control the media agenda through direct access to the detriment of non-institutional and poorly resourced groups? This new research on news sources and promotional culture (see Wernick 1991), concentrates on the public relations activities of corporate and institutional sources in the public sphere and also on the strategies of opposition and resource-poor groups as they seek to gain access to the media.

The political economy perspective, with its emphasis on economic power and media ownership, argues that corporate and institutional/state sources have huge resource advantages that enable them to dictate the current of news by restricting or enabling information flows (Glasgow Media Group 1976, Herman and Chomsky 1988, Gandy 1982, for further reference see Mass Media, Political Economy of). Similar to this position is Hall et al.'s (1978) radical structural culturalist approach which concentrates on identifying the legitimacy conferred on state and corporate sources by journalists. Media statements are grounded in objective and authoritative statements from sources accredited by virtue of their institutional power and position. News production inevitably leads to a systematically structured over accessing to the media of those in powerful and privileged institutional positions. The result of structured preference conferred by journalists to the views of these elites is that they become the primary definers of topics and the primary interpreters of all subsequent debate on the issues.

Challenges to this account of source-journalist behavior as being overly deterministic come from the recently termed radical pluralist. Whilst acknowledging the structuralist view that elite sources hold strategic advantages and wield substantial economic and political power over the news agenda, Schlesinger and Tumber point out that 'because the conception of primary definition resolves the question of source power on the basis of structuralist assumptions, it closes off any engagement with the dynamic processes of contestation in a given field of discourse' (1994, p. 21). The concept of primary definition ignores: the conflict between elite sources therefore presenting the media with more than one message; the role of 'leaks' and off-the record briefings by non attributable sources; the non-retention of access over time as new forces and their representatives emerge; the vulnerability and possible discreditation of 'accredited' sources; and finally, journalists' challenges to official sources (1994, pp. 18–20). In this formulation primary definers are therefore not structurally predetermined, but earn this role by providing journalists with regular, reliable, and authoritative story leads.

These considerations have rethought the behavior of sources and led to the introduction of new methodologies in conducting empirical studies. Instead of relying solely on internalist accounts that rely on either journalists' descriptions of their relationships with sources or a reading of media content, recent research has expanded externalist or source centered approaches by examining the media strategies and tactics of news sources (see Ericson et al. 1989, Deacon and Golding 1994, Hallin 1994, Schlesinger and Tumber 1994, Miller 1994, Anderson 1997). All these studies with their various approaches emphasize the way all groups, official and nonofficial, whether state, corporate, voluntary, or pressure need to foster favorable public opinion through the establishment and protection of identity and image. New pluralist accounts offer the view that 'public relations is less capital dependent than other forms of public communication and non-official sources can employ strategies that require little institutional legitimacy' (Davis 2000, p. 51) thereby conferring on them the potential for gaining access to the media that traditional radical accounts did not acknowledge.

2. The Growth of Public Relations in the Media

As a business activity, public relations began to gain in importance from the end of World War I particularly in the USA and later in Europe. Corporate identity work grew up in the early 1960s and, as a professional practice, gained wider acceptance in the following decade during which there was an upsurge in acquisitions, mergers, and divestitures. In commercial climates such as these, both predatory companies and their corporate prey have found that it has paid to heighten their image. And, as they have merged, both nationally and internationally, there has been a need to establish and maintain a single identity by which the corporate whole can be recognized (Meech 1996, pp. 65–6). Privatization programs through which previously state-owned companies seek shareholders from among the general public, also boosts the need for the companies involved to seek regular, favorable coverage in the media. This is generated through public relations professionals, both in-house and from hired agencies, whose specialisms now include media relations, public affairs, issues management, and lobbying. The lead shown by the corporate world has been enthusiastically embraced by both political parties and politicians.

2.1 Proactive Public Relations

The work of these public relations professionals can be described in two broad categories. First, there are proactive public relations through which, in particular, ‘pseudo events’ are used to create news that will be attractive to journalists (Boorstin 1962). These artificially created ‘happenings’—such as press conferences and photo opportunities—are staged purely to present journalists with material that is tailored to their needs. But their lack of authenticity and rationality has been criticized for promoting style over substance, and performance over policy, thereby turning news into a promotional form for politics and business.

Public relations, particularly lobbying on behalf of corporate and other sectional interests, has risen in importance. The size and development of the public relations industry in the United States and the United Kingdom mean that British and American firms dominate the market in most member states of the European Union, and their actions are increasing in scope and intensity. Public relations specialists and lobbyists are also diversifying by targeting not just the national and regional governments in the member states, but also the EU institutions, along with trade associations, corporations, and interest groups (Miller and Schlesinger 1999).

2.2 Reactive Public Relations

The second category can be described as reactive public relations. Sometimes called crisis management, this form of news manipulation springs into action to counter real news events that are potentially damaging. For politicians the rise in scandal news has led to a preoccupation with new strategies and tactics to counter negative images. Within the corporate world, as globalization has developed, multinational companies, face problems arising in one small part of their global operation turning into an international crisis within minutes thanks to ever-faster and more ubiquitous electronic links and the consequent speed with which media agencies can flash news around the world. During the 1980s and 1990s, a spate of corporate public relations offensives was launched to refute criticisms over safety procedures and corporate responsibility in response to a number of well-publicized disasters and accidents. Swift action was also deemed necessary in the wake of takeover and other financial scandals, and to allay public fears about the real or potential dangers of contaminated or faulty products. High profile cases illustrate that an efficient crisis management plan, with an emphasis on skilful news management, can be effective in lessening the damage such catastrophes can wreak on a company. Indeed, those that have managed crises well in public relations terms have even managed to benefit from them. They have achieved this by attracting public sympathy in the immediate aftermath of a disaster, and then by winning people’s trust and respect for the way in which it has been subsequently handled. In contrast, a corporate crisis that is badly handled in public relations terms can cause irreparable damage leading to board resignations, a plunge in share value, and even corporate takeover (for further reference see Scandal: Political).

The message that even the largest companies ignore at their peril is that no organization or individual is immune to negative media coverage, especially now that effective public relations techniques are being increasingly understood and adopted by campaigning organizations. These relatively small bodies have found that lack of resources need not prevent them, too, from manipulating the news and, as a result, they have scored a number of public relations successes at the expense of government and big business. Since the 1960s, there has been a significant increase in organized lobbying with the emergence of several single-issue pressure groups particularly within the green and consumer movements. These organizations have pioneered new ways to harness media coverage to coincide with campaigns in a way that has compelled politicians and other powerful groups to take them seriously. Thus, through the creation of pseudo events, the targeting of specialist correspondents, and other techniques to meet journalists’ need for an endless flow of new material, these pressure groups indicate that non-official and resource poor organizations can also make significant interventions in media discourses despite lacking definitional power and cultural capital (see Bourdieu 1979). The ability of resource poor groups to gain access to the media, though, requires favorable conditions and the requirement to establish credibility and maintain reliability. Occasional entry into the public arena is possible but not secure in the long term (Goldenberg 1975).

3. Impact on Democracy

Public relations has emerged as a key specialism in the conduct and management of national and international political affairs and also corporate image. But its impact on democracy has often been viewed with alarm. For instance, the rise of the spin-doctor on the political scene has led to accusations of distorting news to an undesirable extent. The argument is that if the electorate requires objective information, then the aim of professional sources to manage this information represents a threat to democracy. This concern has been heightened by changes in the working conditions of journalists, which have increased their reliance on the input of sources. As many media organizations have evolved into businesses whose prime concern is the bottom line, cost cutting has been a focus. Thus, at the same time as external organizations are investing growing amounts in public relations activity, media companies are reducing editorial budgets, compelling journalists to produce more for less. With less time and money to produce their own stories, journalists are obliged to rely more heavily on information subsidies supplied to them by sources. Consequently, now that journalists frequently have little time to check facts or to mount any independent investigation, professional sources have assumed more power in placing their stories in the media, complete with their particular spin. And as a result, the journalist's role, both as gatekeeper and as watchdog, is diminished.

Despite a reformulation of source media relations and public relations activity there is general acknowledgment that source access is still far from equal. Although non-institutional and resource poor organizations have become skilled at manipulating the news media, they are still at a disadvantage lacking the cultural capital of corporate and state sources in the ability to limit or enable access to information and, neither possessing the political, legal, and financial power to apply pressure to journalists. Furthermore, despite conflict between elite sources, these still have an automatic legitimacy that other sources have to earn.

Powerful institutions, 'driven by the promotional dynamic to attain new heights of sophistication in trying to manage the news' (Schlesinger and Tumber 1994, p. 275) are, therefore, likely to remain the most common suppliers of material to journalists, with elite sources continuing to invest heavily in activities to sway public opinion in their favor. And, whatever concerns it might provoke, public relations is now seen as a necessary element of both the modern political process and of corporate management.

See also: Advertising Agencies; Advertising: Effects; Mass Media: Introduction and Schools of Thought; Mass Media, Representations in; Media Ethics; Media Imperialism; Media, Uses of; Scandal: Political

Bibliography

- Anderson A 1997 Media, Culture and the Environment. UCL Press, London
- Bernays E 1923 Crystallizing Public Opinion. Boni & Liveright, New York
- Boorstin D 1962 The Image or What Happened to the American Dream. Weidenfeld and Nicholson, London
- Bourdieu P 1979 Distinction. Routledge, London
- Ericson R V, Baranek P M, Chan J B L 1989 Negotiating Control: A Study of News Sources. Open University Press, University of Toronto Press, Toronto
- Davis A 2000 Public relations, new production and changing patterns of source access in the British national media. Media Culture and Society 22: 39–60
- Deacon D, Golding P 1994 Taxation and Representation. John Libby, London
- Gandy O H Jr 1982 Beyond Agenda Setting: Information Subsidies and Public Policy. Ablex, Norwood, NJ
- Glasgow University Media Group 1976 Bad News. Routledge and Kegan Paul, London
- Goldenberg E 1975 Making the Papers: The Access of Resource-poor Groups to the Metropolitan Press. Lexington Press, Lexington, MA
- Hall S, Crichter C, Jefferson T, Clarke J, Roberts B 1978 Policing the Crisis: Mugging, the State, and Law and Order. Macmillan, London
- Hallin D C 1994 We Keep America on Top of the World: Television Journalism and the Public Sphere. Routledge, London
- Herman E S, Chomsky N 1988 Manufacturing Consent: The Political Economy of the Mass Media. Pantheon, New York
- Lippmann W 1922 Public Opinion. Harcourt, Brace and Co., New York
- McNair B 1998 The Sociology of Journalism. Arnold, London
- Meech P 1996 Corporate identity and corporate image. In: L'Etang J, Pieczka M (eds.) Critical Perspectives in Public Relations. International Thomson Business Press, London
- Miller D 1994 Don't Mention the War: Northern Ireland, Propaganda and the Media. Pluto Press, London
- Miller D, Schlesinger P 1999 The changing shape of public relations in the European Union. In: Heath R (ed.) The Handbook of Public Relations. Sage, London
- Schlesinger P, Tumber H 1994 Reporting Crime: The Media Politics of Criminal Justice. Clarendon Press, Oxford, UK
- Wernick A 1991 Promotional Culture: Advertising, Ideology and Symbolic Impression. Sage, London

H. Tumber

Public Sector Organizations

'Public sector organizations' are entities that have been formed to manage the policy and operating requirements that enable a government to achieve its goals of public governance. The term 'public governance' has been defined as the management of a nation through the use of political power (Rainey 1991), or more simply put, answers the question: 'How should government govern, and what should it do' (Peters 1996, p. 19)? Such a broad definition of public governance permits a wide range of activities to be undertaken by public sector organizations as the administrative arm of government.

The role and structure of public sector organizations depend on the choices made by governments over time and the traditions widely recognized within the system of government operating in a country. Public sector organizations can be structured as central agencies of government, service providers, government business enterprises (GBEs), regulatory bodies, watchdog agencies, and as quasi-government bodies. While many of these institutions have remained comparatively unchanged, the emergence of Next Steps agencies in the United Kingdom represents a significant example of a new approach to the structure of public sector organizations. New Steps agencies operate under a form of contract that sets out the scope of their responsibilities and accountability to both government and clients, while related policy issues remain under the control of government.

In the 1930s, Mary Parker Follett suggested that there were significant 'similarities between the business of government and the government of business' (Corkery 1989, p. 193). However, it took until the last two decades of the twentieth century for reform of public sector organizations to explore this notion through the application of private sector practices to the public sector. This reform process coincided with a shift away from a politico-economic ideology involving the pursuit of full employment, a focus on demand management within an economy, and intense government intervention, characterized by the principles expounded by John Maynard Keynes. In its place emerged the so-called, neoclassical model of economic management. Pioneered by Milton Friedman, this economic ideology centers upon the capacity of an economy to meet potential demand (supply-side economics), and the regulation of economic activity through the acceptance of market forces in place of government intervention. The neoclassical model is closely associated with the principles of smaller government pursued at first instance, by national leaders Thatcher, Reagan and Mulroney of the United Kingdom, the USA, and Canada respectively.

By the early 1990s, the concept of reform of public sector organizations had gained a significant international following. Often referred to as the New Public Management (NPM), the drive for reform was accompanied by emergence of the range of public sector organizations, an example of which is outlined above. The NPM was accompanied by a wave of privatizations in a number of jurisdictions, and by a rhetoric that espoused a new approach to the management of public sector organizations in terms of 'doing more with less,' 'letting the managers manage,' and 'pursuing greater efficiency and effectiveness.' This rhetoric, often described as 'managerialism,' supported the application of private sector principles to the management of public sector organizations and translated into a variety of radical reforms in public organizations designed to support the philosophy of smaller government. These reforms included: reducing the number of public employees through 'downsizing,' outsourcing a variety of activities previously undertaken by public sector organizations, introducing budget reductions to enforce financial restraint within public sector organizations, and selling government assets and entities to reduce the budgetary problems experienced by many governments.

Over this period, research into public sector organizations has examined the consequences of these reforms. The research has divided along lines that either support market-oriented reforms or seek to justify a return to more traditional models of public sector organizations. However, some recent research highlights the importance of strong citizen support for the public sector and attempts to put to rest the view that the 'public-sector service is inherently inferior to private-sector service' (Kernaghan 2000, p. 7). Organizational theory research in this area has also explored the consequences of adopting private sector organizational practices in the public sector. It is likely that the divergences of opinion about the relative merits of organizational performance in each sector will remain a source of intense debate and a matter of personal opinion.

1. The Rise of the Public Sector Organization

A theory of a public sector organization might be first found in the development of the democratic city-state described by Plato in The Republic. His concept arose from the notion that people are 'not independent of one another, but need the aid and co-operation of others in the production of the necessities of life' (Copleston 1962, p. 251). Livy (15 BC) also described a public sector that was involved in sophisticated risk management negotiations with the private sector, whose help was needed to save part of the Roman army stationed in Spain. However, evidence from Chinese scholars suggests that public sector organizations existed in that country in the Xia Dynasty, many centuries earlier than in Europe.

The origins of public sector organizations in the English-speaking world can be traced to the arrival of William the Conqueror on British shores in 1066. His administration led to the development of public institutions that supported the power and financial strength of the monarch, through the development of the Common Law and the creation of the Domesday Book, which recorded the ownership of land throughout the kingdom which then encompassed England. At this time, the accountability of these institutions was to the monarch, rather than the polity, demonstrating the nature of the public sector that existed during this period of feudal society.

The emerging role and structure of public sector organizations can be seen in their support of empires in the late Middle Ages and the transfer of traditional public sector roles and structures from the dominant power to a subordinate country. This transfer led to some commonality of ideals in public sector organizations that can be traced back to the influence of, or reaction against, periods of colonial rule of a nation. Bureaucratic traditions also became well-established features of public sector organizations, a factor that has been a source of criticism of public sector organizations and the subject of considerable theoretical and practical evaluation.

In 1776, Adam Smith had suggested the traditional role of government should be limited to the protection of a nation from internal and external violence, the administration of a fair system of justice, and the development and maintenance of major public works. These principles found favor in the early nineteenth century and, more recently have attracted approval from those supporting contemporary neoclassical views. The Northcote–Trevelyan report in 1853 eventually led to a radical and influential restructure of the British civil service and provided the foundation of modes of public sector organization in the twentieth century.

It could be argued that in many jurisdictions public sector organizations enjoyed the peak of their influence in the economic boom years of the 1960s and 1970s. However, by the 1980s, the pressure for reform had begun as the changing economic ideology of governments and emerging budgetary pressures forced governments to re-examine the role of their public sector institutions.

2. The Nature of a Public Sector Organization

It is the complex relationship between public sector organizations and government, which distinguishes this type of organization from those in the private and nonprofit sectors, regardless of the recent attempts to merge public with private sector management practices. Public sector organizations can be distinguished from other sectors by their accountability to the principles of public governance adopted by a government. It can be claimed that this accountability gives rise to an overriding management (including ministerial) culture that punishes mistakes and guarantees that few risks will be taken. In a democratic state, there is an expectation that the public sector is also accountable to the government, which is itself answerable to the electorate. In a more authoritarian state, the public sector can be expected to be accountable to the government alone, although in this environment, public opinion may remain an important countervailing force.

The issue of accountability to government and in turn, civil society, highlights another distinctive feature of public sector organizations: the decision-making complexity arising from the need to cater for the diversity of demands faced by public sector organizations. The challenges to the decision-making process emerge, first, from the comprehensive legal requirements that bind the form and operation of public sector organizations. In addition, the demands of civil society, the intensity of competing interests within an economy, and the unpopular role of a number of public entities, all contribute to the decision-making complexity experienced by public sector organizations. For example, as societies have become more diverse and interest groups more influential, their competing demands make the role of both government and public sector organizations, more difficult (Olson 1982). In the face of these tensions, there are suggestions that the emerging challenges of globalization require ‘the emergence of new forms of government’ (Metcalf 2000, p. 122) able to conceptualize and respond to the increasingly varied and competing demands of public sector management.

Public scrutiny of the policies and operations of public sector organizations is also widespread. Formal scrutiny on behalf of government may occur through a systematic process of audit as well as periodic review by politicians and the judiciary. However, informal review by the media represents a major tension for public sector organizations whose performance may be the subject of intense media review at any time, for political purposes and ‘in the public interest.’ There are suggestions that this pressure makes the performance and decision processes of public sector organizations slower and more conservative as the managers of these organizations work to avoid public criticism of their organization and the government.

The decision-making processes used in the public sector may be seen as slower and more dilatory than other sectors because of the bureaucratic and accountability structures of government organizations. This perception was supported by Drucker who, in the late 1960s suggested that ‘any attempt to combine governing with ‘doing’ on a large scale paralyses the decision-making capacity’ (1969, p. 233). While this criticism may arise from a frustration with the speed with which public sector organizations move towards many decisions, it occurs because of a failure to recognize the impact of bureaucratic and political demands on the decision processes within government and public sector organizations.

The comparative absence of competition between public sector organizations and between public and private sector organizations has also been a distinguishing feature of public sector organizations, although there are exceptions to this rule, especially in the case of some GBEs that operate in a competitive business environment. As Osborne has commented: ‘Businesses typically exist in fiercely competitive markets, most public organizations don’t’ (1994, p. 137). Business performance is also built upon comparatively concrete targets such as overall profitability, return on assets, return on owners' funds, inventory turnover, and the maintenance of cash flow.

Non-traditional performance measures such as assessing customer loyalty, the level of customer satisfaction, and relationship management have also been developed by some organizations seeking to enhance their market standing. However, there are a number of other performance criteria, such as timeliness, ability to operate within budget expectations, and perceived quality of implementing government policy, which might be substituted for profit in public sector organizations. A customer service focus has been a feature of the reform of public sector organizations in the 1980s and 1990s, and remains high on the agenda of the US and UK governments.

The operating environment of a public sector organization has often been regarded as being in some way inferior to private sector organizations. This view, which has long been promoted in literature (Parkinson 1958) and the media, may have influenced public opinion against members of public sector organizations, a view that several governments are actively attempting to redress. The changing nature of the service requirements of many public sector institutions has also created pressure to move away from the generalist model of management. There is an increasing expectation that managers of these entities, in addition to their existing management skills, may find they now need some of the skills possessed by many private sector managers. These capabilities include a working knowledge of sophisticated aspects of historical cost accounting, information technology, national and international finance, contract negotiation, sales and marketing, human resources management, and assessment of customer satisfaction.

3. Public Sector Organizations and the New Public Management

The causes of the drive to reform public sector organizations are multiple. They can be traced to the political pressures faced by governments in the early 1980s, which began to find that budgetary constraints emerged, full employment had become an apparently unattainable goal, inflation was more difficult to manage than expected, and the ideology of economic management had begun to change. The model of demand management enunciated by Keynes came to be replaced by the more rational, market forces model, or supply-side economics, an ideology that also found favor in developing new policies for defining the relationship between public sector organizations and their respective governments and polities. However, reform can also be attributed to the need for politicians to be seen to be doing something constructive to please both the polity generally as well as the financially powerful private sector.

As noted earlier, the most contentious reform of public sector organizations focuses on the reengineering of the public sector within the philosophies espoused by those promoting the concept of the NPM. At its extreme, the emergence of the NPM has seen a shift in the focus of government from seeking policy advice and implementation, to a drive for a more 'efficient and effective' public sector based on performance principles more commonly associated with the business sector. The accompanying rhetoric includes the goals of 'economic competitiveness, doing more with less, building faith in government and strengthening community and civil society' (Gore 1999, p. 1). Across the Atlantic, the goals of the British Government have been expressed as targets in five key areas of public service, namely:

- forward looking policy making;
- public services focused on needs of users;
- quality public services;
- the use of technology to support a modernized public service; and
- a move to value, rather than denigrate, public service (Her Majesty's Government 1999).

From an organizational point of view, these emerging trends have resulted in a number of significant changes to many public sector organizations. Because of the range of ways in which public sectors are structured, these trends vary in their importance. In many public sector organizations, attaching private sector salary levels to senior executives who are appointed under contract for a specific term has tended to increase the politicization of public sector organizations and has changed their traditional relationship with the government.

The contracting out of activities previously undertaken by public sector organizations has had the potential to reduce their knowledge of particular markets and affect their ability to enter contractual arrangements. One of the main areas of risk is ensuring that the legal and operational sophistication possessed by private sector organizations, is matched by those acting on behalf of the public sector. Contracts are required which take account of possible contingencies arising during the life of a contract. Because these contracts exist between the public sector and private sector, in some jurisdictions there are increasing numbers of cases where the transparency usually associated with public contracts is increasingly hidden behind the barrier of 'commercial in-confidence,' perhaps to the detriment of the polity through the diminution of public review.

The outcomes of the reform process have been mixed and are subject to widely varying interpretations. The reform process is not an event; it represents a continuum of change in public sectors in most countries, where the pressures of globalization, technological change, reduction in government debt, and emergence of aspects of the neoclassical approach have taken hold. As a result, it is not possible to evaluate the precise cost-benefit of public sector reforms presently, nor is such an evaluation likely to be very reliable in the future. Some public sector organizations have reduced their regulatory control within the economy, while others have found it necessary to consider a re-regulation process. The contracting-out of activities within some public institutions has provided both benefits and costs to government and civil society, an experience that is likely to be mirrored within private sector organizations that have undergone similar reengineering processes. Major experiments in social change such as that attempted in New Zealand have led to complex outcomes for both public and private sector organizations, the merits of which remain widely debated.

4. Future Directions

As the twenty-first century begins, it is clear that public sector organizations will continue to experience the tensions that arise between the demands of government, business, and civil society. The basic role of public sector organizations may not change dramatically, although governments may find themselves under intense pressure to meet the demands of rapidly aging societies, to reduce the inequities apparent from contemporary versions of globalization and to manage the consequences of emerging e-business trends.

Current trends to downsize public sector organizations as part of a dedication to the goals of smaller government will force these entities to work towards further financial and operating efficiencies, to achieve higher service quality standards, and to emulate private sector organization structures. However, it is unlikely that these organizations will gain any relief from the responsibilities of public governance.

The tensions between organizational theory and public sector practice can be expected to continue to be a source of academic review and public scrutiny as specific events cause governments and public sector organizations to reexamine their role. For example, re-regulation of certain markets, a requirement for public investment in previously privatized businesses, and a range of potential responses to the combined effects of e-business and globalization are examples of major challenges for public sector organizations. These demands are likely to increase as the structure of these organizations continues to be affected by the combined effects of downsizing, outsourcing, budgetary restrictions, and the decentralization of organization structures inherent in the moves towards electronic government.

See also: Bureaucratization and Bureaucracy, History of; Organizations and the Law; Organizations, Sociology of; People in Organizations; Public Goods: International; Public Interest; Public Management, New; Quangos in Politics;

Bibliography

- Barney J, Hesterley W 1996 Organizational economics: Understanding the relationship between organizations and economic analysis. In: Clegg S, Hardy C, Nord W (eds.) Handbook of Organization Studies. Sage, London
- Copleston F 1962 A History of Philosophy: Greece and Rome. Image Books, New York, Vol. 1, p. 1
- Corkery J 1989 Challenges of the next twenty years: Future directions for training. Australian Journal of Public Administration 48: 185–95
- Drucker P 1969 The Age of Discontinuity. Heinemann, London
- Friedman M 1962 Capitalism and Freedom. The University of Chicago Press, Chicago
- Gore A 1999 Transforming governments in the 21st century. Global forum on reinventing government. (<http://www.21stcentury.gov/conf/gore1.htm>) Washington, DC
- Her Majesty's Government 1999 Modernising Government. The White Paper. (<http://www.official-documents.co.uk/document/cm43/4310/4310.htm>) Her Majesty's Stationery Office, London
- Kernaghan K 2000 Rediscovering Public Service: Recognizing the Value of an Essential Institution. Institute of Public Administration of Canada, Toronto, Canada
- Keynes J M 1964 The General Theory of Employment Interest and Money. Macmillan, London
- Mauk T 1999 The death of bureaucracy. Public Management (US) 81(7): 4–8
- Metcalf L 2000 Linking levels of government: European integration and globalization. International Review of Administrative Sciences 66(1): 119–42
- Nutt P 1999 Public-private differences and the assessment of alternatives for decision making. Public Administration Research and Theory 9(2): 305–50
- Olson M 1982 The Rise and Decline of Nations. Yale University Press, New Haven, CT
- Osborne D 1994 Reinventing the business of government: An interview with change catalyst David Osborne. Harvard Business Review May–June: 132–43
- Parkinson C N 1958 Parkinson's Law or the Pursuit of Progress. Murray, London
- Peters B G 1996 The Future of Governing: Four Emerging Models. University Press of Kansas, Lawrence, KS
- Rainey H 1991 Understanding and Managing Public Organizations. Jossey-Bass, San Francisco, CA
- World Bank 1992 Governance and Development. World Bank, Washington, DC

G. Callender

Public Sphere and the Media

To analyze the media from the perspective of the public sphere is to focus upon the media's relationship with democracy. The concept of the public sphere has been used to describe both the historical development of modern, post-Enlightenment forms of representative democracy and the role of the media and public opinion within them, and has also served as a normative concept with which to pass judgement on the current performance of the media from the perspective of the creation and maintenance of democracy.

In recent years, the public sphere perspective has become dominant in thinking about the media and their political role, by providing, in a return to the central questions of enlightenment political thought, a bridge between Marxist theories of ideology and the liberal 'free press' tradition. It provides a critique of Marxist theories of ideology by revalidating the specificity of the political, by giving due weight to the emancipatory potential of liberal bourgeois concepts of free assembly and debate, and by shifting attention from worker to citizen. On the other hand, it provides a critique of an abstract, property-based 'free press' model by stressing both the systemic social barriers to entry and the manipulative distortions to which its discourse is subject.

This return has focused on concepts of the public sphere, civil society, citizenship, and identity. It has in particular pitted those, such as Habermas, who see the emancipatory project of the enlightenment as unfinished business and wish, in a movement of immanent critique, to hold liberalism to its emancipatory ideals, against a range of communitarians and postmoderns. The latter, in the name of various versions of identity politics, see liberal, rights-based political theories as inherently repressive and their emancipatory and universalizing tendencies as bogus (Gray 1995).

The public sphere approach has provided, against the background of the turn away from Marxism associated with the collapse of 'actual existing socialism,' an alternative to theories of dominant ideology or hegemony as an explanation for the coincidence, within what used to be called 'bourgeois democracies,' of growing social inequality and political apathy on the one hand with the relative stability and increasingly consensual, nonideological nature of representative party politics on the other. Its emphasis on discursive practices and on communicative action as central to democratic practice and legitimization fitted well with the wider 'linguistic turn' in the human and social sciences. At the same time, its use of the spatial metaphor of sphere, and its stress on the necessary institutional foundations for the realization of those citizen rights to free expression and debate central to democratic theory, addressed the questions arising from both the perceived empirical reality in the mature democracies of an increasingly media-saturated, image-driven, public relations-oriented politics and the task of constructing democracy in both state and civil society in newly democratized countries with little or no historical traditions of democracy to call upon.

The concept of the public sphere was introduced into media analysis by Jurgen Habermas (1989) in The Structural Transformation of the Public Sphere. In Habermas's original formulation, the term was designed to describe a historical process whereby in the shift from premodern feudal, absolutist rule to forms of modern representative democracy public opinion, based upon publicly available information and debate, developed as both a check on, and as a source for the legitimacy of, government.

The public sphere was both a set of institutional spaces—newspapers, lecture halls, coffee houses, etc.—and a set of discursive rules. Drawing upon a Kantian heritage that links freedom to a personal autonomy grounded in the exercise of public reason, Habermas and his followers have stressed the role of the public sphere as a site within which the formation of public opinion, and the political will stemming from and legitimized by such opinion, is subject to the disciplines of a discourse, or communicative ethics, by which all views are subjected to the critical reasoning of others. At the same time, a democratically legitimate public sphere requires that access to it is open to both all citizens and all views equally, provided only that all participants are governed by the search for general agreement. This general model is then applied as a normative test against which the performance of contemporary media, in terms of political effects and democratic potential, can be judged in terms of either the critical rationality of their discourse or in terms of the range of views or speakers granted access.

The public sphere is added as a fourth sphere to Hegel's tripartite division of society into family, civil society, and state. The public sphere is distinguished from the family, the sphere of intimate privacy, although it is the creation of this sphere, particularly under the influence of the literary public sphere that creates both the norms of noncoercive, literate, interpersonal discussion and the associated subjectivities that form the foundation of the public sphere. The public sphere is distinguished from civil society, and especially the market, where, following Hegel, citizens pursue their private interests, since although the private economy provided the resources for the public sphere, and citizens participated in the public sphere as private persons (i.e., access was not governed by socially conferred status or the possession of public office), the purpose of debate within the public sphere was common agreement on matters of general interest. On the other hand, it is distinguished from the state since it was there that citizens held the state to account and guided its actions.

Habermas then argued, following in part the general Frankfurt School argument of the Dialectic of Enlightenment, that there was a pervasive crisis of democratic legitimacy in the modern world because public spheres had been squeezed almost out of existence by both market and state. On the one hand, the market had increasingly come to dominate the institutions and practices of public communication through the commodification of information and opinion for sale on a mass consumer market and through the associated manipulative use of advertising. On the other hand, the state, ironically in response to political pressures from below, had become increasingly both economically interventionist and manipulative of public opinion. The result was a public opinion and related politics increasingly dominated by advertising and public relations, what Habermas termed the refeudalization of the public sphere—a shift back from a politics of rational, participatory debate to a politics of display.

The public sphere approach has been criticized on three main grounds. First that its procedural rules are too rationalist—that the persuasive use of rhetoric can never, and indeed should never, be excluded from political communication—and that to impose such discursive norms in practice excludes from the public sphere as illegitimate not just a range of culturally specific discursive forms but those who do not possess the cultural capital required to mobilize those discursive forms. Here we find the criticism that the model of procedural rationality being deployed is in fact a model of a certain intellectual practice and thus excludes, in a movement of symbolic violence, those who are not members of the social group who are the carriers of that practice, whether conceived as intellectuals or as the white male bourgeoisie, and that it leads to a privileging of certain genres of media. These rationalist assumptions may take news and overt political coverage to be ‘serious’ while taking entertainment-oriented programs to be a sign of ‘dumbing down’ or ‘refeudalization.’ This neglects the role that entertainment plays in the formation of publics and as a site for the development of an understanding of issues of public importance.

Second, the public sphere model of procedural rationality is criticized for drawing the distinction between public and private in such a way as to exclude both key groups of citizens, e.g., women, or key matters of potential public political concern, e.g., the regulation of domestic, intrafamilial, or sexual relations. It is in this sense that the famous slogan ‘the personal is political’ mounts a challenge to the way in which public sphere theory has drawn the distinction between the private and public spheres. And this in turn will affect the ways in which we think about the ethical issues relating to invasions of ‘privacy’ by the media and to what is or is not an appropriate matter for public discussion in the media.

Third, it is criticized on the grounds that it has valued general agreement around a set of universal values or norms, however rationally discursively arrived at, which, its critics argue, derive in turn from a liberal model of proceduralism, abstract individual rights, and ethical neutrality which prioritizes the just over the good and thus denies difference and thus the inevitability of perpetual normative conflict within modern societies. This in its turn, so critics argue, leads to an overcentralized model of the public sphere incompatible with the politics of identity in multicultural societies, whereas what is needed is a decentralized model of multiple public spheres expressive of each distinct collective identity, culture or form of life.

This debate concerning the proper relationship between social communication and politics can be traced back to the Enlightenment and the basic paradox that modernity posed; the paradox of what Kant called the ‘unsocial sociability’ of human beings. We might think of this as the inherent tension between liberty and fraternity. In essence, modern democracy is about how we handle the relationship between individual freedom and moral agency on the one hand and the necessary and unavoidable social norms and structures within which alone such freedom can be exercised on the other. As Rousseau put it in The Social Contract, ‘the problem is to find a form of association ... in which each, while uniting himself with all, may still obey himself alone, and remain as free as before.’

The political problem to which the public sphere tradition of analysis addresses itself is then two-sided and much of the problems with current uses of the term public sphere, and criticisms of it, derive from a confusion about which of the two sides of the dilemma are being addressed.

Here we are brought back to the Hegelian concern for Sittlichkeit and to critiques of Habermas’s public sphere approach from a communitarian and neo-Aristotelian perspective. Here the debate over the public sphere has to be seen as part of the wider debate between advocates and defenders of the theory and practice of rights-based liberalism and the various proponents of communitarianism and identity politics (Benhabib 1992, Guttman 1994).

The communitarian critique leads to the opposite solution to that of social contract theory and the liberalism based upon it. Now political values are social before they are individual. Politics is embedded in, and ideally expresses, a set of pre-existing social values, or a way of life, and the role and legitimacy of the state, or the public realm, is then to foster and uphold those communal values and defend that way of life. The citizens find their identity in, and give their loyalty to, not a set of abstract rights, but to a way of life, an ethos, that embodies a set of moral values. From this perspective liberalism, and the particular forms of democracy that it supports, is but one way of life among many possible alternatives. From this perspective, the role of the media is then to foster and defend this shared way of life, sometimes described, in the nationalist model of communitarianism, as national identity or culture, rather than to serve as a value neutral space for the critical rational debate over values.

The communitarian position on the public/private divide, and the approaches to both politics and the media that stem from it, is in a sense contradictory. The core of identity politics is the call for the recognition in the public realm of values hitherto deemed private, both in the sense of being excluded from the public gaze and from public debate, but also in the sense of stemming from private group interests and identities rather than from a generally shared interest and identity, and thus for the acquisition of rights that recognition of these values as public entails, while at the same time drawing for its evaluative arguments upon a range of sources which must exclude the very concept of the public, and its liberal valuation of rights and the recognition and equal treatment of the diversity of private interests, that they are demanding.

Following Benhabib, we can distinguish between the integrationist and participatory versions of communitarianism. The integrationist strand seeks Sittlichkeit in an attempted return to the moral certainties and social unities of traditional societies. Here everything is in a sense public; the values that motivate people and give them their social anchorage are derived from and shape a whole shared way of life. In a theocracy there is no room for the individual or the private. Indeed, this strand in communitarianism criticizes the liberal tradition precisely for creating, and philosophically justifying as the highest good, social arrangements that separate political or public spheres of action and value on the one hand from private spheres of action and value on the other, to the impoverishment, in their view, of both (Macintyre 1998).

On the other hand, the participationist strand wishes to build its way out of the alienation and formalism of liberalism by both accepting the conditions of modernity which are liberalism's starting point—namely posttraditional societies and reflexive individuals—while at the same time arguing for a refounding of political communities on the universalization of the discourse ethic and its practices. The more postmodern end of communitarianism, which links to so-called new social movements and the politics of identity, makes this attempt by, in effect, advocating the fragmentation of societies into small-scale or specialized communities of interest or identity, each with its own public sphere. They tend to see more universalistic and unified definitions of the public sphere as repressive of difference and thus antidemocratic. What is at issue here is both whether within a polity we should be looking at one or multiple public spheres and how we think of the relation between public and private. An integrationist communitarianism and the politics of recognition that stems from it demand a unified public sphere and place continuous pressure on the existence of a meaningful private sphere. Its aim is a one-to-one fit between a unitary set of values, a single public sphere (if this term any longer has meaning here) and a single polity. If diverse communities exist within a single territory or polity, the aim becomes one of political and cultural fragmentation, not co-existence and the toleration of diversity. It is clearly incompatible with the exercise of public reason in the Kantian sense and with media practices and institutional forms in harmony with such an ideal.

The case of participatory communitarianism and the identity politics that stems from it is more complex. Here the problem arises from the ambivalence of the liberal value of tolerance vis-à-vis the public/private divide. On the one hand toleration can be taken to mean the acceptance by public authorities of a range of practices and beliefs by defining them as private and outside the realm of public regulation, e.g., religious observance. Such toleration rests, as the communitarian critics rightly point out, on a prior judgement that the practice or belief in question is not in any sense a threat to the public weal or interest. This form of toleration can be rejected by certain advocates of the politics of recognition because, it is argued, it implicitly downgrades, and thus in some sense fails to recognize fully, the importance or centrality of the practice or beliefs in question. On the other hand, we can also understand toleration as giving public recognition to and bringing into the public realm people, practices, or beliefs to which by so doing we signal that we give equal value to those already so recognized and with which we are prepared to live and argue within a shared culture and polity. Thus we need to distinguish between two kinds of demands for recognition and for multiple public spheres. One set of demands seeks to extend the private, so that their group identities remain unthreatened by the risk of corrosion that participation in the critical discourse and compromise of the public sphere carries.

The second set demands a widening of the definition of what is public to let them into what remains a common arena for critical public debate and decision making with the acceptance of the duties and risks that such entry carries with it. In the former case, what is being demanded in the name of difference is the dissolution of any shared culture, polity, and set of rights and associated obligations. Here the question is how much of such private fragmentation can any society or polity sustain while remaining viable, and whether in fact we will only regard such demands as democratically legitimate where the group identity claimed is itself subject to the disciplines of the discourse ethic. In the latter case, the liberal polity is being asked, rightly, to live up to its ideals and to accept that those values that it considers central to its way of life must always be held provisionally and be subject to the review of critical discourse. Here we need to distinguish between a truly private realm, the irreducible site of individual autonomy, and the multiple public spheres within which we necessarily live and have our being, defined by Benhabib as any occasion or situation where people share views on matters of common interest, multiple public spheres that all contribute to the formation of our identities and which may be more or less democratic in the sense of meeting the requirements of the discourse ethic. The media, ranging from the small-scale, special-interest media of magazines, newsletters, Internet bulletin boards up to the space for public debate and exposure of views offered by the mainstream mass media, are integral to these multiple public spheres and should be judged in each case on the basis of the identities and practices that they foster. However, these multiple public spheres then need to be distinguished from the political public sphere where discussion is necessarily aimed at the common agreement necessary for concerted action within a unified polity. Research and debate within and around the public sphere perspective now focuses on three issues. The first is the institutional question of the relationship between the political public sphere and the nation-state. Both the actual institutional development of the modern mass media, the public sphere, and representative democracy, and thinking about them, have taken place within a nation-state framework. It is argued that current globalizing trends, both within society at large and within the media, are undermining this nation-state foundation of both democratic politics and its associated political public sphere. The question then is whether this is a process of cultural and discursive emancipation and the beginnings of the construction of a global public sphere or, on the contrary, is a further tightening of the screw of refeudalization which places the key centers of power outside the structures of democratic accountability and rational critical debate. On the one hand, the trends towards globalization within the media can be exaggerated. For reasons of audience taste and interest, most media output, and the organizations that provide it, remain obstinately linked to local, often national, markets, cultures, languages, and political structures. There are few examples of successful transnational newspapers or broadcasting news services. Even in the field of entertainment their spread is limited. This is itself, as the example of the European Union shows, a major barrier to the construction of a transnational public sphere. On the other hand, it can be argued that current developments on the World Wide Web, particularly its use for mobilization, debate, and advocacy by NGOs, are a welcome start in the construction of a global public sphere. The question here is how representative and how public these new Net-based interest groups and associated debates are. What certainly is the case is that the development of global media has begun to create a situation where nation-states, both within their own borders and in their inter-State relations, are having increasingly to take account of global public opinion (e.g., the cases of Tienanmen Square or the Balkans).

Second is the discursive question of how we can both analyze and normatively judge from the perspective of democracy the wide range of rhetorical forms used and identities appealed to within the range of modern media. Here the debate around the public sphere reprises an older debate about mass culture.

The question at issue is whether current developments in media forms, genres, and their associated audiences/publics is a liberatory process of demassification and cultural pluralism on a global scale or, on the contrary, whether it is a process of 'dumbing down' which, in its appeals to irrationality and social fragmentation, undermines the rational/universalistic norms upon which citizenship, and thus democracy, rest. In the press, attention is focused on tabloidization, i.e., the stress on the scandalous and the sensational and the coverage of politics according to the norms of show business; in broadcasting on the shift in the balance of the programming mix in favor of entertainment at the expense of news, current affairs, and political coverage and debate, a shift associated, at least in Europe, with the retreat of public service broadcasting in the face of increasingly intense commercial competition for audiences and revenues. Analysis and debate have focused in particular on the spread of audience participation shows of the Jerry Springer type, of 'docu-soaps' and of a general soundbite coverage of politics and public issues. In this debate there are no easy answers. First, empirically the trends are by no means as clear cut as many critics claim. It is as easy to argue for a rise in standards. Second, it is all too easy to fall into familiar elitist or populist stances, neither of which take due account of the complexity, both actual and historical, of the construction of the identity of citizens or of the rhetorical problems of communicating with the generality of such citizens. There is also often a danger of stretching beyond breaking point the proper and necessary boundaries of politics and the public sphere.

Third, there is the question of the role of the mediators. Public sphere theory finds it difficult to break free from a participatory model of direct democracy. Representation always introduces a potentially distorting element into the communication process between the private citizen and political whole. The public sphere is conceived as a structure for the aggregation of the opinions of individual private citizens through a public debate to which all have equal access. The ideal model is the Athenian agora. The scale, social complexity, and specialization of the modern world make such a model unrealistic. It has clearly never fitted the actual forms and practices of the mass media. It therefore leads to unrealistic demands being made upon them and to an excessively dismissive critique when these demands are not met. It has in particular led to exaggerated claims being made for the democratic potential of the Internet on the grounds precisely that cyberspace is a new agora without mediators or mediation. The challenge, therefore, is to think of a legitimate role for mediators within the public sphere—for journalists, TV producers, bulletin board moderators, etc.—which is neither one of pure transparent 'objective' mediation nor one of the mere pursuit of instrumental professional or economic self-interest. This in its turn links to the wider question of the social and political role of intellectuals and experts within modern democratic polities.

See also: Critical Theory: Contemporary; Critical Theory: Frankfurt School; Legal Issues: Public Opinion; Mass Communication: Normative Frameworks; Mass Media: Introduction and Schools of Thought; Mass Media, Political Economy of; Mass Society: History of the Concept; Public Opinion: Microsociological Aspects; Public Opinion: Political Aspects

Bibliography

- Benhabib S 1992 Situating the Self: Gender, Community and Post-modernism in Contemporary Ethics. Polity, Cambridge, UK
- Calhoun C (ed.) 1992 Habermas and the Public Sphere. MIT Press, Cambridge, MA
- Gray J 1995 Enlightenment's Wake: Politics and Culture at the Close of the Modern Age. Routledge, London
- Guttmann A (ed.) 1994 Multiculturalism. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Habermas J 1989 The Structural Transformation of the Public Sphere. Polity, Cambridge, UK
- Macintyre A 1998 Whose Justice? Whose Rationality? Duckworth, London
- Peters J 1993 Distrust of representation: Habermas on the public sphere. Media, Culture and Society 15 No. 4: 541–72
- Schudson M 1998 The Good Citizen: a History of US Civic Life. New York
- Splichal S 1999 Public Opinion. Rowman and Littlefield, Lantion, MD

N. Garnham

Public Sphere: Eighteenth-century History

Any reflection trying to understand how the notion of public sphere was constructed in the eighteenth century is necessarily referred to the classical book published by Jürgen Habermas in 1962 (Habermas 1962). According to Habermas, the 'political public sphere' was construed in the eighteenth century (in some places sooner, in others later) as a space for discussion and exchange removed from the control of the state. The new 'public sphere in the political realm,' founded on the exercise of public criticism was thus opposed to the 'sphere of public authority' identified with the exercise of state power. For Habermas, this new intellectual and political 'space' was distinct from the court, which belonged within the domain of state power, and from the common opinions of the people who had no access to enlightened critical debates. This is why it is possible for him to qualify it as 'bourgeois.'

1. Definitions of the Public

There were different ways of conceiving the construction of the new political public sphere of the eighteenth century. Was it issued from the literary controversies of the seventeenth century and rendered possible by the diffusion of new forms of intellectual sociability? Or was it the extension of the modalities of print communication proper to the Republic of Letters to a greater number of individuals which made possible the transformation of dispersed private persons into a unified public community?

1.1 Habermas's Political Public Sphere

For Habermas such a 'public' supposed, on the one hand, that the various participants were not acting as agents or subjects of the ruler and, on the other hand, that they were considered as equal. The political public sphere thus ignored both the obedience required by the exercise of state power and the distinctions of 'orders' and 'estates' imposed by the traditional social hierarchies.

No limit could subject the critical exercise of reason, and no domain was to be forbidden to it. Overcoming the division instituted by the cartesian methodical doubt between opinions which could legitimately be submitted to examination and obligatory credences and obediences, the members of the new public sphere considered that no domain of thought, including the political and religious ones, was to be removed from critical and reasonable judgement.

This judgment was exercised within the different forms of sociability which had been previously erected as a tribunal of aesthetic criticism: the salons, the cafés, the clubs. In the seventeenth century, this new public challenged the traditional monopoly of the court, the official academies, or the connoisseurs in such matters. It was enlarged during the eighteenth century thanks to the multiplication and diffusion of the periodicals, and the success of new forms of association: the book clubs, the reading societies, the masonic lodges. But it supposed also the exclusion of all those who lacked the competence which made possible the participation into a critical community welcoming only the persons who had sufficient wealth and culture.

1.2 Kant's Public Use of Reason

Habermas's perspective was based on one of the most famous text of the eighteenth century, Kant's What Is

Enlightenment? published as an article in the periodical Berlinische Monatsschrift in 1784. But it also distorted it. In his text Kant proposed a new way of conceptualizing the relation of the public to the private. He equated the public exercise of reason with judgment produced and communicated by private individuals acting 'as scholars before the reading public' and he defined the public as the sphere of the universal in opposition to the private considered as the domain of particular and domestic interests (which may even be those of an army, a church, or a state).

He inverted, thus, the accepted meanings of the two terms by associating the private use of reason with the exercise of an office or with the duties toward the state and by locating the public use of reason within a community without limitations or boundaries. If the private use of reason can be restrained legitimately in the name of public ends without prejudice to the progress of enlightenment, the liberty of the public use of the reason was absolute and has to be respected by the prince himself.

In this same text, Kant shifted the way in which the legitimate limits put on critical judgment should be conceived. Such limits were no longer defined by domains forbidden to methodical doubt; they laid in the position of the subject who exercises his reason. He could be constrained legitimately when he was executing the duties of his charge or of his status, but he was necessarily free when he acted as a member of the 'society of world citizens.'

That universal society was unified by the circulation of written works that authorized the communication and discussion of thoughts without the necessity of physical presence of the different interlocutors. Kant systematically associated the public use of reason with the production or reading of written matter by private individuals. The public was not construed on the basis of new forms of intellectual sociability such as clubs, cafés, literary societies, or lodges, because those associations were modalities of particular, circumscribed, and domestic entities. For him, only written communication was admissible as a figure for the universal.

Kant's conception of the public use of reason was drawn for the notion of the Republic of Letters as it was constructed through correspondence and the circulation of manuscript or printed texts from the late seventeenth century onwards (see Goldgar 1995). Founded on the free engagement of its members, on equality among its interlocutors, and on reciprocity and disinterestedness, the Republic of Letters which united the learned and the scholars provided a model and a support for thinking of the new public sphere. At the same time, it showed the distance separating the universality of the 'society of world citizens' and the restricted social composition of the 'reading public.' In Kant's time, this reading public was not the whole of society by any means, and those capable of writing were even less numerous. It is only when everyone will be able to exercise critically one's reason that humanity will experience 'an enlightened age.'

1.3 The French Philosophers: Public Opinion vs. Popular Opinions

Kant held the distinction between the public and the people to be temporary, transitory, and characteristic of a century which was a 'age of enlightenment' but not yet an 'enlightened age.' But for many thinkers of the eighteenth century, particularly within the framework of the French Enlightenment, the two notions constituted an irreconcilable dichotomy (see Ozouf 1989, pp. 21–35). Public opinion was defined precisely in contrast to the opinions of the multitude. Public opinion, set up as a sovereign authority and a final arbiter, was necessarily stable, unified, and founded on reason. The universality of its judgments and the constraining self-evidence of its decrees derived from that unvarying and dispassionate constancy. On the other hand, popular opinions were multiple, versatile, and inhabited by prejudice and passion. Such a qualification reveals a strong persistence of older representations of the people considered as subject to extremes, inconstant, and foolish.

When the concept of public opinion did emerge in France around 1750 as the superior authority to which all particular opinions must bow, the distinction between the public and the popular became essential. A new political culture thus took shape which transferred the seat of authority from the will of the king alone, who decided without appeal and in secret, to the judgment of an abstract entity embodied in no institution, which debated publicly and was more sovereign than the sovereign who was obliged to seek to win its approval and support.

This gave acuity and urgency to a fundamental question: how could the people, eliminated from the exercise of critical judgment by their lack of competence, be 'represented' in the new political space? A first answer to this question assigned this function to one or another of the theories of political representation confronted after the mid-eighteenth century. Following Keith Baker, three of the theories were fundamental: the absolutist theory, which made the person of the king the only possible representative of a kingdom divided into orders, estates, and bodies; the judiciary theory which instituted the Parliaments as interpreters of the consent or remonstrances of the nation; and the administrative theory, which attributed the rational representation of social interests to municipal or provincial assemblies founded not on privilege but on property (see Baker 1990).

An alternative model of representation that removed the notion institutional setting—monarchical, parliamentary, or administrative—was offered by the category of public opinion. Substituting the self-evidence of unanimity to the uncertainties of particular and popular opinions, detached from any form of exercise of governmental and state authority, the concept delegated the representation of the whole nation to those who were able to express its reasonable decrees: the men of letters.

2. Public Opinion: Voice or Tribunal?

Although everyone recognized the existence of public opinion and postulated its unity, there was no unanimous consent on two issues: first, who were its true spokesmen and, second, how was one to evaluate the self-evidence of its judgments? In eighteenth-century France, the answers to such questions were expressed through the metaphors used to designate this new entity: public opinion as a voice to be heard; public opinion as a tribunal which had to be persuaded.

2.1 From Theater to Tribunal

In 1775, in his discours de réception before the Académie française, Malesherbes forcefully expresses the idea, by then commonly accepted, that public opinion was to be considered a court of justice more imperious than any other. It is a tribunal 'independent of all powers and that all powers respect,' composed by the men of letters who are 'amid the public dispersed, what the orators of Rome and Athens were in the middle of the public assembled.'

There are several arguments contained in this comparison. First, it invested the new 'judges' with an authority that ordinary judges did not have. Their competence knew no bounds and their jurisdiction no limits; their freedom of judgment was guaranteed because they were in no way dependent upon the power of the ruler; their decrees had the force of self-evident propositions. With such a definition of public opinion, the men of letters were invested with the judiciary legitimacy of all traditional powers and with veritable public office.

Reference to this dispersed judiciary function had another meaning, however. It aimed at establishing a connection between the universality of judgments and the dispersal of persons, and at constructing a uniform opinion which, unlike that of the ancients, had no physical location in which it could construe and experience its unity. As for Kant later, it was the circulation of written matter and particularly the printed one which made it possible to envisage the constitution of a unified public in a nation in which people were necessarily separated from each other and formed their ideas individually. By associating the public nature of the written word, vastly increased by the invention of the printing press, with the supreme authority of the judgments pronounced in the new political sphere, Malesherbes (as many others) converted the plurality of reflections and criticisms that emerged from solitary reading into a collective and anonymous conceptual entity.

From the seventeenth century to the eighteenth century there had been a radical shift in the manner of conceiving the public. In the age of baroque politics the traits that defined the public were the same as those which characterized theatrical audiences: heterogeneous, hierarchized, and formed into a public only by the spectacle in which the most powerful effects were produced by hidden machines and secret maneuvers.

When the concept of public opinion did emerge, it effected a dual rupture. It opposed the art of dissimulation and secrecy by appealing to transparency. Before the tribunal of opinion all causes were to be argued without duplicity. But all citizens were not (or not yet) adept at joining together to form enlightened opinion. If the audience which mingled in the theaters potentially was composed of men and women from all social levels, the public which served as the tribunal to judge literary merits, religious matters, or political issues was more selected and homogeneous. When opinion was thought of more as actor than as acted upon, it became public, and by that token it excluded many people who lacked the competence to establish the decrees which it proclaimed.

2.2 From Audience to Public

Constituting the public as an entity the decrees of which had more force than those of the established authorities supposed several operations. They can be exemplified by the memoirs published in great number by both French lawyers and litigants from 1770 onward. They took the judicial comparison literally and exposed before opinion affairs which were examined by a court of justice. The cases subjected to the secret procedures of justice were thus transformed into public debates, shifting the place in which judgment had to be pronounced (see Maza 1993).

The most fundamental strategy required by such an operation consisted in endowing particular cause with general and exemplary value. The debt that a court noble refused to pay to his bourgeois creditors became an ideal occasion for denouncing unjust privilege, just as the arbitrary imprisonment of a young gentleman was an opportunity to criticize the lettre de cachet. To achieve such goals supposed, first, that the secrecy of judicial procedure had to be broken by the circulation of printed memoirs on the largest possible scale, and, second, that a dramatic style or a first-person narrative had to replace the customary legal prose. Universalizing the particular, making public what had been secret, and 'fictionalizing' discourse were the techniques that lawyers used to appeal to opinion and, in doing so, to proclaim themselves the authorized and legitimate interpreters of that opinion.

The traditional, discrete, and exclusive relationship that bound individuals to the king, the guarantor and guardian of domestic secrets, gave way to a totally different situation in the public exposition of private conflicts. From that point of view, judicial memoirs are the exact inverse of the lettres de cachet accorded by the sovereign in response to requests from families interested in concealing familial disorders which sullied their honor. The memoirs displayed what the lettres concealed; they expected from the judgment of opinion what the lettres hoped to gain from the omnipotence of the monarch; they converted into public issues the scandals that the lettres were charged with burying.

It is in this sense that the new public space was built on conflicts proper to the private sphere, assigning political significance to simple familial or conjugal strife. In a parallel manner, the clandestine pamphlets stigmatized the aristocracy, the courtiers, the queen, and finally the king by revealing their corrupt mores. People became accustomed to seeing individual affairs transformed into general causes. This procedure was not restricted to pamphlet literature but also lay behind the lawsuits instituted by rural communities against their landlords or by journeymen workers against their masters. It was the process of 'privatization' in which individuals conquered autonomy and freedom removed from state authority which permitted the very existence of a new public sphere.

Even if, or because, it was defined as a conceptual entity, and not in sociological terms, the notion of public opinion which invaded the discourse of all segments of society—political, administrative, judicial—in the second half of the eighteenth century operated as a powerful instrument for social division and legitimization. The mobilization of the category founded the authority of all who, by affirming that they recognized its decrees alone, set themselves up as mandated to pronounce its judgments. Universal in its philosophical essence, the unified, enlightened, and sovereign public was far from universal in its social composition. The public sphere, emancipated from the domain in which the ruler held sway, thus had nothing in common with the shifting opinions and blind emotions of the multitude. Between the people and the public there was a fundamental difference.

3. Prohibited Books, Subversive Words

According to Darnton, this new public was detached from the traditional authorities by a wider and wider dissemination of philosophical ideas. In this process the role played by the great classics of the Enlightenment was perhaps less important than the texts that the eighteenth-century book trade called 'philosophical books': critical pamphlets, scandalmongering chronicles, anticlerical satires, pornographic works. The circulation of this clandestine and seditious literature, which depicted the despotic corruption of the monarchy or the depraved mores of the court, engendered a change in thought and in collective representations, henceforth detached the subjects from their old loyalties: 'Sedition was hatching. It was instilled in people's minds [...] We know for certain that it was communicated by a formidable instrument: the book' (see Darnton 1991, 1995).

But other historians like Farge have challenged this interpretation which sees the increase in seditious writings in the last two or three decades of the ancien régime as the matrix of a desacralization of the monarchy. She affirms: 'Popular opinion did not emerge from the cumulative reading of pamphlets and placards; it was not unilinear and did not base arguments on the sum of what is read' (see Farge 1994, p. 35).

Statements of disapproval or hatred of the sovereign, attacks on his acts, and expressions of a desire to kill him did not arise from the flourishing clandestine literature. Nor did they start with Damiens's attempt to assassinate Louis XV, which, rather than unleashing a proliferation of regicide discourse, persuaded the authorities of the reality of Jansenist and Jesuit plots and set them in pursuit of such literature. For Farge, 'the failed murder of Louis XV had a ready-made public opinion; it tells us more about the monarchy's reactions than about any new and original turn of popular thought' (p. 174).

The symbolic and affective disinvestment which transformed relations with authority when it was deprived of all transcendence was manifested but not caused by the wide diffusion of 'philosophical books.' The erosion of founding myths of the monarchy, the desacralization of royal symbols, and the distancing of the person of the king formed a body of representations which was 'already there,' 'ready-made' when the public sphere arose conceptually and sociologically.

4. Women and the Public Sphere

What was the role played by women in this new public sphere? Joan Landes' thesis opposes radically the 'symbolic politics of the emerging bourgeois public sphere (which) was framed from the outset by masculinist interests and assumptions' with the forms of sociability dominated by women in the ancien régime, for example, the salon society conceived as 'an alternative sphere of cultural production inside absolutism' (Landes 1988, p. 40). This is the reason why the exclusion of women from political rights during the French Revolution is inscribed by Landes within the logics of the enlightened condemnation of the role that women played within the absolutist public sphere: 'the structures of modern republican politics can be construed as part of an elaborate defense against women's power and public presence' (p. 203).

Against such a perspective Goodman argues that women played a central role both in the collective project of the Enlightenment and in the construction of a new political and critical public space. For her, 'the French Enlightenment was grounded in a female-centered mixed-gender sociability that gendered French culture, the Enlightenment, and civilization itself as feminine' (Goodman 1994, p. 6). In this perspective the salon society did not belong to the old regime absolutist public sphere but had a fundamental role in shaping a 'discursive space' opened to public and political criticism. Between 1750 and 1775 women were essential in the government of such society because they kept within the limits of civility and politeness the tensions which necessarily arose from the free confrontations of opinions and the competitions for intellectual leadership: 'Enlightenment salons were places where male egos were brought into harmony through the agency of female selflessness' (p. 104).

According to Goodman (1994, p. 280), it is during the 1770s that women began to be excluded from the new public sphere. On the one hand, the harmony of Republic of Letters was then destroyed by a series of ferocious discords starting with controversies about Physiocracy. On the other hand, new forms of association (among them, literary societies called lycées or musées and masonic lodges) either excluded women or gave them a subordinate position. The return to 'masculine self-governance' prepared women's expulsion from the revolutionary political space: 'When the literary public sphere was transformed into the political public sphere in 1789, it had already become masculine; the 'democratic' republic of 1792 would reflect the limitations and exclusions of the Republic of Letters of the 1780s.'

It is possible to discuss such an interpretation. The Freemasonry did not ignore women's presence and gave them an important role in the 'lodges of adoption.' In these lodges many women were involved in the new values coined by the late Enlightenment: the philanthropic activities, the interest for political issues, the friendship between men and women (Burke and Jacob 1996, pp. 513–49). Besides that, it is clear that even between 1750 and 1775, the salon society was always very minority and limited to a restricted number of participants. They cannot be considered as the center of the Republic of Letters.

The collective construction of the new public sphere cannot be reduced either to a unique process or to a sole place. It arose from the intertwining between conceptual novelties and social practices, the alliance between speech and print, and the common (but dissimilar) participation of men and women.

See also: Absolutism, History of; Civil Society, Concept and History of; Enlightenment; Intellectual History; Kant, Immanuel (1724–1804); Public Sphere: Nineteenth- and Twentieth-century History; Space and Social Theory in Geography

Bibliography

- Baker K M 1990 Inventing the French Revolution: Essays on French Political Culture in the Eighteenth Century. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Burke J M, Jacob M C 1996 French freemasonry, women, and feminist scholarship. Journal of Modern History 68(3): 513–49
- Chartier R 1991 The Cultural Origins of the French Revolution. Duke University Press, Durham and London
- Crow T E 1985 Painters and Public Life in Eighteenth-century Paris. Yale University Press, New Haven and London
- Darnton R 1991 Édition et sédition. L'univers de la littérature clandestine au XVIIIe siècle. Gallimard, Paris
- Darnton R 1995 The Forbidden Best-sellers of Pre-revolutionary France. Norton, New York
- Farge A 1994 Subversive Words: Public Opinion in Eighteenth-century France. Polity Press, Cambridge, MA
- Goldgar A 1995 Impolite Learning: Conduct and Community in the Republic of Letters 1680–1750. Yale University Press, New Haven
- Goodman D 1994 The Republic of Letters: A Cultural History of the French Enlightenment. Cornell University Press, Ithaca
- Habermas J 1962 Strukturwandel der Öffentlichkeit. Untersuchungen zu einer Kategorie der bürgerlichen Gesellschaft. Luchterhand, Neuwied (English trans 1989 The Structural Transformation of the Public Sphere: An Inquiry into a Category of Bourgeois Society. Polity Press, Cambridge, MA)
- Kant E I 1795 Foundations of the Metaphysics of Morals and What Is Enlightenment (1784). Bobbs-Merrill, Indianapolis
- Landes J B 1988 Women and the Public Sphere in the Age of the French Revolution. Cornell University Press, Ithaca
- Maza S 1993 Private Lives and Public Affairs: The Causes Célèbres of Prerevolutionary France. University of California Press, Berkeley, CA
- Ozouf M 1989 L'homme régénéré. Essais sur la Révolution française. Gallimard, Paris
- Roche D 1988 Les Républicains des Lettres. Gens de culture et Lumières au XVIIIe siècle. Fayard, Paris

R. Chartier

Public Sphere: Nineteenth- and Twentieth-century History

The closely related concepts of public sphere and public space are rooted in ancient Greek distinctions of public and private and developed in early modern Europe through changing ideas of citizenship, civil society, and republican virtue (see Civil Society/Public Sphere, History of the Concept). They refer first and foremost to settings for political discussion among citizens about the order of their lives together, and secondarily to a much wider range of public culture including art, literature, and popular discourse on a host of subjects.

1. Publicness as a Modern Concern

New ideas about public discourse were complemented by development of new communications media, especially those dependent on print; rising literacy and education levels; growth of the state; and expansion of popular political participation. In this process, the distinction of public and private took on new importance and complexity. On the one hand, the realm of public interaction expanded; cities were the primary setting for this, especially cosmopolitan trading and capital cities. Public spaces appeared literally with coffee houses, parks, theaters, and other places where people who were not bound by private relations gathered and communicated. They also grew metaphorically with printed sermons, pamphlets, newspapers, books in vernacular languages, journals that reviewed them, and other media of public communication. On the other hand, the state also expanded and with it the range of res publica, public things which included property held in common and matters of concern to the whole polity. Publicness took on a dual sense, referring both to openness of access and interaction and to collective affairs as managed by the state. The public referred both to the collective subject of democracy—the people organized as a discursive and decision-making public—and as its object—the public good.

The two dimensions were linked in the notion that political debate among responsible citizens was a way to arrive at sound understanding of common affairs. This depended on notions of participation in debate that developed in the realms of science and religion (Ezrahi 1990, Zaret 1999) and literature (Habermas 1962, Hohendahl 1982) as well as politics. Processes of rational-critical debate were held to form educated public opinion as distinct from other forms such as the 'representative publicity' of monarchs appearing before their subjects or the 'mere opinion' of uneducated masses. Interest in such public opinion grew alongside civil society as a self-organizing realm of social relations, and especially with the rise of democracy.

Complementing the growth of the public realm were new senses of the private. The 'privacy' of the family was more sharply affirmed. Women and children were increasingly sequestered in private homes, especially among the bourgeoisie; the modern idea of the individual included the notion of nurturance and maturation in private as preparation for action in public, but this applied in the first instance to men. At the same time, economic activity was increasingly moved out of the household. In one sense, then, going to work meant going out into public, being exposed to the public gaze. In another sense, however, property relations continued to be understood as private in the sense that they were to be managed by individual persons and not the state. The eventual rise of business corporations further complicated the distinction, since these held property as artificial private persons but operated as collective, public actors, especially when shares of ownership were openly available on the market rather than closely held within families.

As the example of corporations and private property suggests, the distinction of public and private was sometimes difficult to sustain. This undermined the classical notion of the public sphere: 'The model of the bourgeois public sphere presupposed strict separation of the public from the private realm in such a way that the public sphere, made up of private people gathered together as a public and articulating the needs of society with the state, was itself considered part of the private realm' (Habermas 1962, pp. 175–6). As corporations became public actors while still claiming the status of private property, states began to intervene ever more into civil society and even intimate life. These trends joined with the rise of mass media, and especially professions and institutions devoted to the manipulation of public opinion through mass media (advertising, public relations) to undermine the conditions for the effective operation of the public sphere as a source for educated public opinion.

2. History as Decline

For many later analysts, the eighteenth century was a sort of 'golden age' of modern public life (see Public Sphere: Eighteenth-century History). Hannah Arendt (1958) theorized 'public' in terms of creative action, the making of a world shared among citizens, and saw the founding of the USA as a crucial example. Jürgen Habermas (1962) idealized eighteenth century English parliamentarianism, newspapers, and coffee house conversation. He presented the public sphere as a realm of civil society in which private citizens could communicate openly about matters of public concern, transcending their particular statuses and addressing the state without becoming part of it. Others have focused on Parisian clubs in the Revolution of 1789 (Amann 1975) or the literary journalism of the German Enlightenment (Hohendahl 1982).

Idealization of the eighteenth and sometimes the early nineteenth century public sphere underwrites explicit or implicit narratives of decline. In Habermas's classic Structural Transformation of the Public Sphere, for example, nineteenth and twentieth century public discourse is analyzed in terms of the loss of rational-critical capacity attendant on expansion of scale and the rise of public relations management that incorporated the public into the realm of administered society (see also Horkheimer and Adorno 1944). Such accounts reveal that the notion of public is not only basic to democracy, but linked to an apparent contradiction in democratic ideals. At least in its most prominent modern, liberal forms, democracy seems to promise both a politics based on reason rather than power, and the inclusion of all adults in the political process. The latter, the classic accounts of the public sphere suggest, undermines the former. The nineteenth and twentieth century history of democratic politics is taken to demonstrate this. Public opinion is increasingly 'managed' on the basis of research and manipulation rather than developed in open, rational-critical discourse.

Already in the nineteenth century itself, political theory of many persuasions emphasized the fragility and limitations of the liberal democratic conception of the public. Tocqueville, most famously, argued as early as the 1830s that the democratization of society tended to eliminate the intermediary public bodies which had traditionally refined opinion and furnished the individual a collective social identity outside the state. Engaged, politicized publics composed of distinct views and interests could be reshaped over time into mass publics—passive, conformist, and atomized before the state. Tocqueville's fear of the unmediated state would resonate with generations of critics of mass society.

Central to the analyses of historical decline in the public sphere is the idea that as its scope expanded, it was unable to sustain a high level of rational-critical debate. This happened with the rise of various sorts of opinion managers, from pollsters to public relations specialists, and with the institutionalization of political parties as products of negotiations among interest groups rather than arenas for debate about the public good in general. A key phase in this, accordingly to the critics, was the institutionalization of class politics during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Habermas treated this in terms of negotiation among interests, as distinct from reasoned debate about the public good. Negt and Kluge ([1964] 1993), however, famously emphasized the existence of a proletarian public sphere, rooted in distinctive experiences, and productive of reasoned internal discourse. Indeed, the German Social Democratic Party, like successful workers organizations elsewhere, created a parallel public sphere to that dominated by the bourgeoisie (Eley 1992, see also Katznelson and Zolberg 1987). This faltered principally because of a nationalization of popular politics, not class politics per se (Mosse 1975, 1987). Such nationalization was often accompanied by mass spectacle and reliance on mass media. Both did frequently collapse the distinction of public and private, especially in emotive appeals to national unity. Equally important was the rise of two-party electoral systems. Rather than being able to participate actively in public life, late twentieth century citizens of democratic societies were reduced to being invited to respond to plebiscites (Lowi 1985, Ginsburg 1986).

Historical research on the public sphere has questioned both the accuracy of the late eighteenth century ideal and the narrative of subsequent decline. Schudson (1998), for example, has argued that active participation of citizens in public discourse and politics has ebbed and flowed without linear trend. The ideal of the good citizen as an active participant in the public sphere has long been contrasted with the failings of actual citizens. A substantial line of research on 'civic culture' shifted the emphasis away from the problematic of public debate and towards a more general idea of participation and incorporation into civic life, for example, in voluntary associations (see, in particular, Almond and Verba 1966 and critical analysis in Somers 1993, 1995). This, most researchers argued, grew through the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. More recently, however, critics of late twentieth and early twenty-first century democracies have emphasized a decline in civic participation (e.g., Putnam 2000).

3. Participation and Exclusion

Although openness was basic to the ideology and theory of the public sphere, various forms of exclusion were basic to actually existing publics in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Women, for example, had been prominent in late eighteenth century salon society and elite public spheres, but were widely excluded from nineteenth and twentieth century public space; this was mirrored by a commensurate bias in political thought (Landes 1988, Elshtain 1993). Feminist struggles made gender a basic political issue in new ways (Ryan 1990, 1992). In addition, women were prominent in other movements, such as abolitionism in the USA, and may have figured less in subsequent historical accounts than in actual nineteenth century social movements. This may be partly because of different styles of address in the public sphere, including a greater emphasis on narrative and less on argumentation (Lara 1999). Similarly, Blacks were largely excluded from the US public sphere, even after abolition. This encouraged a similar duality: struggles for inclusion and development of parallel public discourse marked by distinctive communicative styles (Diawara 1995).

This has occasioned more general inquiry into 'counterpublics' which contest the apparently neutral dominance of more mainstream publics (Fraser 1992, Warner 2001). This argument is rooted in Negt and Kluge's ([1964] 1993) account of the proletarian public sphere. Members of religious communities, ethnic groups, and the women's movement have been among the many who have constructed counterpublics. During the classic heyday of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth century British public sphere, thus, many artisans and workers were denied participation in the public sphere. They were not simply and unambivalently members of a proletarian public sphere, though they did develop their own media and organizations and to some extent constitute a counterpublic (Gilmartin 1999). They claimed the right to participate in the dominant, unmarked public sphere and challenged those who introduced restrictive measures to make it a specifically 'bourgeois' (or more generally, propertied) public sphere (Jones 1983). The same people who excluded those with less wealth from the public sphere nonetheless claimed it in unmarked form as simply the British public.

Accounts of the public sphere by both contemporaries and historians have been tacitly linked to the idea of nation, since nation defined the range of citizens entitled to participate in public affairs and the basis for legitimacy of modern, especially democratic, states (Calhoun 1997). In liberalism's triumphant early phase, experiments in republicanism and constitutionalism placed these issues squarely on the table. They asked how new political structures were to acquire legitimacy and how, within those structures, the plurality of opinion was to be represented. Defenses of free speech and the press, too, signaled an appreciation of the importance of venues in which views could be widely and, in principle, freely circulated. At the same time, the rhetoric of nationalism typically presented the nation not as creature of public discourse but as pre-existing unity, commonly on ethnic or cultural grounds. This is true even, if ironically, in the USA, the nation quintessentially created through the public action of its citizens. A tension running through American history has pitted the capacity for creation of a new political order exemplified by the founders against claims that the defining national essence is already in place and needs only defense from the loyal.

Notions of a vital republican public sphere have been influential especially in American historical studies, visible in the work of J. G. A. Pocock, Bernard Bailyn, Gordon Wood, and more recently, Michael Warner. Here the focus, in Hannah Arendt's terms, is on the capacity of action in public not only to define individual identity but to create the world citizens share in common. Republicanism, implied several things: (a) a concerted effort to reach agreement about the public good, as distinct from the attempt to find the net balance of private, individual goods—the essence of utilitarianism; (b) a sense of politics as a work in progress regarding the appropriate structures and limits of the political, as opposed to a hallowed set of procedures for achieving particular ends—such as the cult of the constitution; and (c) a belief that individuality and identity are only fully expressed and enjoyed through engagement in public life, rather than constituted beforehand in the private realm. These writers emphasize the ephemeral nature of republicanism and the rapid emergence in the nineteenth century of a variously liberal, national and representative (rather than participatory) model of the public sphere. In American Studies, as in Frankfurt School critical theory, this decline is commonly associated with the rise of mass culture—and the blurring of divisions between reasoned political discourse and other social processes of opinion formation.

4. Cities and Media

Transformations of public life were also shaped by the ways in which communications media and the physical public spaces of cities changed through the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Richard Sennett (1977) The Fall of Public Man, for example, contrasts a vibrant and highly varied eighteenth and nineteenth century urban life (especially among the bourgeoisie) to a reduction in both the occasions for interaction across lines of difference and the psychological ability to manage open relations with strangers well. Citizens retreated, Sennett suggests, into both privacy and the conformity of mass culture.

Urban public spaces anchor face-to-face interaction, which was basic to the classical image of the public sphere, conceived of largely in terms of direct interaction. This is important for a sense of serendipitous contact among people of diverse backgrounds. Parks, cafes, and theaters all inform this. Many of Europe's cities, especially older ones, were distinctive in their pedestrian character and their scale. From the mid-nineteenth century, however, this began to shift. Hausmann's post-1848 construction of the Paris boulevards and destruction of some of the local quartiers is taken as emblematic (e.g., by Harvey 1985). Both suburbanization and less pedestrian-friendly, larger-scale designs for newer cities have changed the character of public interaction in Europe, largely in ways familiar earlier in the US. Commentators throughout the nineteenth and twentieth centuries have been concerned for the implications of this for democracy. As Mumford (1938, p. 483) wrote, 'One of the difficulties in the way of political association is that we have not provided it with the necessary physical organs of existence: we have failed to provide the necessary sites, the necessary buildings, the necessary halls, rooms, meeting places ...'

This has been linked to a huge increase in scale. One crucial result is that directly interpersonal relations organize proportionately less of public life; mediations of various kinds have become increasingly important (Calhoun 1988, Garnham 1992, Keane 1991, Thompson 1995). This is partly a matter of communications media per se; it is also a matter of growing importance for bureaucracies and other formal organizations. The eighteenth and early nineteenth century public sphere was closely tied to the spread of print media. The nineteenth and early twentieth centuries were the heyday of great urban newspapers; after this, media that transcended locality became increasingly important. First radio and then television fundamentally altered the public sphere. They contributed to a shift in what was publicly visible as well as in how public discourse was organized (Meyrowitz 1985, Thompson 1995). New media shared both information and emotionally powerful images widely. Broadcast media are often charged with furthering the debasement of reason by substituting powerful images for sustained analysis, by appealing to a lowest common denominator in audiences, by blurring the lines between entertainment and critical discourse, and by centralizing control over messages in the hands of a few corporations. Some caution is in order about generalizations from medium, though, as newspapers produced their own mass forms, with broadly similar if perhaps less extreme effects.

Crucially, the changes in scale and media forms of the twentieth century challenge the classical eighteenth century model of the public sphere, which was grounded in readership on the one hand and directly interpersonal discourse on the other. Any account of contemporary public life must deal with a dramatic increase in indirect, mediated relationships. Transformations of media continue, of course, and the implications of the Internet and computer-mediated communication are important topics of contemporary investigation (Rasmussen 2000). Relatedly, the dominant approaches to the public sphere have emphasized domestic politics within nation-states. Especially during the last years of the twentieth century, however, communications media and the rise of transnational organizations have facilitated growth of an international public sphere (Thompson 1995, Held 1995, Calhoun 2002). To what extent transnational public opinion can steer global society directly, and to what extent only through the agency of state structures, remains a crucial question.

Finally, though this article concentrates on the public sphere in Western European and American history, it is important to note that the nineteenth and twentieth century also saw dramatic and transformative growth in public discourses elsewhere. In late Imperial and early Republican China, for example, the category of 'public' became influential and both directly interpersonal and mediated public spheres were created (Wakeman 1993, Rankin 1993). This was basic to development of the idea of citizen, as distinct from subject, to constitution of notions of public welfare, and to cultural transformations such as the introduction of new vernacular writing. It also contributed to the growth of both nationalist and class politics in the twentieth century. Further transformations followed, attendant on changes in media, politics, and culture, and creating important linkages within the Chinese diaspora as well as with the West.

An unusually vital print-mediated public sphere developed in India. The early history of this is closely interwoven with the history of British colonialism and opposition to it. The history of Indian public life has been an important setting for examining the role of both international power relations and issues of domestic diversity. Not least, questions like the claims of nonreaders in a public sphere dominated by print media have surfaced and shaped not only Indian but international discussions. Broadcast media have played an important role recently in the constitution of a new Hindu nationalism (Rajogopal 2001). In many settings, including in the European countries and the USA as well as both India and China, the development of a public sphere has been closely related to the development of national consciousness, identity, and political contestation.

5. Conclusion

Growth and transformation of public spheres has been a major theme in nineteenth and twentieth century history. It is crucial to the history of democratic politics, including not only electoral and parliamentary regimes, but also broader struggles in civil society and beyond national borders. A dominant historical theme is the inclusion of a broader range of participants in public discourse. This has been coupled with analyses of the implications of growing scale, including mismatch between local—especially urban—public spaces and enlarged range of potential participants, dynamics of inclusion and exclusion, and changing roles of media. A prominent line of analysis suggests a concomitant decline in the rational-critical capacity of public discourse. This is challenged by both research on the limits of earlier public spheres and the strengths of later counter-publics. The importance of the public sphere is in any case not limited to argumentation but includes also the formation and spread of culture, as in the development of national identity.

See also: Civic Culture; Civil Society, Concept and History of; Civil Society/Public Sphere, History of the Concept; Communication and Democracy; Mass Society: History of the Concept; Media, Uses of; Participation: Political; Policy History: State and Economy; Political Communication; Political Discourse; Privacy: Legal Aspects; Public Sphere and the Media; Public Sphere: Eighteenth-century History; State and Society

Bibliography

- Almond G, Verba S 1966 The Civic Culture
Amann P 1975 Revolution and Mass Democracy: The Paris Club Movement in 1848. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
Arendt H 1958 The Human Condition. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
Bellah R 1985 Habits of the Heart: Individualism and Commitment in American Life. University of California Press, Berkeley, CA
Calhoun C 1988 Populist politics, communications media, and large scale social integration. Sociological Theory 6(2): 219–41
Calhoun C 1997 Nationalism and the public sphere. In: Weintraub J, Kumar K (eds.) Public and Private in Thought and Practice. University of Chicago Press, Chicago, pp. 75–102
Calhoun C 2002 Constitutional patriotism and the public sphere: Interests, identity, and solidarity in the integration of Europe. In: DeGreiff P, Cronin C (eds.) Transnational Politics. MIT Press, Cambridge, MA
Diawara M (ed.) 1995 The Black Public Sphere. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
Eley G 1992 Nations, publics and political cultures: Placing Habermas in the nineteenth century. In: Calhoun C (ed.) Habermas and the Public Sphere. MIT Press, Cambridge, MA, pp. 289–339
Elshtain J B 1993 Private Man, Public Woman, rev. edn. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ

- Fraser N 1992 Rethinking the public sphere: A contribution to the critique of actually existing democracy. In: Calhoun C (ed.) Habermas and the Public Sphere. MIT Press, Cambridge, MA, pp. 109–42
- Garnham N 1992 The media and the public sphere. In: Calhoun C (ed.) Habermas and the Public Sphere. MIT Press, Cambridge, MA
- Gilmartin K 1999 Print Politics: The Press and Radical Opposition in Early Nineteenth-Century England. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Ginsburg B 1986 The Captive Public: How Mass Opinion Promotes State Power
- Habermas J 1984 1988 Theory of Communicative Action. Beacon Press, Boston, Vols. 1 and 2
- Habermas J 1991 The Structural Transformation of the Bourgeois Public Sphere: An Inquiry into a Category of Bourgeois Society [trans. Burger T]. MIT Press, Cambridge, MA
- Harvey D 1985 Consciousness and the Urban Experience. Johns Hopkins University Press, Baltimore, MD
- Held D 1995 Democracy and the Global Order. Polity, Cambridge, UK
- Hohendahl P U 1982 The Institution of Criticism. Cornell University Press, Ithaca, NY
- Horkheimer M, Adorno T 1944 Dialectic of Enlightenment. Continuum, New York
- Jones G S 1983 Languages of Class: Studies in English Working Class History, 1832–1982. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Katznelson I, Zolberg A (eds.) 1987 Working-Class Formation: Nineteenth-Century Patterns in Western Europe and the United States. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Keane J 1991 The Media and Democracy. Polity, Cambridge, UK
- Landes J 1988 Women and the Public Sphere in the Age of the French Revolution. Cornell University Press, Ithaca, NY
- Lara M P 1999 Moral Textures: Feminist Narratives in the Public Sphere. University of California Press, Berkeley, CA
- Lowi T 1985 The Personal President. Cornell University Press, Ithaca, NY
- Meyrowitz J 1985 No Sense of Place. Oxford University Press, New York
- Mosse G L 1975 The Nationalization of the Masses. Cornell University Press, Ithaca, NY
- Mosse G L 1987 Masses and Man: Nationalist and Fascist Perceptions of Reality. Wayne State University Press, Detroit, MI
- Mumford L 1938 The Culture of Cities. Secker and Warburg, London
- Negt O, Kluge A [1964] 1993 The Public Sphere and Experience. University of Minnesota Press, Minneapolis, MN
- Putnam R 2000 Bowling Alone: The Collapse and Revival of American Community. Simon and Schuster, New York
- Rajogopal A 2001 Politics after Television: Religious Nationalism and the Reshaping of the Indian Public. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Rankin M 1993 Some observations on a Chinese public sphere. Modern China 19(2): 158–82
- Rasmussen T 2000 Social Theory and Communication Technology. Ashgate, London
- Ryan M 1990 Women in Public: Between Banners and Ballots, 1825–1880. Johns Hopkins University Press, Baltimore, MD
- Schudson M 1998 The Good Citizen. A History of American Civic Life. Free Press, New York
- Sennet R 1977 The Fall of Public Man. Knopf, New York
- Somers M 1993 Citizenship and the place of the public sphere: Law, community, and political culture in the transition to democracy. American Sociological Review 58: 587–620
- Somers M 1995 What's political or cultural about political culture and the public sphere? Toward an historical sociology of concept formation. Sociological Theory 13: 113–44
- Thompson J 1995 Media and Modernity. Stanford University Press, Stanford, CA
- Tocqueville A de [1840] 1844 Democracy in America. Scribners, New York
- Wakeman F 1993 The civil society and public sphere debate: Western reflections on Chinese political culture. Modern China 19(2): 102–38
- Warner M 2001 Publics and Counterpublics. Zone Books, Cambridge, MA
- Yeo E J 1998 Radical Femininity: Women's Self-Representation in the Public Sphere. Manchester University Press, Manchester, UK
- Zaret D 1999 Origins of Democratic Culture. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ

C. Calhoun

Publishing as Medium

Publishing, in its most general sense, refers to the act of making a work of words or images known to the public. Book publishing encompasses a range of activities through which an author's manuscript is turned into a printed and bound book which can be made available to an audience of readers. These activities are carried out by networks of organizations and individuals who coordinate production, and the promotion and distribution of books to their potential publics.

1. History and Description

In the ancient world, there were a variety of ways in which the reproduction and circulation of texts occurred. Evidence from China, India, Greece, and Rome suggests that publishing was carried out under the auspices of religious, political, and commercial bodies; in some places, individuals copied and traded books among themselves. During the Middle Ages, publishing in Europe was centered in the monasteries where manuscripts were reproduced primarily for religious purposes. Following the twelfth century, scribes associated with European universities took over this task, serving the clergy as well as selling books to new readers among officials, the nobility, professionals, and merchants. But with the appearance of the printing press in 1450, book publishing and bookselling became organized into an industry, its members striving to sell books for profit to a growing and increasingly far-flung audience.

Before the seventeenth century in Europe, and the nineteenth century in North America, the book trade tended to remain undifferentiated and unstandardized. While conditions varied in different regions, the functions of publisher, printer, and bookseller were often melded into a single individual who printed and sold books at the request (and payment) of authors. Nevertheless, the trade in books would rarely have been enough to support the printer who often published a newspaper as well as books, and who derived a large portion of his income from printing bills, stationery, and other jobs. As the market for books grew, a more complex division of labor gradually emerged, with different segments of the industry responsible for publishing, printing, and selling. Along with this, many publishers and booksellers began to specialize in specific types of books, such as texts or medical works.

Within the modern book industry, the publisher is central to the entire process of getting books from author to reader. Publishing firms select, edit, and prepare manuscripts for production, and also assume the financial risks involved in bringing a book into print. It is the publisher who interacts and contracts with the author (or the author's representative, the agent), and it is also usually the publisher who determines a sales strategy and how a book will be marketed. Following the pattern of other industries, a separate wholesaling sector has taken over from publishers some of the functions of warehousing and filling orders. A more differentiated retail sector has also developed, as books are sold through both exclusive bookstores and retailers whose primary business is not in books, through educational, employment, and voluntary organizations, and through mail order and electronic venues.

Since the early twentieth century, the publishing industry has been characterized by a degree of specialization that corresponds in large part to the market for particular kinds of books as well as to channel of distribution. The most visible form of publishing is in trade books, those titles directed at a general audience. However, both textbooks and professional titles compose a significant part of the overall book market, and in many developing countries textbooks make up the single largest segment. Other important segments include scholarly and religious books. As these various divisions between book sectors developed during the twentieth century, different organizational and sales practices also appeared within their corresponding publishing houses. These divisions now appear to be breaking down as merger activity has brought together dissimilar publishing houses under a single roof.

2. Publishing as a Field for Analysis

The world of book publishing has been viewed in rather contradictory ways: as a rarefied environment of literary connoisseurs, and as a profane site where expression is reduced to a commodity; as an industrial backwater, and as a central player in the spread of capitalism. Perhaps these contrasting images are related to the way in which publishing, as a field for analysis, belongs to no single group. Those who work in the industry, journalists, and scholars from several disciplines have all been influential in shaping ideas about publishing's significance.

2.1 Historical Perspectives

Befitting lives spent among writers and books, numerous publishers, both prominent and obscure, have penned reminiscences of their activities. To some degree, this set the tone for accounts of the book business since the nineteenth century. Many such accounts are really more histories of publishers than of publishing, describing the rise and fall of various publishing houses and the personalities who directed them.

A different kind of scholarship emerged with the tradition known as 'the history of the book,' which many date to the publication of Febvre and Martin's (1958) L'Apparition du Livre. Febvre, who was a prominent member of the Annales school, and his co-author described the early publishing and bookselling scene in Europe, while also attempting to account for the book's impact on the spread of various ideas and cultural movements. For some, such as Darnton (1982), the field of research that has evolved since Febvre and Martin's book is equivalent to the social and cultural history of print communication. In this view, the object is to understand the role books have played in society at various times and in various places, and to understand how books have interacted with other social developments and processes. Darnton's proposal is also methodological in nature, suggesting that the book be studied in terms of a communication circuit that runs from author to publisher to printer to shipper to bookseller and finally, to reader.

Although the program outlined by Darnton has been influential among book historians, other historians have taken a different approach by emphasizing the history of printing and the subject of bibliography, that is, the study of books as physical objects. Bibliography is concerned with describing books and identifying their attributes, such as paper, type, and bindings, so as to be able to distinguish different editions or printings. This kind of examination can also be used to provide information about particular publishers and manufacturers, or about authorial intention (see, for example, McKenzie 1986). Frequently, the underlying purpose of such studies also differs from that emphasized by the history of the book. The intent is to make the book itself the central focus of attention rather than using the book as a means for discovering other social patterns.

2.2 Social Science Perspectives

While historians have long recognized the book as an important area of study, social science research on book publishing has been intermittent and surprisingly sparse considering social scientists' interest in other forms of mass media. Instead, some of the most detailed descriptions and critiques of publishing have been written by people directly associated with the publishing industry. Of course, books and book publishing tend to be central to the academic's work, and so, despite the relative lack of empirical research, have not escaped academic scrutiny altogether. The state of the publishing world is taken to be a matter of public concern, and scholars and other public intellectuals frequently address a general audience when discussing the significance of developments in publishing for print culture. Throughout the twentieth century, such discussions have often reflected the assumptions of mass culture theory. Commentators question whether publishing practices that cater to a mass market leave room for the quality books that sell in moderate numbers, and whether increasing commercialism and centralization will bring about a standardization of the available literary fare (see, for example, Dutscher 1954).

As this suggests, the curiosity of publishing tends to lie in its dual nature as a commercial enterprise on the one hand, and as a producer of literary objects associated with artistic, educational, and religious values on the other. Indeed, the perceived difficulty of reconciling these two dimensions of publishing—often described as the conflict between culture and commerce—is probably the central problem analysts of the book industry have confronted.

Beginning with work by Escarpit (1958), a relatively small group of sociologists has tried to dissect the workings of the publishing industry. These studies draw on organizational theory (sometimes called the production of culture perspective) which, especially during the 1970s and 1980s, was being applied to various media firms and industries. This perspective begins with the assumption that publishers are similar to other kinds of bureaucratic organizations, facing the same problems of how to reduce uncertainty and risk (Hirsch 1972). Scholars in this tradition have provided specific accounts of how books are acquired and distributed, and how publishing strategies vary according to size and type of firm. Common to much of this work is a stress on the gatekeeping role that publishers play, meaning the ability to determine what ideas and literary forms will make it into print and thus be able to enter the marketplace of ideas.

Congruent with trends in mass media and popular culture studies, more recent researchers have reacted against theories of mass culture and hegemony which posit audiences as easily manipulated and degraded by mass marketed literature. In this view, scholarship needs to grant the reader a more privileged place in analyses of publishing, in terms of both acknowledging the reader's active role in choosing and finding meaning in reading material, and in understanding how conceptions of the audience shape the work of book professionals. Moreover, this theoretical stance questions the very distinction between popular and quality books. Instead, some suggest that the fear of commercialism has been primarily a cover for the discomfort of cultural elites who see their authority over cultural matters challenged (Long 1985–86, Radway 1997). Similarly, it has been argued that publishers play an important role in the production of literary value (Verdaasdonk and van Rees 1991).

3. Themes in Publishing Research

Changes occurring within the publishing industry during the last few decades of the twentieth century shaped many of the questions posed in publishing research. Renewed interest in publishing has been concurrent with its integration into large, multinational, entertainment conglomerates. Researchers have been especially attentive to the consequences of concentration, the significance of publishing as a global phenomenon, and the convergence between books and other entertainment and information media.

3.1 The Dynamics of Concentration

The American situation perhaps best illustrates certain trends in the industry. During the post-World War II era, most major New York publishing houses were transformed from private or family-owned companies into public corporations. Various social changes contributed to this development. With the post-War education boom, many publishers desired to meet a new demand for printed matter by expanding their existing educational divisions or founding new ones. This coincided with the aging of heads of publishing houses who wished to protect their heirs from inheritance taxes. Issuing public stock appeared to be an attractive proposition, a way to both raise capital and guarantee the long-term future of the firm.

Along with the move towards corporatization, publishing houses became favored acquisition targets by electronics firms in the 1960s. Although these buyers later divested their publishing properties, merger and acquisition activity was renewed in the mid-1970s. These years saw the formation of conglomerates with holdings in film, broadcasting, music, newspapers, and magazine publishing as well as books. Book publishers would not add much in terms of revenues, but entertainment conglomerates hoped that book content could be reproduced across a variety of media, and cross-promotional strategies could be employed. Similar waves of merger and acquisition activity were seen in the next two decades. By this time, foreign-owned companies were often doing the acquiring, including media giants such as Bertelsmann, News Corporation, and Pearson. The result has been the consolidation of the nation's largest publishers into a handful of companies which also include American-owned Viacom, AOL Time Warner, and Disney. Concentration at the level of distribution happened somewhat later. While chain booksellers began to grow in the 1960s with the establishment of standardized outlets in shopping malls, their decisive dominance of the bookstore market did not occur until the 1990s with the appearance of the superstore.

The effects of concentration have been a constant source of debate. Along with longstanding concerns about declining quality and the homogenization of reading material, these developments raise questions about changes in the organizational culture of the book business. Attempts to rationalize the publishing process, invest heavily in promotion, and exploit new markets have altered the balance of power within the industry, diminishing the autonomy of editors while giving increased clout to accounting, marketing, and subsidiary rights divisions. At the same time, publishers have grown dependent on a few large bookseller customers who subsequently play a more authoritative role in the industry.

Complicating the issue of concentration is that while a declining number of publishers account for a large share of book sales, the absolute number of publishers, along with titles published, has steadily risen. Some argue that these various trends result in much diversity at the margins of the industry, and a less elitist conception of books and publishing at the center. For others, the concentration of control of the book business means that a small number of for-profit companies have undue power over what individuals can and will read.

3.2 Globalization and National Identities

The role that the circulation of books plays in maintaining or undermining specific identities has long been an important theme in publishing research. The relatively new concept of globalization is readily applied to the publishing industry. On the one hand, trends in ownership mean that multinational companies with far-flung holdings are now common among the major players. But the integration of international markets is the primary way in which publishing can be conceived as a global phenomenon. The selling of rights to publish or distribute books in foreign territories has become one of the most important sources of revenue for major publishers. The trade in books goes in many directions, but disproportionately travels from Europe and especially the USA to the rest of the world.

This raises both theoretical and policy questions about national sovereignty and the maintenance of national identities. In Canada, for instance, the overwhelming presence of first British and then American books has hampered the growth of a national publishing industry. While government policy has helped to preserve Canadian-controlled firms, foreign-controlled publishers in Canada remain more profitable. Also, many Canadian publishers can survive only because they have the exclusive right to sell American books, the popularity of which is attested to by their dominance of best-seller lists in the English-language market. Even in Quebec, where French publishers play a strong role, American translations are plentiful. Many argue that this situation has helped to further Americanize Canadian culture, diffusing American tastes, styles, and values through the medium of popular books.

Economic agreements between nations to eliminate free trade barriers have in the past often excluded cultural products, with books in particular singled out for exception. There are significant obstacles to maintaining a viable publishing industry in less developed countries, and as the Canadian situation demonstrates, even highly developed nations find it difficult to make the economics of publishing work without protective measures. With the USA and the European Commission trying to eliminate the cultural exception in trade negotiations, these issues will probably move more to the forefront of publishing research.

3.3 Unyoking Content from Print

The international trade in books has been greatly dependent on the state of copyright law, and a significant body of research has examined how copyright and its breach have affected the publishing industry. However, the development of new technologies along with publishing's integration into entertainment conglomerates have raised new issues concerning the control of literary property. Content is now easily transportable across media, and entertainment firms attempt to create synergies, as it has been termed, between book, film, television, music, magazine, and electronic divisions. This introduces a new level of instability into the publishing process. On the one hand, traditional arrangements for the control of intellectual property are challenged when content is so mobile, with publishers and authors in conflict over who will own the new forms that emerge. On the other hand, new technologies, including electronic books and on-demand publishing, where single copies are printed as needed, are utilized by distributors, authors, and software companies as well as publishers. Such developments suggest that what it means to engage in publishing may be more difficult to define in the future.

See also: Audiences; Internet: Psychological Perspectives; Literacy and Illiteracy, History of; Literacy and Orality; Literary Texts: Comprehension and Memory; Mass Communication: Empirical Research; Mass Communication: Normative Frameworks; Mass Communication: Technology; Mass Media: Introduction and Schools of Thought; Mass Media, Political Economy of; Textbooks

Bibliography

- Altbach P G, Hoshino E S (eds.) 1995 International Book Publishing: an Encyclopedia. Garland Publishing, New York
- Coser L A, Kadushin C, Powell W W 1982 Books: the Culture and Commerce of Publishing. Basic Books, New York
- Darnton R 1982 What is the history of books? Daedalus 111: 65–83
- Dutscher A 1954 The book business in America. Contemporary Issues 5: 38–58
- Escarpit R 1958 Sociologie de la Litterature. Presses Universitaires de France, Paris [1971 Sociology of Literature. Frank Cass, London]
- Febvre L P V, Martin H-J 1958 L'Apparition du Livre. Éditions Albin Michel, Paris [1990 The Coming of the Book: the Impact of Printing 1450–1800. Verso, London]
- Hirsch P M 1972 Processing fads and fashions: an organization-set analysis of cultural industry systems. American Journal of Sociology 77: 639–59
- Horowitz I L 1991 Communicating Ideas: The Politics of Scholarly Publishing, 2nd edn. Transaction, New Brunswick, NJ
- Lane M, Booth J 1980 Books and Publishers: Commerce Against Culture in Postwar Britain. Lexington Books, Lexington, MA
- Long E 1985–86 The cultural meaning of concentration in publishing. Book Research Quarterly 1: 3–27
- McKenzie D F 1986 Bibliography and the Sociology of Texts. British Library, London
- Powell W W 1985 Getting Into Print: The Decision-making Process in Scholarly Publishing. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
- Radway J A 1997 A Feeling for Books: The Book-of-the-month Club, Literary Taste, and Middle-class Desire. University of North Carolina Press, Chapel Hill, NC
- Verdaasdonk H, van Rees C J 1991 The dynamics of choice behavior towards books: the role of cultural products in cultural behavior. Poetics 20: 421–37

L. J. Miller

Punishment, Comparative Politics of

1. The Minimally Punishing Democratic State

The most striking development in twentieth-century penal politics was the emergence in the advanced democracies of the minimally punishing state. The development was striking because it occurred during one of the largest crime waves in recorded history—a tidal wave ignored by all democratic political systems for one or even several decades. The modern democratic state was able to dismiss the demand for a state response to the crime wave constituted by the annually mounting numbers of thousands, even millions of crime reports. Most democratic governments developed surprising capacities not to punish in spite of the victim's entitlement to punishment implied by penal codes. (No penal code contains a warning label to victims that the punishments it threatens will be applied at most to three percent of those arrested and one percent of those who violate its terms.) Attrition rates for criminal cases became extremely high in all democratic systems, from the apparently most punitive to the least. A decision seems to have been taken in most democracies that the state will never punish (or at least imprison) much more than 100 per 100,000 people at any time, no matter which or how many crimes are committed. It has been possible for democratic states not to enforce the criminal law on a massive scale, although enforcing the penal code against violence and predation is popular among voters.

2. The Convergence on Minimal Punishment

2.1 The Convergence

The facts of convergence on minimal punishment levels are clear. In 1940, most of the currently advanced democracies had capital punishment; by 2000, only two of them still inflicted the death penalty and only on a much reduced scale. In 1960, there were in the advanced democracies on average 11 prisoners (for all offenses) per reported robbery; in 1990, only three, and, without Japan, only one. In 1960, the range in punishment lay between New Zealand with 30 prisoners per robbery and Norway with 24, on the one hand, and the USA with only two; by 1990, the range (excluding Japan) lay between three prisoners per robbery in California and Austria, and fewer than 0.5 in Italy and The Netherlands. Between 1960 and 1990, the democratic state largely relinquished the threat of death punishment and reduced to nearly token levels the threat of prison punishment.

2.2 Elite Conversion to Leniency

The decision to ration punishment rested on what had become, by the 1960s, a gap between the lenient mentalities of political elites and the more traditionally punitive, if also ambivalent, mass public. This gap was best explained by Norbert Elias, who traced what he called 'the civilizing process'—the diffusion of anti-violence mentalities among and by the middle and upper classes since the Middle Ages, especially since the monopolization of legitimate violent punishment by the state. (Elias unfortunately did not theorize the strong decivilizing processes on full display in the twentieth century, including the decivilizing results of overcivilizing the state: Elias 1982.)

2.3 The Emergence of Penal Sentimentalism

The medieval elite–mass gap widened with the top-down spread of the ideas of the eighteenth-century Enlightenment and of nineteenth-century Romantic, liberal, and socialist movements—humanitarianism, human perfectibility, and the social responsibility for crime. Gradually created was a powerful group of aristocratic and bourgeois reformers who changed elite attitudes toward the lower classes, the poor, the disorderly, and eventually even minorities. The revision of (elite) attitudes toward the poor, the sick, the aged (as well as vagrants, drunks, addicts, juveniles) which eventually brought about the welfare state was accompanied by a closely related revision of attitudes toward criminals—which brought about the minimally punishing state. Both the poor and criminals were seen as irresponsible victims of society—to be helped, not chastened. And the penal sentimentalism of enlightened seculars soon also came to characterize the elites still faithful to Christianity but less and less faithful to traditional hard-line Pauline concepts of punishment, either in this world or the next.

2.4 Leniency in Spite of Marxian Capitalism

The growing leniency of elites in nineteenth- and twentieth-century capitalist democracies was directly contrary to Marxist predictions; indeed, Marx had to be 'turned on his head' to explain the diminution of punishment under democratic capitalism and its exasperation under communism. Ironically, one of the few serious Marxist works on penality, Rusche and Kirchheimer's Punishment and Social Structure (1968), was also one of the first and few accounts of 'the general tendency toward leniency' under capitalism; it purported to use Marxist concepts (the relationship between capitalism, labor supply, and punishment) to explain penal evolution generally, and the trend toward penal leniency, in particular. It argued grandly that 'Every system of production tends to discover punishments which correspond to its productive relationships... The use or avoidance of specific punishments, and the intensity of penal practices (are) determined by social forces, above all by economic and fiscal forces' (Rusche and Kirchheimer 1968). But to account for the trend toward leniency under capitalism, Rusche and Kirchheimer were forced to be eclectic, rather than dialectic, to explain leniency in terms only incidentally related to evolving productive relationships. They invoked instead the rising standards of living for the lower classes; a 'consequent' decline in criminality; the development of 'penal liberalism' and social insurance ('welfare statism'); declining conviction rates; and successful penal reform campaigns by bourgeois professionals. (This particular package of explanations would not, of course, explain why, a decade after World War II, when crime became rampant, crime-based punishment rates under capitalism continued to decline (Rusche and Kirchheimer 1968).)

2.5 Leniency in Spite of Social Diversification

In contrast to Marx, but with the advantage of greater hindsight, Durkheim correctly predicted (in 1902) growing leniency under democratic capitalism, but he attributed leniency to a supposed fracturing of the collective conscience due to the division of labor (Durkheim 1902/1978). Actually, social diversification has not destroyed consensus on the evils of violence and predation. The factor most pertinent to the decline of punishment, in fact, was not social and economic but political: the ability of elites (as theorized by Michels, Mosca, and other 'democratic elitist' theorists) to ignore rank and file opinion in otherwise democratic structures.

2.6 Leniency in Spite of Democratic Competition

Convergence on leniency was indeed paradoxical—given democratic competition and the persisting, even growing, crime-induced popularity of punishment among voters. The paradox is possibly explained by:

- (a) party elites' ability to manipulate electoral and political agendas, to collude in order to suppress conflict over penal policy;
- (b) the ability of the Left for decades to ignore constituent demands for security;
- (c) conservative complicity in the antipunishment project;
- (d) antipunishment bias in the ideological-group lobby and the ideology production system (ideological or advocacy groups vastly outweighed interest groups);
- (e) stratification of the media, with elite media reinforcing antipunishment ideological hegemony and rewarding elites for antipunishment action;
- (f) the ability of elites to freeze and even to reduce prison capacity during an historic crime wave;
- (g) declining detection rates (though more and more suspects were being produced by the police);

(h) the formation of a powerful international antipunishment movement enabling lenient domestic elites to invoke international norms, praise, and interventions on behalf of their domestic agendas;

(i) the ability of lenient political elites sharply to reduce prosecution and prison-sentencing rates, even in compulsory-prosecution systems and in inquisitorial justice systems, with low evidentiary barriers to conviction; and

(j) the stigmatization within elite circles of responses to demands for punishment as 'populist', or worse.

Thus penal policy has often become one of many policy areas in which public influence, especially in Europe, has often been weak—in spite of the public's interest, known preferences, and voting power.

Convergence on leniency also occurred in the advanced democracies in spite of periods of high unemployment, increasing ethnic diversity, a drugs pandemic, periods of unremitting terrorism, the flourishing of organized crime, and a sevenfold increase in serious crime (using robbery as an indicator).

3. The Differential Development of State Capacity Not to Punish

But if all democracies have become minimally punishing states, some have become less minimally punishing than others. The token-punishment state has been politically most viable in Europe and least viable in the USA. The factors behind the convergence on leniency operated with differential effect in Europe and the USA, resulting in somewhat differential state capacity not to punish. Among 90 national and subnational jurisdictions (all in advanced democracies), the strongest predictor (in cross-sectional analysis) of per capita incarceration rates is the serious crime rate (using murder or robbery rates). The USA has had higher per capita prison rates because it has had much serious crime to be punished: it is (marginally) harder not to punish in high-crime jurisdictions than in low-crime jurisdictions.

3.1 Does Party Count?

One of the best predictors of per capita prison rates, after crime, is the strength of the Left since 1960. Although its historical record for leniency in penal matters is quite checkered (Robespierre, Lenin, Stalin, Mao, Pol Pot, and Castro come to mind), the Left—at least after World War II and in the democracies—became the major political force behind the antipunishment movement. The Left became solidly against capital punishment, sympathetic to criminals, defensive of prisoner rights, and hostile to spending on prisons, especially after the myth of therapeutic prisons was shaken (but far from destroyed). Ironically, the Left was slower than the Right to heed the demands of its own constituents—the predominantly lower-class and minority victims of crime—but the Left had major stakes in trying to prove that the welfare state could replace the punitive state in preventing crime. As it became clearer in the 1970s and 1980s that criminals thrived in even the most perfected welfare states (Sweden and The Netherlands, for example), that working class voters could be even angrier about crime (especially minority crime) than conservative voters, that the crime wave denied for so long by criminologists was real, and that left-voting middle-class penal liberals were not likely to desert to the Right, the rhetoric of the Left and eventually some of its policy stands began to correspond more closely to widespread public sentiments of insecurity and ineffective justice (Tham 1999).

Moreover, in spite of the correlation between Leftism and low per capita punishment rates, the creation of the minimally punishing state has required, as noted above, the complicity of conservatives. The lowest imprisonment levels in their respective postwar state histories occurred under Reagan in California, Agnew in Maryland, and Wallace in Alabama; the lowest levels of federal imprisonment occurred under Nixon; the lowest imprisonment levels occurred under religious party hegemony in The Netherlands and Italy, and under Catholic auspices in Ireland; the leading historical examples of decarceration (Rutherford 1984) occurred under Liberal and Tory auspices in England and Liberal Democratic Party auspices in Japan. The role of conservatives in the antipunishment movement is, of course, an old story. Capital punishment abolition, after all, was carried out by enlightened despots in the eighteenth century; by the czar and other monarchs in the nineteenth century; and by nineteenth-century bourgeois liberal oligarchs in The Netherlands, Italy, and Portugal. Abolition after World War II was proposed in West Germany by the extreme Right and supported by the Christian Democrats in West Germany and Italy. Abolition in France in 1981 was supported by Gaullist and Giscardian elites. Restoration of capital punishment in the UK and Canada has repeatedly been blocked by Tory cabinet ministers.

4. Punishment and State Formation

We should not, however, exaggerate the differences among the advanced democracies. Even in the USA public tolerance for penal sentimentalism lasted well into the 1970s and early 1980s. And the subsequent backlash that doubled and tripled US prison populations only brought the prisoner–robbery ratio (1.8 in 1970, 1.6 in 1990, 3.5 in 1997) into line with European ratios—about the same as Sweden in 1970 or Austria in 1990, and nowhere near the 11 prisoners per robbery average for the advanced democracies in 1960.

The modern state was built by substituting state for private punishment. Bentham could write without fear of contradiction: 'No punishment, no government; no government, no political society' (Bentham 1831, p. 7). Many democracies of the twentieth century set out to disprove Bentham by showing that a state could protect its citizens and preserve order with few sanctions involving life or liberty. They succeeded in preserving the state's monopoly of legitimate violence—and proving the electoral viability of the minimally punishing state—but often at the cost of allowing the level of illegitimate violence to return to near medieval (i.e., prestate) levels.

See also: Crime and Class; Crime and Ethnicity (Including Race); Crime: Sociological Aspects; Criminal Justice, Sociology of; Criminal Law and Crime Policy; Drugs: Illicit Use and Prevention; Imprisonment: Sociological Aspects; Prison Life, Sociology of; Prisons and Imprisonment; Punishment: Social and Legal Aspects

Bibliography

- Bentham J 1831 Jeremy Bentham to his Fellow Citizens of France on Death Punishment. Heward, London
- Cusson M 1990 Croissance et décroissance du crime. 1st edn. Presses Universitaires de France, Paris
- Durkheim E 1902/1978 Two laws of penal evolution. In: Traugott M (ed.) Emile Durkheim on Institutional Analysis. University of Chicago Press, Chicago pp. 153–80
- Elias N 1978–82 The Civilizing Process. Blackwell, Oxford, UK
- Enguéléguélé S 1998 Les Politiques Pénales. L'Harmattan, Paris
- Garland D 1990 Punishment and Modern Society. Clarendon Press, Oxford, UK
- Hood R G 1996 The Death Penalty: A Worldwide Perspective. 2nd rev. and updated edn. Clarendon Press, Oxford, UK
- Jankovic I 1984 Socialism and the death penalty. Research in Law, Deviance and Social Control 6: 109–37
- Jeschek H-H 1983–4 Die Freiheitsstrafe und ihre Surrogate im deutschen und ausländischen Recht. Nomos, Baden-Baden, Germany
- Lynch J P 1987 Imprisonment in Four Countries. Bureau of Justice Statistics, Washington, DC
- Rusche G, Kirchheimer O 1968 Punishment and Social Structure. Russell and Russell, New York
- Rutherford A 1984 Prisons and the Process of Justice: The Reductionist Challenge. Heinemann, London
- Tham H 1999 Lag & ordning som vänster projekt? Socialdemokratin och kriminalpolitiken. In: 8 Reflektionen om Kriminalpolitik. Swedish Council for Crime Prevention, Stockholm
- Törnudd P 1993 Fifteen Years of Decreasing Prisoner Rates in Finland. Oikeuspolittinen tutkimuslaitos, Helsinki, Finland
- Young W, Brown M 1993 Cross-national comparisons of imprisonment. In: Tonry M (ed.) Crime and Justice: A Review of Research. University of Chicago Press, Chicago, Vol. 17, pp. 1–43

Zimring F, Hawkins G 1991 The Scale of Imprisonment. University of Chicago Press, Chicago

R. C. Fried

Punishment: Social and Legal Aspects

1. Punishment in Modern and Postmodern Society

As recently as the 1970s, this article would have almost certainly situated punishment in modern society as the culmination of an evolution toward greater rationality and humanity. This vision of penal progress influenced both reformers and scholars of punishment.

The past was represented in Enlightenment tracts against bloody scaffolds and dark dungeons. The present was embodied in reform oriented prisons rooted in scientific studies of human behavior. The prison represented a space of public control (as against the tradition of private 'dungeons') in which the state could be held accountable for its treatment of offenders. It offered a penalty, the deprivation of freedom, uniquely suited to the core values of modernizing societies (mobility, responsibility, personal gain). Imprisonment was also a punishment that could be set precisely to establish a scale of deterrence, or varied in practice to allow individualized treatment.

The prison did not altogether replace earlier modes of punishment (Spierenberg 1984). Corporal punishment, fines, and the death penalty, the mainstay of penal technique before the nineteenth century, remained, although in diminished and modernized form. In the twentieth century, new forms of community sanction, probation and parole, were introduced, designed to elaborate the prison's capacity for surveillance while minimizing its tendency to isolate the offender from the normalizing influences of the community at large.

The limitations on twentieth century penology were long seen in the context of a future that saw the elimination of residues of private vengeance seeking, and the perfection of scientific techniques for resocializing 'delinquent' subjects. This program, known as 'correctionalism' or 'rehabilitation', grew from nineteenth-century approaches to moral reform anchored in religion, especially Protestant strands of Christianity. Beginning in the late nineteenth century, this was secularized (if only in some respects) into a social scientific penology that promised a range of interventions from psychological therapy to community action to secure the normalization of criminal offenders. Even dystopian visions, like Anthony Burgess's A Clockwork Orange, assumed that authorities would acquire the capacity for transforming the behaviors and motivations of deviant individuals.

Social theorists from Durkheim (1964) to Foucault (1977) saw penal progress as signaling a fundamental break in social organization (Garland 1990). Durkheim suggested that more 'primitive' societies were unified by themes of shared identity expressed in strict penal laws and reinforced in rituals of severe punishments. More modern societies were unified by a complex division of labor expressed in civil law and reinforced in varied individual relationships. Durkheim's theory suggested that the proportion of penal to civil law in a particular society formed a rough and ready index of its modernization. Max Weber, writing in the same period, saw in the evolution of prisons and penal law the process of rationalization that he had identified as the crucial pattern of social change in modern societies (Garland 1990). At the other end of the twentieth century, Foucault (1977) saw the prison as an exemplar of a new technology of power that became more generalized in the nineteenth century, that is the disciplinary organization of space for the purpose of governing potentially unruly masses of people. Although rejecting the humanitarian impulse as the primary motivation behind the rise of the prison, Foucault saw punishment as moving toward forms of exercising power that created fewer economic costs and political resistances. Where Durkheim emphasized the normative integration produced by the division of labor, Foucault saw modern society as evolving subtle forms of surveillance and coercion to establish conformity. Thus, while Foucault rejected the substantive normative optimism regarding 'progress' in punishment and society, he recognized the modern approach as distinctive and representative of an increase in the capacity and security of power.

The narrative of penal progress began to unwind in the 1970s (Rotman 1995). Ideas of rehabilitation and deterrence that dominated modern thinking about punishment for more than two centuries have not disappeared, but rather are viewed more skeptically and compete with a broad array of conceptions, some openly directed at vengeance. These developments have not been unique to punishment, but resonate with a growing skepticism about science, rationality, and reformist government that some have identified with the idea of postmodernity (Beck 1992). While modern punishment evidenced a persistent aspiration to progress beyond itself and to become a form of education, therapy, or pastoral care, postmodern punishment has embraced punishment as a good in itself and as a model for governing in other fields like education, healthcare, and welfare (Simon 1997).

These changing cultural sentiments are reflected in an increase in penal severity throughout many societies since the 1970s (Stern 1998). The United States has been far and away the leader in this new pattern. At the end of the twentieth century, some three percent of adult residents of the United States were in some form of correctional custody, up from one percent in 1980 (Maguire and Pastore 1998). The post-World War II trend toward abolishing the death penalty has also become much more complicated since the 1970s. The post-1989 collapse of Communist governments in Europe and Asia, and the end of Apartheid in South Africa unleashed a wave of abolitions. In the same time period, however, a number of countries that had temporarily ceased executions resumed them (Hood 1996). The United States is again the leading example. After a brief judicially imposed moratorium on executions in the early 1970s (Zimring and Hawkins 1986) the death penalty has returned to use in 38 of 50 states and overall numbers of those executed have returned to the levels of the 1950s.

2. The Origins, Meanings, and Functions of Punishment

Punishment, as that term is used here, refers to all legally regulated practices intended to denounce, harm, control, or reform specific individuals convicted of violating a criminal law or comparable norm. This is a broader definition than that used by many courts (for instance, in the United States), where many kinds of disadvantages or burdens imposed on those convicted of crimes are not considered punishments, including forfeiture of property linked to crime and requirements for certain types of offenders to register their address with police. At the same time, it is a more limited definition than might follow from popular understandings of punishment which can include illicit acts of vengeance and self imposed forms of discipline (Hudson 1996).

At the end of the twentieth century a wide variety of penal practices were in use, including the death penalty, imprisonment, fines, and various forms of supervised release under conditions of limited freedom in the community. Societies vary enormously with respect to the relative proportion of these punishments. Popular sentiment has been growing for a return to penal practices of the past, such as flogging and symbolic markings aimed at shaming the offender.

There is also a growing set of penal practices outside the formal limits of the criminal law. These include forfeiture of property linked to criminal activity, confinement of those deemed mentally abnormal and dangerous (e.g., sex offenders), deportation of aliens deemed a threat to security, and mechanisms to notify private individual and community organizations of the presence of convicted sex offenders in their proximate vicinity. Forms of civil punishment date back to the Middle Ages but have become more common in recent years.

For interpreting trends in penal practices it is useful to distinguish two further terms: 'penology' and 'penality.' Penology is often defined as the 'science of punishment' and can refer to the rigorous study of penal techniques by professionals in both scholarly and institutional settings. While this reflects the prestige of science in modern society, it is too narrow to capture the range of nonscientific discourses about punishment, both earlier and today. Penology here refers to any organized and systematic discourse about punishment. 'Penalty' is a term that has been applied usefully to thinking about the entire constellation of penal practices and penologies in operation in a society at a particular time (Garland and Young 1983).

Any particular practice of punishment or penology has a genealogy that can in principle be traced back to an origin. Likewise, we can speak of the meaning or function intended for a specific penal practice or projected by a particular penology. It is safe to assume, however, that any society's penalty will reflect a wide range of different penal practices, institutions, and penologies with quite different origins, meanings, and functions. As the philosopher Nietzsche pointed out at the turn of the nineteenth century, 'the concept of "punishment" presents, at a very late stage of culture ... not just one meaning but a whole synthesis of "meanings"' (Nietzsche 1994, p. 57). This is surely even more true a century later (O'Malley 1999).

Since the nineteenth century, philosophical, legal, and social science writers have 'cannonized' four 'appropriate' functions of punishment: deterrence, prevention (or incapacitation as it is more commonly referred to today), rehabilitation or reform, and retribution. Deterrence as a systematic theory of punishment or penology originates with the influential Enlightenment penal thinker Beccaria (1996) and was elaborated by Jeremy Bentham (Hudson 1996). Deterrence views punishments as evils that can only be justified by their effect on the rational calculus of the free and responsible individuals. The ideal of deterrence in this perspective is to threaten just enough 'pain' or 'disutility' in response to the proscribed act that a rational chooser who considers both the 'pleasure' or 'utility' of the crime and the likelihood of being caught and convicted will choose to forbear. Deterrence presumes a common perception of the disutility of punishment and what might be thought of analogically as an acoustically consistent social space in which subjects, as it were, receive deterrent signals from the state. Despite considerable criticism over the decades of both of these core presumptions, deterrence has proved one of the most enduring penologies whose logic can be found in recent trends like mandatory sentences.

Reform or rehabilitation means using the punishment process to identify and to transform pathological features in the character or motivation of an offender that have led to the offense, with the goal of reintegrating the offender into the community as a productive (or at least nonoffending) participant. Like deterrence, rehabilitation is committed to the possibility of reducing crime by inducing the offender to change his or her pattern of behavior. But while deterrence presumes that offenders share with non-offenders a capacity for rational calculation of utility that the penalty seeks to invoke, rehabilitation assumes that offenders are deviant in their subjective features and seeks to normalize them.

Beginning in the early nineteenth century, reform was associated first with religious penitence and later with rigorous military-like discipline, surveillance and control (Rothman 1990, Foncault 1977). The penitentiary style prisons constructed from the late eighteenth century on were designed to support reform through isolation, compulsory contemplation, and intense surveillance tied to rewards for cooperation and sanctions for lack of cooperation. The cellular structure helped frame the individual as the crucial focus of penal art and lent itself to the comparative evaluation upon which modern criminological science has been based.

Twentieth-century rehabilitation took its cue from the rise of scientific criminology in the same period that emphasized the roots of crime in pathological individual anomalies. While much of the initial scientific criminology focused on seemingly irreparable biological anomalies (which lent itself to the eugenic aspect of prevention), its ethos and later much of its substance fostered the quasiexperimental approach that guided twentieth-century rehabilitation with its emphasis on individual diagnosis and treatment.

Prevention or incapacitation received systematic treatment in the late nineteenth and early twentieth century in response to the rise of scientific criminology. Punishment, on this theory, works by making it impossible for a given offender to commit crimes while he or she is confined. In this sense prevention achieves its crime control effects by removing the offender from the community either temporarily or permanently. Earlier in the twentieth century, this was framed primarily in eugenic terms. Imprisonment or execution prevented offenders from passing on criminal traits to future generations. Eugenically oriented preventive penology suffered the same cultural decline that eugenics did generally during the second half of the twentieth century, due to its perceived link to the Holocaust and the generally genocidal strategies of the Nazis (Duster 1990). In the 1980s, however, in response to the rise of crime rates that started in the 1960s and the seeming failure of rehabilitation methods, penologists became interested in the incapacitative effect of prisons. On this theory, the crimes an offender would have committed had he or she been free constitute the benefits of prevention, regardless of whether the offender resumes criminal behavior upon release (assuming that imprisonment does not actually lead to an increase in the frequency or severity of crime).

The first three of the four common legitimate functions of punishment are often referred to as 'utilitarian' because they are justified primarily by their hopes for reducing crime. A fourth function, retribution, generally is associated with the idea that punishment serves a moral function by inflicting suffering on those who deserve to suffer for having violated the moral rights of another. The core issue in retribution from that perspective is that of proportionality, that is, making sure that the punishment is proportionate to the moral wrongfulness of the criminal act. Retribution is often confused with revenge since both emphasize the suffering of the offender and do not emphasize the goal of reducing crime. But while revenge highlights the individual right of the victim to carry out a reprisal, retribution highlights the moral values of society as a whole and views crime as an affront to those values.

Retribution received its most famous and influential statement by the philosopher Immanuel Kant. Kant was so adamant that punishments be targeted at (and only at) moral desert that he suggested it would be morally necessary to carry out all punishments even if organized society was about to dissolve and had no future concern for the criminal behavior of offenders (Kant 1974). During much of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries retribution was taken to be a powerful sentiment in society, but it received little elaboration from penologists more interested in pursuing utilitarian leads. Only in the last third of the twentieth century, with the collapse of enthusiasm for rehabilitation, did a new penological discourse on retribution revive under the slogan 'just deserts,' (Von Hirsch 1976). With severe punishment politically popular in many countries there has been a renewed effort by philosophers and legal theorists to provide new foundations for retribution.

These four oft-repeated functions or justifications of punishment refer necessarily to the idea of legitimate or appropriate punishment. Many other functions of punishment have been articulated by critics and by sociological observers of penalty. For example, sociologists in the Marxist tradition have suggested that the key function of punishment is to help regulate labor markets for the stability of capitalist enterprise (Rusche and Kirchheimer 1968), or to produce obedience to and even loyalty toward exploitive and authoritarian governments (Thompson 1975, Hay et al. 1975). Sociologists in the Durkheimian tradition suggest that punishment has the function of increasing the sense of solidarity among members of community. Others have even suggested that the function of punishment is to produce a class of delinquents convenient for manipulating society from below through the control of informants and provocateurs (Foucault 1977). Such functions are necessarily latent, since making them an explicit purpose of punishment would delegitimize penal institutions. A third kind of function also excluded from modern penal thought is not quite so hidden: punishment should serve as an instrument for private vengeance for the victim or catharsis for the public. As shall be addressed later, 'populist punitiveness' (Bottom 1995) has become a major feature of contemporary, post-modern penalty.

It is tempting to treat the history of modern punishment as a shift in dominance among the four justifications. Deterrence seemed to prevail for much of the nineteenth century, followed by rehabilitation, then a resurgence of retribution, and by the end of the twentieth century, by prevention. While helpful in capturing moments of shifting power within the overall effort to coordinate and control penalty at any one time, this approach is likely to disguise the significant practical overlap between the established functions and to cut off observation and analysis of different logics entering the contemporary field of penalty. Likewise, the general discussion of the four functions treats them as eternal verities rather than as a cluster of responses to a specifically modern framing of the problem of punishment since the eighteenth century. Enlightenment critics attacked monarchical penalty as both excessive and ineffective. They set out to develop penal techniques that were simultaneously appropriate to the new status of individuals as moral if not political equals while effectively checking crime. Each of the four major functions of punishment offers a vision of how punishment can provide crime control effectively or at least in a way that is consistent with the political status of the individual as a free subject.

3. The Triumph of Modernist Penology

In the aftermath of the Enlightenment and the age of Revolution, penology was largely a debate between proponents of deterrence, primarily lawyers and politicians who saw the whole population as the primary subject of penal sanctions, and proponents of normalization who saw the individual offender as the subject. By the 1920s establishment opinion was well set in favor of increasing the rehabilitative capacity of the penal system, even at the expense of deterrence. The ubiquity of three particular penal practices reflects the spread of this approach. Juvenile justice was the first great step in a global pattern toward reform and rehabilitation followed by the most advanced societies in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries (Rothman 1980, Garland 1985). In creating a distinct penal system for youth, these societies reflected both the influence of scientific ideas on penal practice (the recognition of adolescence as a distinct phase of life was being promoted by the rising field of psychology), and the belief that at least some offenders should be handled in a nonharmful way. Juvenile courts, the heart of these juvenile systems, in turn showcased two other features that would become synonymous with modernist penology, probation and the indeterminate sentence.

The crucial legal invention of probation was the 'probation officer,' an agent of the court who presumably gathered knowledge of the offender's individual circumstances by conducting close research into the offender's biological, psychological, and sociological circumstances. As a punishment for both minor and serious offenses, probation subjected offenders to the supervision of a probation officer, charged to direct their rehabilitation and empowered to enter their homes, to search them, to interview their neighbors and co-workers, and to arrest them for violations. The indeterminate sentence meant that most of those convicted of serious crimes like robbery or assault were given a formally quite lengthy sentence with the expectation that an administrative agency, usually known as the 'parole board,' would exercise discretion to release the inmate from prison and allow him or her to serve some remaining years under probation-like supervision in the community (by parole agents) (Simon 1993).

The establishment of probation and indeterminate sentencing programs reflected a willingness to de-emphasize both deterrence and retribution as penal values. An indeterminate sentence (e.g., 5 years to life for a burglary) left the potential offender free to dream that he or she would get out in five. Juvenile justice, probation, and parole all lowered deterrence by diminishing the severity of the expected sanction, since all three involved reducing the amount of time that would otherwise be served in confinement. Moreover, in all three institutions, the legal authority to punish was grafted onto an elaborate decision-making mechanism incorporating not only legal but social and psychological facts.

By World War II most industrial societies operated some version of this modernist penology. The Soviet Union under dictator Joseph Stalin adopted a particularly humanist version of this penology (albeit undercut by the penal violence of the state security organizations). Of the three systems engaged in World War II only the Axis powers repudiated modernist penology, adopting penological ideas consistent with fascism central concerns with racial unity and populist excess (Evans 1996). The victory of the Allies in World War II secured a place for modernist penology in the legal and political structure of the post war world. For the next 25 years the rehabilitative logic of modernist penology enjoyed unprecedented ideological support and investment. As the European economies struggled to rebuild and the United States enjoyed surging affluence, the underlying presumption of modernist penology, that society had a significant stake in the adequate adjustment of even its most recalcitrant members, had broad currency.

Modernist penology also enjoyed unprecedented legal support after World War II due to the genocidal use of penal-like sanctions by the Axis powers. As the victorious Allies began to construct an international legal order to assure that such actions would never be repeated (an aspiration that remains unfulfilled), modernist penology became a constitutive element. With its focus on the whole circumstance of the individual and on rehabilitating rather than eliminating those the state defines as enemies, modernist penology reaffirmed core elements of human rights ideology and offered a normative check within the penal organs of the state against that organ becoming an adjunct to genocidal crimes of the state. For example opposition groups powerfully resisted the death penalty in the post-World War II international legal order. Abolition and limitation of capital punishment has been a central issue of concern since the Enlightenment, but the Nazi atrocities underlined the potential for execution to become mass state policy.

4. The Crisis of Modernist Penology

The dominance of modernist penology began to falter across Europe, Australia and North America during the 1970s. Skepticism about the capacities of scientific penology to control crime, combined with greater demands for government accountability, shattered the consensus that punishment was a kind of technical state service aimed at resocializing offenders (Garland 2001). Punishment as a painful harm to the guilty subject, an embarrassing residue to modern penology, returned as a positive product of the system.

The delegitimation of modernist penology spread initially by the political left that had traditionally supported it. This was an outgrowth of the same human rights ideology that also enshrined modernist penology. The emphasis on equal treatment, especially in the framework set by racial discrimination in the United States, made suspect the tremendous discretion enjoyed by administrative decision makers under modernist penology.

In the 1970s these kinds of considerations led to a wave of critical discourse on modern punishment comparable in quality and consistent in ethos with the Enlightenment writers on punishment. The United States was the primary center for the resurgence of retributive thought that came to be known as the 'just deserts' movement. Widely read books by Von Hirsch (1976), the American Friends Service Committee (1972), Frankel (1973), and Fogel (1975), among many others, deeply criticized modernist penology and offered in its place a more transparent and presumably more limited state use of coercion to punish or to incapacitate those who act clumsily and dangerously. The central principles of just deserts were sentences proportionate to the seriousness of the offense, equal punishment of those committing similar offenses, and transparent decision making that would prevent the possibility of the total loss of liberty faced by minor criminals.

By the 1980s and 1990s, the philosophy of just deserts largely had been superseded by two quite different penologies that are postmodernist and post-Enlightenment. One is a discourse of punishment as risk management; it represents some continuity with the modernist quest for effective crime control, but in terms that reject the key values of modernism and the Enlightenment. The other is a populist punitiveness (Bottom 1995) or authoritarian populism (Hall et al. 1978) that valorizes victims and the therapeutic potential of vengeance and cruelty (Scheingold 1984, 1991, Sarat 2001).

5. The New Penology and Populist Punitiveness

As modernist penology began to unravel in the 1970s, scholars have begun to describe the emergence of an inchoate successor penology, a 'new penology' (Cohen 1985, Feeley and Simon 1992), or 'managerialism' (Bottom 1995). This new penology is most apparent in its contrast with the central tendencies of modernist penology. Rejecting the historic modern commitment to the individual as the target of penal justice, the new penology deals primarily in aggregates, dangerous classes, high risk populations and the like. The new penology replaces the objective of transforming criminal deviance with that of managing it. The new penology drops the focus on the social context and interest in penalty in favor of the system itself as the primary source of normative order.

These elements can be seen in such recent penal practices as preventive detention of sex offenders, mandatory minimum sentences (Tonry 1995), and super max prisons (King 1999). These practices combine a discourse of risk management and a skepticism about the potential for transforming offenders with a systematic preference for decision-making criteria rooted in forms of knowledge internal to the system itself.

While the 'new penology' describes the way professionals within the penal system understand their mission, there is a large gap between the managerialism of this discourse and increasingly emotive populist discourse of punishment which emphasizes vengeance, shaming, and the therapeutic benefit of punishment for victims. Throughout the era of modernist penology popular consciousness about punishment was presumed to lag behind the progressive logic of professionals. With the exception of aberrant regimes like the National Socialists in Germany in the 1930s and 1940s, most modern governments treated penal policy as something that should be shaped by professional concerns with only grudging concessions to popular demands. What is distinctive about the turn in penal policy since 1980, especially in the United States, is the open embrace of populism as an acceptable logic of punishment. This is exemplified by the embrace of the death penalty by virtually all political leaders in the United States and the enactment of expressly emotional laws like 'Three-Strikes' (Sechrest and Sichor 1996).

See also: Criminal Law and Crime Policy; Death Penalty; Deterrence; Deterrence: Legal Perspectives;

Deterrence Theory: Crime; Juvenile Justice: International Law Perspectives; Prisons and Imprisonment; Punishment, Comparative Politics of; Sanctions in Political Science

Bibliography

- American Friends Service Committee 1972 Struggle for Justice. Hill and Wang, New York
- Beccaria C 1996 Of Crime and Punishment. Trans. Grigson J. Marsilio Publishers, New York
- Beck U 1992 The Risk Society: Towards a New Modernity. Trans. Ritter M. Sage Publications, London
- Bottom A 1995 The philosophy and politics of punishment and sentencing. In: Clarkson C, Morgan R (eds.) The Politics of Sentencing Reform. Clarendon Press, Oxford, UK
- Cohen S 1985 Visions of Social Control. Polity Press, Cambridge, UK
- Cummins E 1994 The Rise and Fall of California's Radical Prison Movement. Stanford University Press, Stanford, CA
- Durkheim E 1964 The Division of Labor in Society. Trans. Simpson G. Free Press of Glencoe, New York
- Duster T 1990 Backdoor to Eugenics. Routledge, New York
- Evans R J 1996 Rituals of Retribution: Capital Punishment in Germany, 1600–1987. Oxford University Press, Oxford, UK
- Feeley M, Simon J 1992 The new penology: Notes on the emerging strategy of corrections and its implications. Criminology 30: 449–74
- Fogel D 1975 We are the Living Proof: The Justice Model for Corrections. Anderson, Cincinnati
- Foucault M 1977 Discipline and Punish: The Birth of the Prison. Trans. Sheridan A. Pantheon, New York
- Frankel M E 1973 Criminal Sentences; Law Without Order. Hill and Wang, New York
- Garland D 1985 Punishment and Welfare. Gower, Brookfield, VT
- Garland D 1990 Punishment and Modern Society: A Study in Social Theory. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
- Garland D, Young P 1983 Toward a social analysis of penalty. In: Garland D, Young P (eds.) The Power to Punish: Contemporary Penalty and Social Analysis. Heinemann, London
- Garland D 2001 The Culture of Control: Crime and Social Order in Contemporary Society. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
- Hall S, Critcher C, Jefferson T, Clarke J, Roberts B 1978 Policing the Crisis: Mugging, the State, and Law and Order. MacMillan, London
- Hay D, Linebaugh P, Rule J G, Thompson E P, Winslow C 1975 Albion's Fatal Tree: Crime and Society in Eighteenth-Century England. Pantheon, New York
- Hood R G 1996 The Death Penalty: a World Wide Perspective. Oxford University Press, New York
- Hudson B A 1996 Understanding Justice: An Introduction to Ideas, Perspectives and Controversies in Modern Penal Theory. Open University Press, Philadelphia PA
- Kant I 1974 The Philosophy of Law (trans. Hastie W 1877). Reprinted 1974, A M Kelley, Clifton, NY
- King R 1999 The rise and rise of the Supermax: an American solution in search of a problem. Punishment and Society 1: 163–86
- Maguire K, Pastore A L 1998 Sourcebook of Criminal Justice Statistics 1997. Bureau of Justice Statistics, Washington, DC

- Nietzsche F W 1994 On the Genealogy of Morals. Trans. Diethe C. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, UK
- O'Malley P 1999 Volatile punishments: Contemporary penalty and neo-liberal government. Theoretical Criminology 3: 175–96
- Rothman D J 1980 Conscience and Convenience: The Asylum and its Alternatives in Progressive America. Little Brown, Boston
- Rothman D J 1990 The Discovery of the Asylum: Social Order and Disorder in the New Republic, rev. edn. Little Brown, Boston
- Rotman E 1995 The failure of reform: United States, 1865–1965. In: Marris N, Rothman D (eds) The Oxford History of the Prison: The Practice of Punishment in Western Society. Oxford University Press, New York
- Rusche G, Kirchheimer O 1968 Punishment and Social Structure. Russell and Russell, New York
- Sarat A 2001 When the State Kills: Capital Punishment and the American Condition. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Scheingold S 1984 The Politics of Law and Order: Street Crime and Public Policy. Longman, New York
- Scheingold S 1991 The Politics of Street Crime: Criminal Process and Cultural Obsession. Temple University Press, Philadelphia
- Sechrest D, Sichor D (eds.) 1996 'Three Strikes' and Public Policy. Sage, London
- Simon J 1993 Poor Discipline: Parole and the Social Control of the Urban Underclass, 1890–1990. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
- Simon J 1997 Governing through crime. In: Friedman L M, Fisher G (eds.) The Crime Conundrum: Essays on Criminal Justice. Westview, Boulder, CO
- Spierenburg P 1984 The Spectacle of Suffering: Executions and the Evolution of Repression from a Pre-Industrial Metropolis to the European Experience. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Stem V 1998 A Sin Against the Future: Imprisonment in the World. Northeastern University Press, Boston
- Thompson E P 1975 Whigs and Hunters: The Origin of the Black Act. Pantheon, New York
- Tonry M H 1995 Malign Neglect—Race, Crime, and Punishment in America. Oxford University Press, New York
- Von Hirsch 1976 Doing Justice: The Choice of Punishments. Hill and Wang, New York
- Zimring F E, Hawkins G 1986 Capital Punishment and the American Agenda. Cambridge University Press, New York

J. Simon

Copyright © 2001 Elsevier Science Ltd.
All rights reserved.

Q

Qualitative Methods, History of

This brief history traces the development of socio-historical methodologies employed in relation to data that are either archival or based on direct social observation and interaction, insofar as these methods do not depend on quantitative analysis. The history of qualitative methods can be explored in three respects: (a) institutionalization; (b) how objects of inquiry have been construed; and (c) logics and analytic strategies. Recently, debates in the wake of the 'postmodern' turn have created new possibilities for understanding qualitative research, and research more broadly, as a terrain of inter-discursive communication with properties of 'integrated disparity.'

1. Institutional Emergences of Qualitative Methods

Sociohistorical inquiry emerged long before the rise of the modern academic disciplines. In China, statecraft early on was informed by typologies of social circumstances and transitional possibilities of action specified by the I Ching. In the fifth century before the modern era, ancient Greece had Herodotus, as much an observer of the contemporary as a historian. And during the fourteenth century, in the Arab world, Ibn Khaldun wrote in a way that anticipated comparative and historical sociology. These and other relatively sophisticated practices of inquiry coexisted with much more basic efforts of social groups to document their existences through the development of archives, king lists, annals, and chronicles. Thus, the arrangements through which sociohistorical knowledge has been produced are longstanding and diverse.

However, contemporary qualitative inquiry is especially a product of modernity, and of critical and postmodern reactions to the research practices spawned of modernity. Initially, qualitative research was inextricably linked with the gradual emergence of modern national societies and their colonial expansion, most concertedly during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries (Vermeulan and Roldán 1995). Intellectually, the rise of social and humanistic disciplines can be traced to the European Enlightenment of the eighteenth century. Thinkers such as Giambattista Vico and Johann Gottfried Herder increasingly began to regard social and historical processes as subject to understanding in their own terms rather than products of the will of God alone, and Edward Gibbon developed analytic history by use of concrete social explanations (i.e., in his Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire).

In the nineteenth century, history developed under two aligned tendencies: efforts to differentiate the professional discipline from popular historical writing, and attempts to harness sociohistorical inquiry to the 'liberal' project of constituting the State, citizens, and the economy as a viable assemblage for social development. Thus, Leopold von Ranke sought to establish accounts of 'what really happened' on the basis of 'scientific' validation of facts drawn from archival sources, while simultaneously positing the history of political and religious elites as the subject matter that would reveal the meaning of history as a whole, that is, as a manifestation of the will of God. Historians in the United States for the most part embraced a modernist quest for 'objectivity' inspired by Ranke (Novick 1988), while leaving the ideological underpinnings of Ranke's scientific historicism largely uninspected. By contrast, historical sociology developed through the middle of the twentieth century mostly in relation to grand evolutionary social theories, at points aligned with anthropological ethnology, which was focused on constructing racialized world evolutionary sequences of social-group development. Only after World War II, and especially in the 1960s, did historical sociology develop a methodologically sophisticated array of comparative and theoretical strategies for the analysis of history (Barnes 1948, Smith 1991).

As for field research, it emerged in relation to modern colonial expansion and capitalist industrial development. Among Europeans, especially from the sixteenth century onward, knowledge gained from travel became a basis of colonial power sustained by exploratory expeditions, practical sciences, missionary work, and territorial penetration of colonial civil services. Sometimes authors combined traveling for a trading company or state with writing for a popular audience that wished to visit other lands vicariously. But epistemological principles of social knowledge were also at stake. Samuel Johnson's latter eighteenth-century trip to western Scotland implicitly demonstrated that cultural differences would require forms of knowledge different from the then emerging rationalized social quantification (Poovey 1998).

'Exploration' journals became increasingly systematic not only in describing the flora and fauna of the 'discovered' world, but also in inventorying the languages and practices of its peoples. Organizations such as the Smithsonian Institute (founded in 1846) coordinated efforts to gather data and circulated inventory questionnaires that could be filled out by non-professional travelers. Yet travelers' accounts—often saturated with racist and ethnocentric assumptions—largely served as grist for evolutionary ethnology and philosophical ('armchair') anthropology, for example, in Emile Durkheim's work on religion and James Frazer's The Golden Bough.

By the late nineteenth century, ethnology and philosophical anthropology still dominated the disciplinary space where modern ethnography was beginning to emerge. Lewis Henry Morgan's field study of the Iroquois, published in 1851, was largely a springboard to his ethnology. Only with the work of Franz Boas and Bronislas Malinowski did inquiry begin to abandon the ethnological search for trans-group anthropological principles of development, and emphasize analysis of social groups in their contemporaneous existences (a shift much bemoaned by the theorists). Boas is a crucial transitional figure. His late nineteenth-century observation and interviewing of indigenous peoples such as the Kwakiutl was initially intended to advance his studies of perception and speech, to the point that he sometimes became impatient with ceremonial potlatches that wasted research time! Nevertheless, Boas pioneered efforts to create valid information based on direct, systematic field research, and he trained students such as Edward Sapir and Margaret Mead.

During and after World War I, Malinowski even more strongly embraced sustained participant observation oriented toward characterizing a group's present way of life. His Trobriand Islands fieldwork, published as Argonauts of the Western Pacific, proposed a methodology borrowed from sociology, placing empirical observations within a functionalist framework, yet it also consolidated the modern ethnographic role as expert offering an authoritative account aimed at an emic understanding of the 'other's' point of view. This tension—between an objective theoretical framework and emic analysis—became a hallmark of modern anthropology, for example, in the French Durkheimian tradition, carried forward by Claude Lévi-Strauss (and in Britain by Alfred R. Radcliffe-Brown), and even in the way Clifford Geertz sometimes combined 'thick description' with social-systems rhetoric.

Ethnographic study of the exotic 'other' was hardly the only impetus to institutionalization of field research. Famously, Alexis de Tocqueville voyaged to the United States in the 1830s to learn more about the American prison system. During the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, sociology was influenced by similar practical quests for knowledge about social conditions, for example, in studies of social issues sponsored by the Verein für Sozialpolitik in Germany, by socialists in England, and among social workers such as those at Chicago's Hull House in the United States.

Building on the latter tradition, during the early twentieth century, sociology's strongest institutional development of qualitative methodology came at the 'Chicago school' founded by Robert Park, who took inspiration from Boas and Malinowski to encourage field research. The city of Chicago became an urban laboratory for the direct observational study of social phenomena. Chicago faculty and students produced a stream of monographs such as The Hobo (1923) and The Gold Coast and the Slum (1929), and their approach found common cause with observational and in-depth interviewing field studies of communities, such as Middletown (1929) and the Yankee City studies (1941–59), work itself influenced by anthropological ethnographies (and sometimes carried out by anthropologists). In the 1950s, Herbert Hyman formalized interviewing as a methodology, and Chicago students such as Howard S. Becker, Jr., continued the pragmatic and symbolic interactionist Chicago tradition that had been initiated by George Herbert Mead and developed by Everett Hughes. During the 1960s, phenomenological sociology, inspired by Alfred Schutz, and ethnomethodology, promoted by Harold Garfinkle, emerged as alternative approaches that problematized objectivity, realism, and the social activities through which qualitative knowledge is created. Added to this mix during the same decade were the constructivism of Peter Berger and Thomas Luckmann, the dramaturgical approach of Erving Goffman (himself trained at Chicago), and a nascent bridge between field research and history via the emerging interest in oral history. These developments, together with the 1960s retooling of historical sociology, set the stage for an efflorescence of qualitative research in the last decades of the twentieth century.

Yet, just when qualitative research flourished, it also was beset by differentiation and methodological crisis. Some symbolic interactionists, ethnomethodologists, and comparative and historical sociologists sought to affirm the scientific legitimacy of their enterprises by formalizing research methods and strategies, while other researchers took seriously the rejection of scientism consolidated from the 1960s onwards by critical theorists such as Jürgen Habermas, hermeneuticists such as Paul Ricoeur and Charles Taylor, philosophers of history (most notably Hayden White), feminist epistemologists such as Dorothy Smith and Sandra Harding, anthropologists like Marshall Sahlins and James Clifford, and the wave of poststructuralist and postmodern 'turns' heralded by Michel Foucault and Jacques Derrida. Ethical considerations about privacy, asymmetry of field research, and exploitation of subjects—raised especially by feminists and within anthropology—cast long shadows on the high modernist quest for objectivity and validity in qualitative analysis. During the last two decades of the century, these developments, along with the rise of world systems and globalization theories, led to the formulation of new hybrid qualitative methodologies that linked the local and the global, ethnographic and historical analysis, by such researchers as Michael Burawoy and Philip McMichael. The old dream of the ethnologists, of theorizing case studies in relation to general social processes, was reborn, but in a dispensation that eschewed ethnological ethnocentrism.

2. The Object of Inquiry, a Brief History

One enduring problem of qualitative research concerns how to construe the object of inquiry, that is, what is studied. At the end of the eighteenth century, Immanuel Kant raised the philosophical problem of selection, namely, which of myriad events revealed the 'guiding thread' of history. In the nineteenth century, under the influence of teleologies such as those of Hegel and Ranke, historians were generally content to regard their studies as centered on 'natural' objects that had their own coherences in the world itself. However, as Hayden White (1973) has shown, the nineteenth-century European historians established rhetorical coherence through one or another genre of emplotment that offered a metanarratological structure into which to fit events. Outside of history (and increasingly within it), an alternative tendency developed the object of analysis via theory. Thus, Karl Marx and Frederick Engels theorized about capitalism as a dynamic totality changing through its own contradictions over time, and used their perspective to thematize social events and processes in places as diverse as India, the United States, and Manchester, England. Within academia, the Marxian approach found its counterpart in the program of German historian Karl Lamprecht, who sought to displace Ranke's elites as the object of historical analysis with the study of diverse social groups and their interaction.

The Kantian problem of the relation between object and selection was more directly addressed during the German Methodenstreit toward the end of the nineteenth century, especially through the effort of Wilhelm Rickert to posit the objective value of truth in a way that would yield a shared way of looking at the world, and by extension, a shared object. Among mainstream historians during the twentieth century, a sort of ontological historicism emerged, in which shifts in styles (for example, the emergence of social history) depended on shifting the object of historical analysis, rather than its methods. The major alternative to historicism, which Max Weber spelled out at the beginning of the twentieth century, depended on two central assertions:

(a) first, that because values could not be warranted scientifically, the objects of sociohistorical inquiry could not be scientifically determined, even though, once determined, scientific methods could be applied to their study; and

(b) that the objects of sociohistorical inquiry are not natural kinds, but rather, infinitely varying socio-historical phenomena that become objects of inquiry through cultural interest in them.

Alternatives to Weber's approach can be traced in history to the Annales School and Marxism, and in the social sciences, methodologically to the objectivism of Emile Durkheim, and analytically to Georg Simmel. Durkheim had provided the general warrant for objectivist approaches in his 1895 Rules of Sociological Method. And, in a way that is not widely recognized, Durkheim's structuralism had its equivalent in Simmel's early twentieth-century identification of social 'forms' (such as 'sociability'), a central inspiration for a number of qualitative symbolic interactionists (Hall 1999, Chap. 4). Within structural Marxism, the perspective of the proletariat was assumed to offer an objective standpoint for the analysis of capitalism, though during the first half of the twentieth century this position became increasingly problematic at the hands of Georg Lukács and critical theorists Max Horkheimer and Theodor Adorno. If the object of inquiry for structuralist Marxism was a totality, for the Annales school, in the formulation of Fernand Braudel, the totality was the grid of objective temporality, onto which multiple levels of change—ecological, structural, histoire événementielle—could all be mapped (Hall 1980, Burke 1990).

Ethnographic field researchers during the first half of the twentieth century generally treated their cases as naturally occurring 'primitive' societies subject to 'salvage anthropology.' Yet, the supposed isolation of the natural case became increasingly problematic with the post-World War II emergence of first modernization and then world-system theory approaches, both of which drew into question the autonomy of indigenous social groups. A parallel tension developed within sociological domains of field research. At the moment of high modernism, symbolic interactionists like Herbert Blumer would posit the empirical world 'out there' as the object of 'naturalistic research.' Yet, interactionists shared with phenomenologically oriented researchers and ethnomethodologists the sense that the empirical object of research was 'constructed,' i.e., that the meaningful world was constituted by its participants' practices.

By the beginning of the twenty-first century, the objectivist-relativist divide in constituting objects of qualitative inquiry persisted, but the cultural and Foucauldian turns in history, the linguistic turn in anthropology, and increased understanding of how ethical choices shape data from field research all created conditions in which answers to the question 'what is a case?' (Ragin and Becker 1992) had become considerably more nuanced and sophisticated. In particular, by 1978, Arthur Stinchcombe argued against comparing cases as total entities one against another, and in favor of searching out the deeply analogous social processes that might be at work in cases that, on the face of it, might not even be considered as members of the same set. Overall, in today's post-positivist climate, reflexivity rules. Even objectivists recognize that theoretical orientations and concepts have consequences for how cases are construed, while dialogic relativists, some of whom doubt the existence of any straightforwardly accessible empirical world to be studied, have had to come to grips with the problem of how adequately to 'represent' the (constructed) realities of their encounters with the people about whom they write.

3. Developments in Logics of Qualitative Analysis

Philosophers have debated the logics of human reasoning for millennia. But the most compelling specification directly relevant to modern sociohistorical inquiry came in John Stuart Mill's (1843/1950) philosophy of scientific method, which specified two methods of non-experimental research. The method of agreement entailed isolating crucial similarities in a set of diverse cases, yielding the claim that if two aspects co-occur under otherwise diverse circumstances, they are likely to be somehow connected with each other. On the other hand, the indirect method of difference extended the logic of control-group experiments to nonexperimental settings, by searching for contingent co-related variations. In effect, two (or more) findings derived from parallel uses of the method of agreement could be placed side by side. If a particular propensity were found only in the presence of another particular propensity, and never when the second propensity was absent, Mill reasoned that one was 'the effect, or the cause, or an indispensable part of the cause' of the other.

The application of Mill's logic to sociohistorical inquiry met with opposing visions of qualitative analysis that became crystallized by issues raised during the late nineteenth-century Methodenstreit. Whereas the logic of Mill yielded a nomothetic search for general principles, an alternative, idiographic view suggested that the study of human affairs necessarily dictates emphasis on the individually distinctive, indeed unique, aspects of social phenomena. Whatever the resolution to this question, a second issue concerned whether the special character of sociohistorical phenomena made them necessarily the subjects of a different kind of knowledge than the explanatory search for universal causal laws, namely, a cultural science based on understanding social meanings and actions. Three broad logics of qualitative methodology—interpretive strategies, ideal-type analysis, and formal analysis—can be traced in relation to these contestations.

First, as the twentieth century dawned, Wilhelm Dilthey proposed a historicist hermeneutics that would seek to understand history as embedded in the life meanings of the people who participate in it. This basic approach has its parallels in both ethnography and sociological field research. Elaborations of analytic logics were especially concentrated in sociology. Alfred R. Lindesmith (1947) developed the method of 'analytic induction' as a procedure for successively refining hypotheses in relation to cycles of field research, an approach that Glaser and Strauss (1967) subsequently reinterpreted as 'grounded theory.' By the 1960s, 'participant observation' (Platt 1983) and in-depth interviewing became increasingly institutionalized as legitimate approaches to inquiry, with their own epistemological rationales, challenges (notably how to construe and know subjectivity of the other person), research procedures, and handbooks, such as those of Buford Junker, Severyn Bruyn, and John and Lyn Lofland.

Second, working at the same time as Dilthey, Max Weber consolidated a Verstehende approach that was both comparative and interpretive. He did not deny the possibility that sociohistorical inquiry might discover general regularities of the sort Mill sought to identify, but he regarded individualizing knowledge as the central value interest of sociohistorical inquiry. Therefore, he combined explanation and understanding, by using generalized ideal types that would be 'adequate on the level of meaning' and thus serve as meaningfully coherent analogs to the patterned character of empirical cases, yet nevertheless allow for comparison beyond individual particularities. Weber's methodology became central to the renaissance of historical sociology consolidated in the 1960s (Bendix and Roth 1971). In the 1990s, Geoffrey Hawthorn and David William Cohen, among others, developed Weber's logic of the 'mental experiment' into 'counterfactual analysis.'

Third, Mill's methodological effort became the touchstone for subsequent formalizations of qualitative logic. The most important elaboration has been the Qualitative Comparative Analysis pioneered by Charles Ragin (2000), which builds on Mill's principles by using set theory and Boolean algebra to identify multiple configurational patterns within an array of systematically described cases. In a different development, with the late twentieth-century turn toward the study of discourse (partly inspired both by ethnomethodology and post-structuralism), scholars such as Larry Griffin theorized ways in which narrative accounts might become subjected to formal analysis that would yield descriptions of discrete social processes. These and related developments of formalization—as well as techniques of 'triangulation' that compared findings gained from diverse methodologies—increasingly blurred the lines dividing qualitative from quantitative analysis. Yet with logical development also came critique, such as that of Stanley Lieberman (in Ragin and Becker 1992), who questioned whether formalization alone could resolve logical difficulties of comparative studies with small numbers of cases.

4. Postmodern Reflexivity in the Shared Domain of Qualitative Methods

By the end of the twentieth century, there had been substantial differentiation and development of qualitative methods, as well as experimentation in both research role relationships in field research and the form and rhetoric of texts reporting qualitative research more generally. Yet, these methodological shifts typically transpired within relatively autonomous schools where one or another approach was alternatively embraced, reinvented under a new flag, or syncretically revised in relation to alternatives. The differences between inductive and deductive historical sociologists, or between mainstream symbolic interactionist field researchers and those who had taken the postmodern turn, often loomed as important as the disjuncture between quantitative and qualitative research more generally.

Under these conditions, a fruitful development has been the specification of typologies that describe alternative practices of inquiry in terms of the shared or contrasting cultural logics of their research methods, rather than assuming an equivalence between particular qualitative methodologies and various schools or genres (e.g., symbolic interactionism, cultural history). Theda Skocpol and Margaret Somers, and Charles Tilly developed typologies of historical and comparative sociology, and John R. Hall (1999) used discursive analysis to elaborate a general typology describing eight core cultural logics of research practice. In these terms, the three methodologies most favored in field research and historical sociology are historicism, contrast-oriented comparison, and analytic generalization. These methodologies are part of a wider array of possibilities, including practices such as 'configurational history' that are often employed without benefit of formalization, and other practices, such as 'universal history,' that persist despite postmodern condemnation of 'metanarratives.' Typologies of qualitative analysis might seem to harden the boundaries between alternatives. However, the outcome of discursive analysis is the opposite, for it reveals a condition of 'integrated disparity' among research practices that share cultural logics in ways not previously understood, and it clarifies the conditions and potential for translation of research knowledge produced through radically alternative research practices (Hall 1999, Chap. 9). Thus, although qualitative research is shot through with contemporary tensions between science, relativism, and constructivism, qualitative researchers may find ripe conditions for a new era of sophistication about the character of qualitative research that will have implications for research practices more widely. But to consider those possibilities moves beyond history into the realm of as-yet contingent possibility.

See also: Analytic Induction; Ethnomethodology: General; Field Observational Research in Anthropology and Sociology; Grounded Theory: Methodology and Theory Construction; Health Research, Qualitative; Interactionism: Symbolic; Interpretive Methods; Macromethods; Interpretive Methods: Micromethods; Qualitative Methods in Geography; Science and Technology Studies: Ethnomethodology; Symbolic Interaction: Methodology

Bibliography

- Barnes H E 1948 Historical Sociology. Philosophical Library, New York
- Bendix R, Roth G 1971 Scholarship and Partisanship: Essays on Max Weber. University of California Press, Berkeley, CA
- Burawoy M et al. 1992 Ethnography Unbound. University of California Press, Berkeley, CA
- Burke P 1990 The French Historical Revolution: The Annales School, 1929–89. Polity, Cambridge, UK
- Glaser B G, Strauss A L 1967 The Discovery of Grounded Theory. Aldine, Chicago, IL
- Hall J R 1980 The time of history and the history of times. History and Theory 19: 113–31
- Hall J R 1999 Cultures of Inquiry: From epistemology to discourse in sociohistorical research. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Lindesmith A R 1947 Opiate Addiction. Principia Press, Bloomington, IN
- Mill J S 1843 1950 John Stuart Mill's Philosophy of Scientific Method. Hafner, New York
- Novick P 1988 That Noble Dream: The 'Objectivity Question' and the American Historical Profession. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Platt J 1983 The development of the 'participant observation' method in sociology: origin myth and history. Journal of the History of the Behavioral Sciences 19: 379–93
- Poovey M 1998 A History of the Modern Fact. University of Chicago Press, Chicago, IL
- Ragin C C 2000 Fuzzy-Set Social Science. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
- Ragin C C, Becker H S (eds.) 1992 What is a Case? Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Smith D 1991 The Rise of Historical Sociology. Temple University Press, Philadelphia, PA
- Stinchcombe A L 1978 Theoretical Methods in Social History. Academic Press, New York
- Vermeulan H F, Roldán A A (eds.) 1995 Fieldwork and Footnotes: Studies in the History of European Anthropology. Routledge, London
- White H 1973 Metahistory: The Historical Imagination in Nineteenth-century Europe. Johns Hopkins University Press, Baltimore, MD

J. R. Hall

Copyright © 2001 Elsevier Science Ltd.
All rights reserved.

12617

Qualitative Methods in Geography

Contemporary human geography is characterized by a diversity of topic areas, theoretical questions, and methodological plurality. A central concern with spatiality is constant, but a diversity of geographical imaginations (Gregory 1994) suggests a growing number of approaches appropriate to investigating how 'geography matters' in how social, economic, and political life unfolds. Among these, qualitative methodology provides an alternative paradigm of knowledge creation to that of quantitative techniques. With its admission of subjective experience and focus on meaning, qualitative methodology provides a variety of ways through which to analyze and interpret landscape, region, location, space, place, and the complex intersections of social and spatial relations. It has been critical to the re-imagining of the discipline as contemporary philosophical and theoretical debates have been integrated into empirical inquiry.

1. A Paradigm of Inquiry and Collection of Methods

Rather than accepting the possibility of a unitary, objective explanation of observed phenomena, qualitative research approaches acknowledge and seek the multiple and partial versions of reality that are constituted in the course of social life. Embracing a variety of approaches and field methods, a common interest in qualitative research is to enhance understanding through description and concepts grounded in the perspective of those studied. The meanings brought to bear by individuals and groups in ordering and making sense of their everyday social life and its spatiality are privileged in analysis. Methods of inquiry include various ethnographic approaches, including participation in and observation of the worlds of those studied and nonstandardized forms of interviewing with individuals or groups; text and visual analysis; and a growing repertoire of other non-numerical ways of observing, describing, and interpreting the world.

The shifting understandings of relationships between people and places and society and space are important in circumscribing how specific qualitative research strategies are employed. Interest in epistemological issues, particularly through the critical arm of the discipline, has fostered debate about the production of geographical knowledge and further shaped the choice of methods. There is a close association between theoretical developments, philosophies underlying inquiry, societal change, and the increasing use of qualitative methods in geography. As geographers seek to understand complex socio-spatial relations from different subdisciplinary and theoretical perspectives, such methods are used in various ways according to the questions and purpose of research. They can provide descriptive data in mixed strategy designs to enhance findings from quantitative data, but more commonly are associated with postpositivist analyses that center the interpretation of meanings in explanation of narrative and visual data. Inductive analyses of narrative data, informed by concepts of theory, focus on generating concepts grounded in categories emerging from the data. Interpretation of various types of visual data, such as paintings, film, photographs, maps, and historical documents, similarly are sensitized by the theoretical and philosophical lenses of the 'reader.'

2. Qualitative Methodology in a Context of Philosophical and Theoretical Turns

Since the challenge of interpretative understanding to the dominance of quantitative methods in the 1960s, intellectual turns have brought new questions and new topics to the agenda of geographical inquiry, which have required a rethinking of appropriate methods. Geographers from a number of subdisciplines have explored qualitative approaches in their research as the influences of, first, humanism and then post-modernism, feminist scholarship, and cultural studies have problematized conventional methods of inquiry and categories of analysis.

Humanistic geography, with its philosophical inspirations from idealism, phenomenology, and existentialism, first challenged the strong quantitative turn of the 1960s (Ley and Samuels 1978). Interest in human agency, the inclusion of people's intentionality, a focus on lived experience, and the quest of understanding how meanings were produced in the context of interacting social and geographical worlds, marked the value of qualitative research strategies. Participant observation studies produced ethnographic accounts that permitted a linking of the social with the geographical in ways that opened up inquiry to numerous topic areas that privileged the perspective of the human subject. Interpretation of landscapes included concerns with sense of place, while case study approaches informed by a theoretical framework of social constructionism explored the embeddedness of human action and perceptions in place and provided models of inquiry for the 1980s. The qualitative methods text of Eyles and Smith (1988) signaled the establishment of qualitative research as an appropriate and useful paradigm of knowledge production within the discipline of geography.

Paralleling these developments, the influence of feminist scholarship resulted in further embracing of qualitative strategies in research. Noting the absence of women in geographical representations of the world, feminist geographers set out to include the neglected 'half' of the population in the mappings and narratives of the discipline. In making the lives and geographies of women visible, qualitative methods, as in other disciplines, were privileged in their ability to uncover the everyday lives of women and the spatialities of their domestic and paid work (McDowell 1992). Bringing subjective realities of women into geographical explanation exposed the masculinist partiality of geographical inquiry and permitted the construction of concepts reflecting the geographies of women's lives. Linked with principles of research with an emancipatory aim, qualitative approaches remain important in feminist methodology as a vehicle, together with the contribution of quantitative methods, in exploring the spatiality of gendered social relations (Jones et al. 1997).

Postmodernism, the ongoing development of feminist theorizing and the later influence of cultural studies brought a 'cultural turn' to human geography (Massey et al. 1999). The importance of discourse in constructing human subjectivity and representing difference, whether reflected in the organization of space, social life, or in visual representations, was an important aspect of a complex literature on culture that influenced methodological approaches. Throughout human geography qualitative methods enabled inquiry to reveal the lifeworlds of marginalized 'others,' to engage critically with various media as cultural representations, to expose the multiple, partial meanings of landscapes and texts, and to disrupt many taken-for-granted categories of analysis. Immigrants, the ill, the disabled, the colonized, and other marginalized groups emerge as others whose subjectivities and geographies are being included in a broadening geographical knowledge. Ethnographies of workplaces and interviews with elites, analysis of contemporary visual representations of social diversity, and the inclusion of historical texts that include women's experiential accounts are examples that further reflect a concern with competing knowledges and representations of the world. These journeys into the lives of others has led to expansion and innovation in field techniques, including the use of life stories, focus groups, autobiographical writing, photography, film, and the adaptation of interviewing techniques and formats to meet the needs of particular research projects.

3. Constructing Knowledge Through Qualitative Research: Methodological Issues

With the increased use of qualitative research strategies, geographers have engaged with a methodological literature in the social sciences discussing the difficulties that emerge when conducting research with the 'other' of studies. Reflection centers on the complexity of constructing knowledge through reliance on the intersubjective relationship between researcher and researched and the interpretation of data through the self as a socially positioned researcher who is part of the world they study. Issues of rigor in research design and practice have been addressed with attempts made to translate the concepts of quantitative research into those more amenable to qualitative methodology, but most discussion has focused on the close association between practical and theoretical dilemmas in research, and their location in epistemological concerns.

The particular attentiveness of feminist scholars to the micropolitics of research encounters, together with the acknowledgment of the situatedness and partiality of all experience and knowledge, have become the concerns of many qualitative researchers in the discipline. Gaining access to previously subjugated knowledges is shown to be a process located within a layering of power-laden social relations that situate the face-to-face research encounter within the wider politics and processes of 'the field,' theoretical and philosophical tensions, and the institutional values and processes of universities and funding bodies. Specificity of place is shown to mediate how this intricate layering plays-out in the microdynamics of particular fieldwork situations.

Particular issues vary in different types of inquiry, but the exercise of reflexivity by researchers has problematized the whole enterprise of knowledge production. Whether in the context of reading landscape as text, rewriting colonial geographies, the demedicalization of medical geography, the shifting concerns of feminist inquiry, interviewing elites in economic geography, or exposing processes of exclusion of marginalized groups in society, researchers consider the different ways their own identities and contextuality influence their analyses.

That the findings of research are theory laden and interpreted through the researcher's subjectivity has brought attention to the presentation and writing up of research. The representation of the multiple voices of the researched is seen as a politically charged and theoretically tricky enterprise. Both in relation to narrative and visual data interpretation, the text produced and its claims to knowledge are problematized. The authority of the author is challenged, in that a particular representation is one of several possibilities. Following from this, the reading and consumption of research writing are viewed as crucial dimensions of the research process and the development of knowledge, rather than separate activity.

Attempts to disrupt hierarchical research relations, including issues concerning the politics and ethics of qualitative research have moved increasingly to center stage in methodological debate. For whom research is conducted, how findings are used and related to theory production, and concern over the possible exploitative nature of the relationship with research participants have become important considerations in research conduct. Participatory and emancipatory models of research are being explored, accompanied by thinking through how academia and activism are and may be connected. The ethical issues involved in such attempts to 'empower,' whether research is conducted at home, or in developing countries, have become an important focus of discussion.

4. Continuing Contributions

Expansion of the use of qualitative methods in geography is reflected in special issues of geographical journals and new texts on research methods that focus on qualitative methods or include qualitative approaches as important, rather than subordinate research strategies. Their value is recognized as theoretical developments have signaled the need to find new ways to discover and analyze data appropriate to current topics and questions. The various methods of qualitative research have opened up different ways of 'reading' and 'seeing' landscape, space, place, and the relationships between people and environments, so continually reshaping the nature and scope of geographical inquiry. The ongoing theorization of space, that has emphasized its relational, social, and recursive dimensions, has been accompanied by qualitative studies that are inclusive of human experience, perceptions, and meaning. Such studies have brought into view the diversity of local, everyday geographies, while at the same time locating individual and group experience within complexly linked local, national, and global relations.

The use of qualitative and quantitative methods is sometimes presented in terms of competing paradigms, sitting uncomfortably with each other. Theoretical turns and epistemological concerns may suggest that one be privileged over the other in the quest for valid knowledge in geographical inquiry, but different questions require different approaches. Both quantitative and qualitative work can and do contribute to furthering the understanding of spaces, places, locations, and how variously positioned individuals and groups live within and experience them. Qualitative geographical inquiry, however, has exposed the complexity of gaining access to and representing the situated knowledges of research participants, that precludes the development of rigid protocols or 'ways of doing' qualitative research. Different ways of telling, listening and knowing require flexibility in research design and approaches. Ways of doing qualitative research need to be situated within and be sensitive to the many situations that comprise the academic geographer's field. It may be anticipated that further innovation of methods and flexible models will remain the hallmark of research concerned with the interconnections of people, place, and space.

See also: Humanistic Geography; Phenomenology; Philosophical Aspects; Qualitative Methods, History of; Reflexivity; Method and Evidence

Bibliography

- Area* 1999 30 (whole issue)
Barnes T J, Duncan J S 1992 Writing Worlds: Discourse, Text and the Representation of Landscape. Routledge, London, UK
Environment and Planning D: Society and Space 1992 10(5) (whole issue)
Eyles J, Smith D M 1988 Qualitative Methods in Human Geography. Blackwell, Oxford, UK
Geoforum 1999 30(4) (whole issue)
Gregory D 1994 Geographical Imaginations. Blackwell, Cambridge, Oxford, UK
Hay I 2000 Qualitative Research Methods in Geography. Oxford University Press, Melbourne, Vic
Jones III J P, Nast H J, Roberts S M (eds.) 1997 Thresholds in Feminist Geography: Difference, Methodology, Representation. Rowman and Littlefield, Lanham, MD
Ley D, Samuels M S 1978 Humanistic Geography. Maaroufa Press, Chicago
Massey D, Allen J, Sarre P (eds.) 1999 Human Geography Today. Polity Press, Cambridge, UK
McDowell L 1992 Doing gender: feminism, feminists and research methods in human geography. Transactions of the Institute of British Geographers 17: 399–416
The Professional Geographer 1994 46(1) (whole issue)
The Professional Geographer 1999 51(2) (whole issue)

I. Dyck

Quality Control, Statistical: Methods

1. Introduction

Modern quality improvement by statistical methods began in the 1920s through efforts of W. A. Shewhart (see Shewhart 1931) of the Bell Telephone Laboratories. Rather than wait until manufactured items arrived at an inspection center at the end of the production line, he conceived of the idea of occasionally sampling during the manufacturing process and making corrections immediately, if needed. To monitor the need for possible adjustments, certain characteristics—called statistics—of each sample were recorded. If any of these statistics had unusual values that indicated something was wrong with the process, corrective action was taken before too many more defective items were produced. Accordingly, the quality of the final output was improved.

While Shewhart started this modern quality improvement by trying to reduce the number of defects in manufacturing, many organizations soon recognized that there was much waste throughout their operations. There were simply many activities that added nothing to satisfactory outcomes. This is not only true in manufacturing but in most service areas as well, including hospitals, banks, and educational institutions. Estimates of how much waste and worthless activities exist range from 25 to 50 percent of the total effort, although there are some organizations that probably exceed that bound of 50 percent. In any case, most industries and businesses could make huge improvements in quality products and services if they only recognized how poorly they are doing. Often such recognition is found by taking measurements, collecting data, and turning these data into information through statistics.

There are many philosophies and techniques about improving quality of products and services. Some of these have been formalized by considering the ISO 9000 or Baldrige awards (see Ledolter and Burrill 1999). Many companies have earned these awards and have had continued success; but some have then gone on to fail because they have not had a continuous commitment by top management to maintaining quality products and services. Bob Galvin, former CEO of Motorola, truly believed that 'quality improvement is a daily, personal, priority obligation,' and his commitment made Motorola what it is today.

At the end of the twentieth century it is worth making note of one quality guru who almost lived that entire twentieth century. W. Edwards Deming was a statistician who was born October 14, 1900 and died December 20, 1993 and was giving short courses in quality improvement ten days before his death. Deming went to Japan after World War II and taught the Japanese how to make quality products. For his work there, he was awarded the Emperor's Medal, and the Japanese established the Deming Prize to be awarded each year to a company or individual contributing the most to quality improvement.

There are others too; certainly Joe Juran and Japan's Kaoru Ishikawa (see Ishikawa 1982) must be mentioned. However, it was Deming's approach to optimizing the entire system that was a major point. In addition, his thoughts on 'profound knowledge' are extremely valuable, particularly the important part of it about understanding variation and statistical theory.

Understanding variation is a key to quality improvement. Many of Deming's 14 points (Deming 1986), while not mentioning statistics, centered on reducing variation. Deming believed that barriers between departments, between management and workers, and among workers, must be broken down to improve communication and the ability to work as a team.

The lines of communication, all the way from suppliers to customers, must be open to help reduce variation and improve products and services. For example, he argued that a company should not only buy on price tag but have a few reliable suppliers (possibly one) for a single part because that will reduce variation. That is, many different suppliers would obviously increase variation. Moreover, he argued that you should become partners, friends if you like, with your suppliers. You learn to trust the other; in that way, you can use methods like 'just in time,' in which your inventory can be kept reasonably small, to keep costs down.

Deming also preached constancy of purpose. If management ideas tend to change too much, employees really do not know what to do and cannot do their best. That is, they are mixed up, increasing variation. It is better for them to receive a constant signal from their employer, a signal that only changes if research dictates ways of improving. More training and education for everyone associated with a company also decreases variation by teaching how to make the product more uniform. Workers must know that they should not be afraid to make suggestions to improve the process.

Being team members will make it easier for workers to speak up without fear of reprisal. Deming also noted that requiring quotas does not help quality. A foreman who has a quota of 100 per day will often ship out 90 good and 10 bad items just to make the quota. Clearly, it would reduce the variation and satisfy the customer better if only 90 good ones were shipped.

This leads to the point that a final inspection of products does not really improve the quality. With such a procedure, you can only eliminate the bad ones and send on the good ones. Improvements in the design of the products and manufacturing processes are needed. If these are done well, often with the help of statistical methods, that final inspection can be eliminated. That is, improvements should be made early in the process rather than try to correct things at an end inspection by weeding out the bad items.

Deming's points are still extremely important in the quality movement today. Understanding variation and reducing it still 'makes the doors fit better.' However, most of Deming's ideas also apply to service activities, ranging from market surveys to financial institutions (see Latzko 1986). Since so many more persons are employed in the service areas than in manufacturing, there are many more opportunities for quality improvement there. Why are some restaurants, clothing stores, law offices, banks, accounting firms, and hospitals better than others? Of course, those involved must know the technical aspects of their work, but the really excellent managers know that quality begins by treating their employees and customers right. The cost of a few dissatisfied persons is difficult to assess, but it is usually much greater than most think because these people will tell many others about their unpleasant experiences. Most of this quality improvement is common sense but it is not commonly used.

2. Statistical Methods for Quality Improvement

Let us begin our statistical methods by starting with one of the Shewhart charts, the mean chart. We sample from the output of a process. The frequency of sampling of the output of the process is really determined by the number of items being produced. If there are a large number produced in a given day, the sampling might occur every hour. On the other hand, few in number might suggest sampling once per day is enough. Often these samples are small, and a typical size is $n = 5$, particularly when the measurement taken is something like length, weight, or strength. For example, in the manufacturing of paper, there is interest in its 'tear strength' because most often the manufacturer does not want paper to tear easily.

All of the underlying process have some mean μ and standard deviation σ . Hopefully the level μ is acceptable; and, in most cases, it is desirable to reduce the spread, as measured by σ , to make the output as consistent as possible. Hence, from each sample of $n = 5$ items, two statistics are computed: one to measure the level (middle) and one to measure the spread. We first concentrate on measure of the middle and that statistic is denoted by $\bar{x}$ and called the sample mean. Theory shows that once μ and σ of measurements of the underlying process are known (possibly estimated), the statistic will be between $\mu - 3\sigma/\sqrt{n}$ and $\mu + 3\sigma/\sqrt{n}$ unless there has been some change in the process producing these items. That is, if is not within the control limits $\mu \pm 3\sigma/\sqrt{n}$, then the process is investigated and usually some corrective action taken. The usual measures of spread are the sample range R and the sample standard deviation σ , and they have control charts similar to that of $\bar{x}$, and are called R - and σ -charts.

There are two other Shewhart control charts that must be described. The first of these is when we observe the number of flaws, say c , on a certain unit; for illustration, count the number of deaths on a certain highway each week. Here c can equal one of the non-negative integers: 0, 1, 2, 3, 4, and so on. A Poisson probability model is used for the statistic c , and these probabilities can be determined from the mean μ of the number of flaws. Again μ is often estimated using past data. However, once it is determined, then, for the Poisson model, the standard deviation of c equals. Thus, $\mu \pm 3\sqrt{\mu}$ gives the control limits for the c -chart. Future values of a c are plotted sequentially on this chart, taking some action if one is outside the control limits: if above $\mu + 3\sqrt{\mu}$, find out why and hopefully learn how to improve the process; if below $\mu - 3\sqrt{\mu}$, again find out why and hopefully learn how to continue this gain in quality.

The last control chart arises in a situation in which the items are measured as being 'good' or 'bad.' If n of these items are observed, let D equal the number of defective items in the n items. The binomial probability model is appropriate for the distribution of D . Here n is much larger than 5, often equal to as much as 100. Of course, $\hat{p} = D/n$ is an estimate of p , the fraction of defective items being produced. The binomial theory states that $\hat{p} = D/n$ has mean p and standard deviation $\sqrt{p(1-p)/n}$.

Once some estimate of the fraction defective, p , is found from past data, the control limits

$p \pm 3\sqrt{p(1-p)/n}$ are calculated for the p -chart. Future values of $\hat{p} = D/n$ are plotted on this control chart, and appropriate action is taken if one value is outside the control limits. Again, very small values of D/n would indicate some sort of improvement, and we would try to maintain that gain. When the statistics are between the control limits, which are usually estimated from the data, the process is said to be in statistical control.

The manufacturing team must make the decision whether or not the actual items from an 'in control' process are satisfactory. That is, they might find that the items are not satisfactory even though the process is in statistical control; then some adjustments must be made. However, once this is done, Shewhart control charts have proved to be extremely valuable in the past and have helped maintain the gain in the quality improvement of manufactured products. In addition, these control charts are now being used in many service areas, for example, studying errors made in recording the amounts on checks by banks.

Since most major manufacturing companies are requiring their suppliers to use statistical methods that help improve their products, the need for acceptance sampling to check upon the quality of incoming products has diminished. That is, partnerships with suppliers have been established, and hence the trust among the various parties is usually high.

Nevertheless, there are enough cases in which the incoming lot of items is poor; accordingly a large number of companies still use acceptance sampling. To describe acceptance sampling, suppose a lot has $N = 5,000$ items. Say that these materials are acceptable if two percent or less is defective.

This number, 2 percent = 0.02 is called the acceptable quality level. Understand that 0.02 is used only as an example, and some might insist that the incoming lot is only acceptable if there are almost zero defectives. In the latter case, this requires 100 percent inspection, which has some disadvantages, particularly if the item must be destroyed to inspect it, like 'blowing a fuse.' So most manufacturers are willing to accept lots with a small percentage of defects; needless to say, this percentage varies depending upon the importance of the item under consideration. To continue with the example, say a sample of $n = 200$ is taken from the lot of $N = 5000$, and it is decided to accept the lot if the number of defectives, D , in the sample is less than or equal to $Ac = 7$, the acceptance number.

Now clearly, as with any sampling acceptance plan, there are two types of errors that can be made. Say p is the fraction defective in the lot. If $p = 0.02$ and $D > 7$, then the lot is rejected when it should be accepted. This is an error of the 'first type.' The 'second type' error occurs if p is large, say $p = 0.06$ and $D = 7$, so that the lot is accepted when it should be rejected. It is desirable to have the probabilities of these errors as small as possible. Using a Poisson probability approximation, it is found in this illustration that the probabilities of the two errors are $a = 0.051$ and $b = 0.090$, respectively. If these probabilities are not small enough, then the sample size n must be increased and the acceptance number Ac changed.

Typically, the manufacturer and the customer require certain specifications associated with the product. These are usually given in terms of a target value, and the lower specification limit, LSL, and the upper specification limit, USL. These 'specs' are set, often by the engineer or customer, so that if the product is within specs, it will work satisfactorily. One of the best ways to see if the products are within specs is to construct a histogram concerning the measurement of interest. If the product is satisfactory, the lower and upper values associated with the histogram should be within specifications. If several items fall outside of specs, then seemingly the process, without proper adjustments, is not capable of producing satisfactory products. If adequate improvements cannot be made with the current machinery, possibly 100 percent inspection must be used to eliminate the bad items, or else new machinery should be installed.

Clearly, economic characteristics of the situation are needed to make a final decision on the appropriate action. While a histogram seems to be a satisfactory way to measure the capability of the process, a large number of companies are resorting to various measures called capability indices. Possibly the most popular one is Cpk. Say μ and σ are the mean and the standard deviation, respectively, of the measurements associated with a process which is in statistical control.

The index Cpk is equal to distance of μ to the closest specification divided by 3σ . For example, suppose $LSL = 48.1$ and $USL = 49.9$ and $\mu = 49.1$ and $\sigma = 0.2$, then $Cpk = 0.8/3(0.2) = 1.33$, because $USL = 49.9$ is the closest spec to $\mu = 49.1$ and the distance between them is 0.8.

The reason that such a measure seems good is that if the underlying distribution is normal, then 99.73 percent of the items are within $\mu \pm 3\sigma$. If $Cpk > 1$, then the closest spec is more than 3σ away from μ . Most companies using Cpk require that the Cpk be greater than 1.33 or even 1.5, so that μ is 4σ or even 4.5σ away from the nearest spec.

However, there are some difficulties associated with the use of Cpk, or any of the capability indices. One is that it is assumed that the underlying distribution of measurements of an item is normally distributed, when often it is skewed with possibly a very long tail. But even worse, usually m and s have been estimated using some sample mean and standard deviation.

Knowing these are only estimates with some error structure, the computed Cpk using these estimates may be in error as much as 0.2 or 0.3, even with samples of sizes as large as $n = 50$ or 100. For illustration, the computed Cpk using estimates might be 1.19 while the real Cpk might be 1.39 or 0.99.

Frequently, the management might be very satisfied with a computed Cpk of 1.39 and not one of 1.28, if it is using the 1.33 cutoff; and yet there may not be any 'real' difference between the two values. Management should be aware of this possibility in making certain judgments and decisions.

Only some basic, but important, statistical methods for quality improvement have been touched upon. There are many more quantitative methods that can help, and these are considered in the references. These range from simple ideas like flowcharts, Pareto diagrams, and cause-and-effect diagrams, through CUSUMS and exponential weighted moving average charts to more complicated techniques in the design of experiments, including Taguchi's methods. Most of these techniques are explained in such books as those of Montgomery (1996) or Ledolter and Burrill (1999). Accordingly only a few remarks are made about the simple ones, and the references should be used for the more complicated statistical techniques.

A flowchart of the total process shows the steps that are needed to complete the process. Often by constructing a flowchart, the persons involved can see where certain steps can be eliminated or worthwhile shortcuts taken. A Pareto diagram is named for an Italian economist; it is essentially a bar graph in which the height of each bar represents the percentage of defects caused by a certain source. The possible sources are ordered so that the corresponding bars are in order of heights, with the tallest being on the left. Often one or two (possibly three) sources account for more than 85 percent of the defects; hence the Pareto diagram indicates clearly where the most effort should be placed to achieve improvement. The 'cause and effect' diagram is often referred to as an Ishikawa 'fish bone' diagram, because it looks like one. The main horizontal line points to the 'trouble', which is labeled to the right side of the horizontal line. Four to six diagonal lines leave the horizontal line, slanting to the 'northwest' or 'southwest' with labels at their ends that might be major sources of the trouble, like people, materials, machines, environment, etc. Then little 'bones' are attached to each of these with appropriate labels. It is amazing how completely these can be filled in with four or five knowledgeable persons 'brainstorming' for 30 minutes or so. All labels on the bones should then be considered for possible sources of the trouble, and often such a diagram calls attention to sources that might otherwise have been overlooked.

More advanced techniques like CUSUMS and exponential weighted moving average charts that can be used in place of or along side of Shewhart charts have proved most worthwhile. However, the designing of new products, or troubleshooting to find factors that are causing defects, are best served through statistical design of experiments. Some of these methods, in particular 2^k and 2^{k-p} designs, have been exceptional tools; they are considered in the book by Box et al. 1978. Overall, quality improvement has been greatly enhanced by statistical theory and methods. The major contributors, including Shewhart, Deming, Juran, Ishikawa, Taguchi, and many more, deserve the appreciation of many in the quality movement. Clearly, from various experiences that have not been successful, much more remains to be done, and statisticians should play a major role in future efforts in improving the quality of products and services.

See also: Quality Control, Statistical: Reliability and Life Testing

Bibliography

- Box G E P, Hunter W G, Hunter J S 1978 Statistics for Experimenters. Wiley, New York
- Deming W E 1986 Out of the Crisis. Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge, MA
- Hogg R V, Ledolter J 1992 Applied Statistics for Engineers and Physical Scientists. Macmillan, New York
- Ishikawa K 1982 Guide to Quality Control. Asian Productivity Organization, Tokyo
- Latzko W J 1986 Quality and Productivity for Bankers and Financial Managers. Marcel Dekker, New York
- Ledolter J, Burrill C W 1999 Statistical Quality Control. Wiley, New York
- Montgomery D C 1996 Introduction to Statistical Quality Control. Wiley, New York
- Shewhart W A 1931 Economic Control of Quality of Manufactured Product. Nostrand, New York

R. V. Hogg

Quality Control, Statistical: Reliability and Life Testing

1. Reliability: What Does it Mean? Its Relation to Quality

The term reliability has become a part of our daily vocabulary. For example, the word unreliable describes the untrustworthy behavior of an individual, an item, or a procedure. In most situations the terms reliable and unreliable are conversational, and convey an intuitive feel. However, in dealing with situations involving modern machines and technologies, the need to be more scientific is on the increase. This has resulted in efforts to come up with sharper definitions of reliability, definitions that lend to quantification. But why must one quantify, and how should the quantification be done?

An answer to the first part of this question lies in the thesis that the notion of reliability is useful for certain kinds of decision making under uncertainty, and that the normative approach to decisions is based on quantifiable inputs (see Lindley 1985). Thus, in a broad sense, quantified measures of reliability are inputs to normative decision making. The answer to the second part of the question depends on how reliability is defined, and this depends on how it is to be used. Thus, in psychological testing, reliability reflects consistency of results provided by a test instrument, and so quantification is based on a notion of consistency. By contrast, reliability used in the engineering sciences pertains to an attribute of functional quality, and this indeed is its connection with quality. Functional quality is an ability to satisfy a set of requirements, and reliability comes into play when the requirement is either survival, or an ability to perform. It is in this context that reliability is of interest. Here, the quantification of reliability becomes a subtle issue, because the approach used to quantify leads one to a philosophical debate, a debate that has plagued generations of thinkers. More about this will be said later. For now it suffices to say that reliability is a quantified measure of uncertainty about a unit's survival for a prescribed time, or its ability to perform as desired. The unit can be biological or physical; when biological, reliability takes the label 'survival analysis,' a topic that has become the backbone of biostatistics.

2. Background: Interest in Reliability—Past, Present, and Future

Reliability is a quantification of a certain type of uncertainty. From a historical perspective, the quantification of this type of uncertainty dates back to Huygens, who in 1669 constructed what is now known as a 'survival curve.' Huygens' work was based on Graunt's data on vital statistics. Since the first 'survival table' was published by Edmund Halley in 1693, one may claim that statistical methodology, and statistical data analysis, have their origins in reliability. During the early 1930s, the problems of commerce and insurance sustained an interest in this topic, whereas between the 1950s and the 1970s, quantified measures of reliability were needed for engineering design, for government acquisitions in aerospace and defense, for enforcing regulation in drug approval, and in matters of public policy, such as the safety of nuclear power generators.

Landmark achievements during this period are the papers by Davis (1952) on the analysis of equipment failure, by Epstein and Sobel (1953) on life testing for the exponential distribution, by Kao (1956) for acceptance sampling based on the Weibull distribution, and by Grenander (1956) on the analysis of mortality measurement. The 1960s also heralded the birth of the mathematical theory of reliability, with Barlow and Proschan's (1965) classic book summarizing the knowledge to date. This work essentially defined the subject and provided avenues of research for years to come. Also noteworthy are the book by Gnedenko et al. (1969) which summarized the Soviet work in the area, and Marshall and Olkin's (1967) fascinating paper on modeling dependencies.

During the 1980s and the early 1990s, pressures of consumerism and competitiveness forced manufacturers to use quantified measures of reliability for specifying warranties particularly with regards to the credibility of software (see, for example, Singpurwalla and Wilson 1999). The late 1990s also began to see concepts of reliability used in business, economics, and finance, and in matters of political science, particularly disarmament and national security.

The continued importance of reliability is anticipated in the twenty-first century because of a growing reliance on the infrastructure of communication systems, transportation networks, distributed power grids, and civil engineering structures at earthquake prone zones. Major initiatives by government and industry are underway under the label of 'infrastructure protection,' and quantified measures of reliability are a key factor of these. Finally, an area of growing concern wherein reliability is poised to play a signal role pertains to the credibility of nuclear stockpiles in the face of test ban treaties (cf. Armageddon Moves Inside The Computer, The Washington Post, November 28, 1998).

3. Foundational Issues in Reliability: Is a Paradigm Shift Needed?

Reliability, as a quantification of a certain uncertainty, leads to philosophical issues that have been the subject of debate. These issues are prompted by several questions that arise naturally, the first of which is: whose uncertainty? Is it that of an individual or a group of individuals, or is uncertainty inherent and therefore universal? The second question is if uncertainty is to be quantified, what should the quantification be based upon? Should it be subject matter knowledge, collective judgement, hard data alone, or a combination of all the above? The third issue pertains to the strategy for quantification. Should it be probability and the calculus of probability or should it be alternatives to probability like possibility theory, belief functions, confidence limits, tests of hypotheses, etc.?

Much of the literature on reliability fails to acknowledge these issues; rather, the focus has been on methodology—not principles. All the same, a major portion of the written material on reliability regards uncertainty as being inherent or universal, and subscribes to the principle that uncertainty can be quantified only by means of hard data. Furthermore, it takes the position that probability and its calculus need not be the only way to quantify uncertainty. Consequently, the mathematical theory (cf. Barlow and Proschan 1965, 1975) treats all probabilities as being known, whereas the statistical literature emphasizes 'life-testing' (a way to generate hard data), confidence limits, tests of hypotheses, etc. Indeed, statistical reliability theory's major export, the Military Standard 781C, wholeheartedly subscribes to the above approaches for describing uncertainty and for decision making. A more recent example is the book by Meeker and Escobar (1998). Whereas a use of this strategy may be meaningful in the context of mass phenomena, like the output of a continuous assembly line, its use for one of a kind items, like computer software or limited size populations, is ill-founded. Furthermore, approaches that rely solely on hard data tend to be ignored by the users. This in turn has undermined the role of statistics and calls for a paradigm shift for addressing the modern problems of reliability that have been raised by the engineering community. Does this mean that one should forsake the calculus of probability in favor of alternatives like possibility theory and fuzzy-logic that many are attracted to?

The answer to the above question is a cautious no! Despite some shortcomings of the probability calculus, there does not appear to be any need to forsake it. However, a paradigm shift is indeed necessary, but this has to do with the interpretation of probability, not an alternative to probability! To address the modern problems of reliability, problems involving one of a kind items for which there is little or no failure data but a lot of informed testimony, it is the interpretation of probability that matters. Specifically, one needs to subscribe to the subjective or the personal view of probability in its purest form, as advocated by de Finetti (1964) and by Savage (1972). In addition to facilitating reliability assessment of one of a kind items, the subjective view offers other advantages. First, it helps explain several results in reliability theory that have been obtained via purely mathematical derivations (see, for example, Lynn and Singpurwalla 1997, in Block and Savits (1997), and Kotz and Singpurwalla (1999). Second, it facilitates the development of normative decision making procedures for acceptance sampling and drug testing (see, for example, Lindley and Singpurwalla 1991 and Etzioni and Kadane 1993). Most important, the subjective view of probability enables the treatment of dependencies in system reliability assessment in a natural manner (cf. Lindley and Singpurwalla 1986). The matter of dependence has plagued reliability analysts for quite some time, because, it is often the case that independence is assumed in place of dependence, with the consequence that assessed reliabilities do not agree with actual experiences (cf. US Nuclear Regulatory Commission 1975, National Research Council 1998).

Thus, to summarize, the view is held (cf. Singpurwalla 1988) that the twenty-first century will see a paradigm shift in the methods for assessing reliability. This paradigm shift will entail the interpretation of reliability as a personal probability, and not the adoption of a new set of rules for describing and combining uncertainties.

4. Key Notions, Terminology, and Overview of Developments

In what follows, the position that reliability is a personal probability about the occurrence of certain types of events is adopted. Since the most common event of interest is survival of an item, under specified conditions, for a duration of time τ , $\tau \geq 0$, the reliability of the item is defined as where P denotes probability, and $T \geq 0$, stands for the item's life-length. The interval $[0, \tau]$ is called the mission time, this terminology reflecting reliability's connections to aerospace. The quantity $R_T(\tau)$, as a function of $\tau \geq 0$, is called the reliability function, and if the item is a biological unit, then this function is called the survival function, denoted by $S_T(\tau)$. Clearly, $R_T(\tau)$ decreases in τ , going from one at $\tau = 0$, to zero, as τ increases to infinity. The life-length T could be continuous, as is usually assumed, or discrete when survival is measured in terms of units of performance, like miles traveled or rounds fired.

$$P(T \geq \tau) \stackrel{\text{def}}{=} R_T(\tau)$$

Let $f_T(\tau)$ be the derivative of $-R_T(\tau)$ with respect to $\tau \geq 0$, if it exists; the quantity is the probability density of $R_T(\tau)$ at τ . When $f_T(\tau)$ exists for (almost) all values of $\tau \geq 0$, then $R_T(\tau)$ is absolutely continuous, and $f_T(\tau)$ is called the failure model. Much literature in reliability pertains to ways of specifying failure models. Classic examples are the exponential with a scale parameter $\lambda > 0$, i.e., $$f_T(\tau | \lambda) = \lambda e^{-\lambda\tau}$$ and the Weibull with a scale (shape) parameter λ ($\alpha > 0$, i.e., $$R_T(\tau | \lambda, \alpha) = e^{-\lambda\tau^\alpha}$$

$$f_T(\tau) = -\frac{d}{d\tau} R_T(\tau)$$

Other examples of failure models are surveyed in Singpurwalla (1995). The expected value of T

$$E(T) \stackrel{\text{def}}{=} \int_0^\infty \tau f_T(\tau) d\tau < \infty$$

is called the mean time to failure (MTTF). For the exponential model

$$E(T | \lambda) = \lambda^{-1}$$

A concept that is specific and unique to reliability is the failure rate function or the hazard function. For an absolutely continuous $R_T(\tau)$, the failure rate function $h_T(\tau)$, $\tau \geq 0$, is

$$h_T(\tau) \stackrel{\text{def}}{=} \frac{f_T(\tau)}{R_T(\tau)}.$$

The failure rate function derives its importance from two features, one interpretative and the other, technical. Specifically, since the failure rate at τ is (approximately) the probability of an item's failure in $[\tau, \tau + d\tau)$, were the item surviving at τ . Clearly, for items that age with time, $h_T(\tau)$ will increase with τ , and vice versa for those that do not. This is the interpretative feature. The technical feature pertains to the fact that if

$$h_T(\tau) d\tau \approx P(\tau \leq T \leq \tau + d\tau | T \geq \tau)$$

$$H_T(\tau) \stackrel{\text{def}}{=} \int_0^\tau h_T(s) ds$$

then

$$R_T(\tau) = \exp(-H_T(\tau))$$

thus, knowing $h_T(\tau)$ is equivalent to knowing $R_T(\tau)$ and vice versa. The quantity $H_T(\tau)$ is known as the cumulative hazard at τ , and $H_T(\tau)$ as a function of τ is known as the cumulative hazard function. Biostatisticians like Kalbfleisch and Prentice (1980) have used a continuously increasing stochastic process, like the gamma process, to describe $H_T(\tau)$ for items operating in a random environment. The connection between $H_T(\tau)$ and the Lorenz curve of econometric theory (see Gastwirth 1971) has been noted by Chandra and Singpurwalla (1981). This connection suggests that concepts of reliability have relevance to econometrics vis-à-vis measures of income inequality and wealth concentration.

It is easy to verify that when

$$R_T(\tau | \lambda) = e^{-\lambda\tau}$$

$\lambda > 0$, $\tau \geq 0$, $h_T(\tau | \lambda) = \lambda$, and vice versa. Thus, under an exponential model, the failure rate is the reciprocal of the MTTF and vice versa. However, this reciprocal relationship holds only for the exponential, and not for all other distributions as practitioners often assume. An attractive feature of the Weibull distribution is that by choosing α to be greater (smaller) than one, the failure rate function can be made to be increasing (decreasing) with τ . When $\alpha = 1$, the Weibull becomes an exponential. Because of this flexibility, the Weibull distribution has become one of the most widely used models in engineering reliability and survival analysis.

The failure rate function has become a cornerstone of the mathematical theory of reliability. Specifically, all models whose failure rate increases (decreases) monotonically have been classified into one group called the IFR (DFR) class (for increasing (decreasing) failure rate), and properties of this class have been studied. All properties are in relation to the exponential which is both IFR and DFR, since increasing (decreasing) in IFR (DFR) is taken to be non-decreasing (nonincreasing). The famous 'bath-tub curve' of reliability engineering pertains to a distribution whose failure rate is initially decreasing, then becomes a constant, and finally increases, just like an old fashioned bath-tub. This functional form is appropriate for describing the life-length of humans, and large systems of many components.

The mathematical theory of reliability has many interesting results, several of which are intuitive, but some not. One such unintuitive result states that a mixture of exponential distributions (which have a constant failure rate) has a decreasing failure rate. Another counterintuitive result states that the time to failure distribution of a parallel redundant system of components having exponentially distributed life-lengths, has an increasing failure rate, but is not necessarily monotonic. Both these results appear in Barlow and Proschan (1975), but the arguments used to prove them are purely technical. Their intuitive import is apparent only when we adopt the subjective view of probability; Barlow (1985) makes this point clear.

The reliability assessment of systems of components is relatively straightforward if the component's life-lengths are assumed to be independent, the component's reliabilities are assumed, and the system is not a network. When the component reliabilities are unknown, the life-lengths are dependent. This situation becomes even more complicated when the system is a network. Lynn et al. (1998) proposed a Monte Carlo approach for treating such problems. Dependence in system reliability can be treated by multivariate failure models of the type introduced by Marshall and Olkin (1967). However, the number of parameters of such models grows exponentially with the size of the system, so that even for moderate size systems a use of multivariate models becomes an onerous task. One way of overcoming this difficulty has been to assume that the component life-times are associated and then to argue that reliability assessments assuming independence provide bounds for the assessed reliabilities if dependence was incorporated. This strategy may be suitable for small systems, but with large systems the lower (upper) bound tends to zero (one), so that the bounding is effectively meaningless. There is a pressing need for new multivariate models with a small number of parameters; an example is in Singpurwalla and Youngren (1993).

Thus far, the discussion has been restricted to the case of a single index of measurement, namely time or some other unit of performance, such as miles. In many applications, both engineering and biomedical, the survival of an item is indexed by two (or more) scales. For example, automobiles under warranty are indexed by both time and miles. In the biomedical scenario, the onset of disease is recorded with respect to age and also the amount of exposure to a hazardous element. Failure models involving more than one scale are, therefore, germane and initial progress on this topic is currently underway. Such models are known as failure models with multiple scales; it is important not to confuse these models with multivariate failure models. The former pertain to a single unit, whereas the latter to multiple units.

5. Life Testing: Its Role in Reliability Assessment

Life testing is a scientific and controlled way of obtaining data. For those who do not subscribe to the personalistic view of probability, data are mandatory for reliability assessment, and this includes the selection of a model. The data could be from a life test or from the field. For those who subscribe to the personalistic view, the actual data is desirable but not essential. Desirable because the role of the data is to update ones initial assessment of reliability. This is achieved by using Bayes's law. The initial assessment of reliability is done by subjectively specifying a model and a prior distribution for parameters of the model, the prior also being subjective. The term subjective specification includes the use of expert testimonies (see, for example, Kadane and Wolfson 1998). The role played by the data, be it from a life test or the field, is to update the prior distribution to the posterior distribution.

Most life testing experiments are statistically designed experiments wherein several identical copies of the item whose reliability is being assessed are observed under conditions that replicate those of actual use. The life test is conducted until all items under observation fail or until a prespecified number fail. When the latter is done, the life test is said to be censored. The test can also be such that it is terminated after a fixed amount of time, irrespective of how many items fail in that time; such a life test is said to be a truncated test. A truncated test is terminated as soon as the last surviving item on the test fails. A life test can also be a combination of censoring and truncation, i.e., the test terminates at a fixed time or after a fixed number of failures, whichever occurs first.

When life tests are time consuming, it is common to make the conditions of the test harsher than those encountered in actual use. Such tests are called accelerated life tests, and tests with continuously increasing stress are those in which acceleration is done continuously (see De Groot and Goel 1979). Whereas accelerated life tests produce early failures, their disadvantage is that acceleration may induce changes in the material properties of the item, so that the failure behavior is different. Accelerated life testing has a parallel in the biological context; it goes under the name of dose-response experiments.

Whereas censoring and truncation can be well controlled in laboratory tests, actual data may have arisen from either scenario, and the analyst may not know from which. This is known as the stopping rule problem (see, for example, Roberts 1967). Interestingly, for a subjectivist, the stopping rule is immaterial (provided that it is noninformative). However, for those who do not subscribe to the Bayesian point of view, knowledge of the stopping rule is fundamental. In the absence of such knowledge they cannot proceed. A very readable account of the stopping rule problem is in Lindley and Phillips (1976). It is because of these and the other arguments mentioned before that reliability in the twenty-first century has to be not only Bayesian, but also subjective Bayesian!

See also: Causal Inference and Statistical Fallacies; Quality Control, Statistical: Methods; Reliability: Measurement; Survival Analysis: Overview

Bibliography

- Barlow R E 1985 A Bayes explanation of an apparent failure rate paradox. IEEE Transactions Reliability R-34: 107–8
- Barlow R E, Proschan F 1965 Mathematical Theory of Reliability. Wiley, New York
- Barlow R E, Proschan F 1975 Statistical Theory of Reliability and Life Testing. Holt, Rinehart and Winston, New York
- Block H W, Savits T H 1997 Burn-in. Statistical Science 12(1): 1–13
- Chandra M, Singpurwalla N D 1981 Relationships between some notions which are common to reliability theory and economics. Mathematics of Operations Research 6(1): 113–21
- Davis D J 1952 An analysis of some failure data. Journal of the American Statistical Association 47(258): 113–50
- Epstein B, Sobel M 1953 Life testing. Journal of the American Statistical Association 48(263): 486–502
- Etzioni R, Kadane J B 1993 Optimal experimental design for another's analysis. Journal of the American Statistical Association 88(424): 1404–11
- de Finetti B 1964 Foresight: Its logical laws, its subjective sources. In: Kyburg Jr. H E, Smokler H E (eds.) Studies in Subjective Probability. Wiley, New York
- Gastwirth J L 1971 A general definition of the Lorenz curve. Econometrica 39(6): 1037–9
- Gnedenko B V, Belyayev Y K, Solov'yev A D 1969 Mathematical Methods of Reliability Theory. Academic Press, New York
- Grenander U 1956 On the theory of mortality measurements, Part II. Skand Akt 39: 125–53
- De Groot M H, Goel P K 1979 Bayesian estimation and optimal designs in partially accelerated life testing. Naval Research Logistics Quarterly 26: 223–35
- Kadane J B, Wolfson L J 1998 Experiences in Elicitation. Journal of the Royal Statistical Society, Series D (The Statistician) 47(1): 3–19
- Kalbfleisch J D, Prentice R L 1980 The Statistical Analysis of Failure Time Data. Wiley, New York
- Kao J H K 1956 A new life-quality measure for electron tubes. IRE Transactions Reliability and Quality Control PGRQC-7

- Kotz S, Singpurwalla N D 1999 On a bivariate distribution with exponential marginals. Scandinavian Journal of Statistics 26: 451–64
- Lindley D V 1985 Making Decisions, 2nd edn. Wiley, London
- Lindley D V, Phillips L D 1976 Inference for a Bernoulli process (a Bayesian view). American Statistics 30: 112–9
- Lindley D V, Singpurwalla N D 1986 Multivariate distributions for the life lengths of components of a system sharing a common environment. Journal of Applied Probability 23(2): 418–31
- Lindley D V, Singpurwalla N D 1991 On the evidence needed to reach agreed action between adversaries with application to acceptance sampling. Journal of the American Statistical Association 86(416): 933–7
- Lynn N J, Singpurwalla N D 1997 Comment: 'Burn-in' makes us feel good. Statistical Science 12(1): 13–9
- Lynn N J, Singpurwalla N D, Smith A 1998 Bayesian assessment of network reliability. SIAM Review 40(2): 202–27
- Marshall A W, Olkin I 1967 A multivariate exponential distribution. Journal of the American Statistical Association 62: 30–44
- Meeker W Q, Escobar L A 1998 Statistical Methods For Reliability Data. Wiley, New York
- National Research Council 1998 Improving the Continued Airworthiness of Civil Aircraft. A Strategy for the FAA's Aircraft Certification Service. National Academy Press, Washington, DC
- Roberts H V 1967 Informative stopping rules and inferences about population size. Journal of the American Statistical Association 62(319): 763–75
- Savage L J 1972 The Foundations of Statistics, 2nd rev. edn. Dover Publications, New York
- Singpurwalla N D 1988 Foundational issues in reliability and risk analysis. SIAM Review 30(2): 264–82
- Singpurwalla N D 1995 Survival in dynamic environments. Statistical Science 10(1): 86–103
- Singpurwalla N D, Wilson S P 1999 Statistical Methods in Software Engineering. Springer, New York
- Singpurwalla N D, Youngren M A 1993 Multivariate distributions induced by dynamic environments. Scandinavian Journal of Statistics 20: 251–61
- US Nuclear Regulatory Commission 1975 Reactor Safety Study—An Assessment of Accident Risks in US Commercial Nuclear Power Plants. WASH-1400 (NUREG-75/014) October

N. D. Singpurwalla

Quality of Life: Assessment in Health Settings

1. Quality of Life

Since the 1980s or so there has been an increasing realization that traditional biologically based endpoints such as morbidity and mortality alone do not represent adequately the potential outcomes of medical interventions. Health status measurement has evolved to allow insight into patients' experiences in such areas of function as mobility, mood, life satisfaction, sexuality, cognition, and ability to fulfil occupational, social, and family roles. Quality of life (QoL) has emerged as a broad term to describe this domain of measurement. The QoL construct may be viewed as a paradigm shift since it shifts the focus of attention from symptoms to functioning and establishes the primacy, or at least the legitimacy, of the patient perspective. QoL measures have many applications in medicine and healthcare. They are used to describe the subjectively perceived health and social status of given populations, to compare interventions and to assess the costs and benefits of treatments and health policies (Spilker 1996). Despite the increasing popularity of QoL, there is dissent about the meaning of the term, how it should be measured, and indeed whether it should be measured at all (Hunt 1997). In a critical review, Gill and Feinstein (1994) found that investigators defined what they meant by the term QoL in only 15 percent of the 75 articles reviewed. As Humpty Dumpty said to Alice: 'when I use a word, it means exactly what I want it to mean, nothing more and nothing less!'

2. Health-related QoL

Because of the amorphous and multidimensional nature of QoL, most researchers in medicine and healthcare concern themselves with a subcomponent of QoL called health-related QoL (HRQoL). This is distinguished from QoL as a whole, which would also include adequacy of education, housing, income, and perceptions of the immediate environment. Health status and HRQoL measures increasingly are used in studies addressing the costs and benefits of services and treatments (Patrick and Erickson 1993). The US Congress established the Agency for Health Care Policy and Research to undertake research on the effectiveness of medical care in terms of its impact on patient outcomes including HRQoL. The US Food and Drug Administration encourages the collection of HRQoL data for new drugs and, in the UK, health status and the experiences of patients and carers are included explicitly in outcome assessments.

3. Definition of Health-related QoL

Patrick and Erickson (1993) defined HRQoL as:

the value assigned to the duration of life as modified by the social opportunities, perceptions, functional states and impairments that are influenced by disease, injuries, treatments or policy.

Assessment of HRQoL usually focuses on physical function, psychological state, social function, somatic symptoms, sexual function, occupational function, and, occasionally, on financial state. Many existing measures frequently are criticized for including only concepts at the negative or illness end of the continuum while neglecting concepts at the more positive end.

4. Assessment of Health-related QoL

There are a number of approaches to the assessment of HRQoL. Most of these involve some form of subjective multidimensional assessment preferably completed by the respondent whose QoL is under scrutiny since levels of agreement among doctors and between doctors' and patients' judgments are usually low (Sprangers and Aaronson 1992). Measures include generic instruments such as health profiles and utility measures, disease-specific questionnaires, and individually focused measures.

4.1 Generic Measures

Generic measures, such as the SF-36, The Nottingham Health Questionnaire, the McMaster Health Index Questionnaire, and The Sickness Impact Profile are broadly-based questionnaires and can be applied in a wide range of conditions and populations. The main limitation of generic questionnaires is that they are broad measures of health status. Consequently, they may not provide sufficient information on specific aspects of a given disease which are likely to be important in assessing disease impact and the outcome of treatment. It is common practice to use a generic measure together with a disease-specific measure. It is likely that the use of generic instruments will diminish as more sophisticated disease-specific measures are developed.

4.2 The World Health Organization QoL Instrument (WHOQOL)

The concept of HRQoL owes much to the original World Health Organization (WHO) definition of health as a state of complete physical, mental, and social well-being and not merely the absence of disease. The WHO established a multinational group to develop a measure that would allow for cross-cultural comparisons of QoL (WHOQOL 1993). The definition underlying the measure was:

QoL is defined as the individual's perception of their position in life in the context of the culture and value systems in which they live and in relation to their goals, expectations, standards and concerns. It is a broad ranging concept affected in a complex way by a person's physical health, psychological state, level of independence and their relationships to salient features of their environment.

The WHOQOL is a somewhat unusual measure of HRQoL because, in addition to measuring physical and psychological health and social relationships, it also measures spirituality and it deals with facets of the environment such as financial resources and home environment. In developing the WHOQOL, the authors unexpectedly found that the basic factors inherent in QoL did not differ substantially across cultures (Power et al. 1999).

4.3 Utility Measures

Utility measures are generic measures derived from economics and decision theory and represent patients' preferences for different health states in the form of a single summary score. Their key characteristics are that they are based on preference judgments and usually are measured along a continuum from death (0.0) to perfect health (1.0), although scores less than 0 representing states worse than death are possible. Utility scores represent both health status and the value of that health status to the patient. They are used in cost-utility studies in which the cost of an intervention is related to the utility value afforded by the intervention. Various approaches to measuring utilities have been developed. In the Kaplan Index of Well-being Scale, case descriptions were compiled to illustrate combinations of functional levels, symptoms or problems and these cases were rated by random samples of the public who gave their preference ratings which were then used to determine utility values. In the somewhat controversial QALY (quality-adjusted life years) approach, improvements in the length and quality of life are amalgamated into a single index. In the standard-gamble approach, patients are asked to assess the risks they would tolerate for certain medical interventions. In the time-trade-off method, respondents are asked to estimate their relative preference for quality vs. quantity of life.

The utility approach assumes that individuals are capable of reporting their preferences and that they can predict accurately these preferences in relation to some future putative health scenario. It is further assumed that the preferences would not change if the patient were actually to experience such a health scenario. An additional problem relates to who should provide the utility values—the general public, health-care providers, and/or patients and their families. One response to these problems has been the development of the Euroqol (Euroqol Group 1990). The aim of the Euroqol is to provide a standardized, nondisease specific survey instrument for describing HRQoL and to generate a single health index for each health state. The measure, however, suffers from a number of logistical and methodological limitations (Bowling 1995).

4.4 Disease-specific Measures

The second approach to QoL assessment focuses on aspects of health status that are specific to the area of primary interest. It is assumed that responsiveness will be increased by including only important aspects of HRQoL that are relevant to the patients being studied. The measure may be specific to a disease (such as cancer or arthritis), to a population of patients (frail elderly), to a certain function (sexual function or sleep), or to a particular problem (such as pain). Specific measures focus on areas that are likely to be explored routinely by clinicians and are likely to be more responsive to small but clinically significant changes. The modular approach adopted by the European Organization for Research on Treatment of Cancer (EORTC) provides a core generic measure for use in a variety of cancers supplemented by disease-specific modules for use in particular types of cancer (see Cancer: Psychosocial Aspects).

4.5 Limitations of Health-related QoL

The restriction of QoL assessment to HRQoL and the use of health-status measures to assess HRQoL is not entirely satisfactory. Most of the questionnaires used are essentially measures of health status in a new guise and these place an overwhelming reliance on the assessment of functional capacity. As such, while purporting to incorporate patients' perspectives, they represent implicitly a medical model that stresses the ability to perform everyday tasks and fulfil social and occupational roles. Such measures ignore the meaning and importance of such tasks and roles for the individual and often preserve the supremacy of professional judgements leading to the suppression of what is supposed to be under scrutiny (Joyce et al. 1999, Hunt 1997).

5. Individual QoL Measures

A number of researchers have argued that QoL depends on the unique interpretation and perceptions of the individual and that questionnaires represent an oversimplification of what is a complex, multi-dimensional, subjective phenomenon. QoL is seen as a uniquely personal perception, denoting the way that individuals feel about their health status and/or nonmedical aspects of their lives. It can be measured suitably only by determining the opinions of patients and by supplementing (or replacing) the instruments developed by 'experts.' This hermeneutic approach would seek to understand individuals as self-reflective beings who are responsible for their own actions and who are the best judges of their QoL. This approach has resulted in the development of a number of individualized measures of QoL such as the Schedule for the Evaluation of Individual QoL or SEIQoL (Joyce et al. 1999).

6. Future Trends and the Need for Theoretical Models

Assessment of patient QoL facilitates improved clinical intervention, assists in treatment comparisons, and should prove increasingly important in the identification of services and facilities and in resource allocation. However, much of the research, to date, has been underpinned by somewhat tautological operational definitions of QoL. There is a growing need for theoretical models that capture the psychological reality and complexity of QoL. For example, most current measures fail to address adequately the dynamic nature of QoL. Patients confronted with a life-threatening or chronic disease are faced with the necessity to accommodate to their illness. An important mediator of this adaptation process is 'response shift' which has been defined by Schwartz and Sprangers (2000) as changing one's internal standards, values, or one's conceptualization of QoL. Response shift is but one example of a psychological process that underpins the essentially dynamic and phenomenological nature of QoL. Research in this area must incorporate psychological variables into theory construction in order to produce a body of research that more validly reflects the true nature of QoL.

QoL has, heretofore, been considered solely as an outcome measure in health research. However, exciting developments in psychoneuroimmunology and evidence from a number of clinical studies raise the intriguing possibility that QoL might influence pathological processes such as tumor progression. If this were proven, then interventions aimed at maximizing patient QoL might also influence patient recovery.

See also: Cancer: Psychosocial Aspects; Chronic Illness, Psychosocial Coping with; Chronic Illness: Quality of Life; Health Outcomes, Assessment of

Bibliography

- Bowling A 1995 Measuring Disease: A Review of Disease Specific Quality Of Life Measurement Scales. Open University Press, Buckingham, UK
- Euroqol Group (Buxton M, O'Hanlon M, Pekurinen M ym) 1990 Euroqol: A new facility for the measurement of health-related quality of life. Health Policy 16: 199–208
- Gill T M, Feinstein A R 1994 A critical appraisal of the quality of QoL measurements. Journal of the American Medical Association 272: 619–26
- Hunt S M 1997 The problem of QoL. Quality of Life Research 6: 205–12
- Joyce C R B, O'Boyle C A, McGee H M 1999 Individual QoL: Approaches to Conceptualization and Assessment. Harwood, The Netherlands
- Patrick D L, Erickson P 1993 Health Status and Health Policy. Oxford University Press, Oxford, UK
- Power M, Bullinger M, Harper A, WHOQOL Group 1999 The World Health Organization WHOQOL-100: Tests of the universality of life in 15 different cultural groups worldwide. Health Psychology 18: 495–505
- Schwartz C E, Sprangers M A G 2000 Adaptation to Changing Health: Response Shift in QoL Research. American Psychological Association, Washington, DC
- Spilker B (ed.) 1996 Quality-of-life and Pharmacoeconomics in Clinical Trials, 2nd edn. Lippincott-Raven, Hagerstown, MD
- Sprangers M A G, Aaronson N K 1992 The role of health care providers and significant others in evaluating the quality of life of patients with chronic disease: A review. Journal of Clinical Epidemiology 45: 743–60

WHOQOL Group 1993 Measuring the Quality of Life: The Development of the World Health Organization Quality of Life Instrument. WHO, Geneva, Switzerland

C. A. O'Boyle

Quangos in Politics

Quasi-governmental (q-g) bodies exist in their thousands, particularly in the developed countries. Their degree of quasi-official standing varies greatly. A simple typology, with examples, would offer (a) direct public services by national government ('g') itself (e.g., US Post Office); (b) indirect service by a state industry ('q-g') (e.g., the UK's Royal Mail); (c) a more indirect service by a wide variety of 'agencies,' 'quangos' (the loose British term) or 'public bodies.'

This wider q-g class extends to commercial firms and other private bodies which contract, in some sense, with government to provide a regulated service, perhaps in a privileged market position (telephone, bus or train companies in many countries). Given their official legal status as companies, foundations, charities, etc., these latter deliverers of public services are more 'quasi-private' than quasi-governmental.

When the state creates or sponsors a body to act as its agent, problems of democratic accountability are raised and can only be managed politically rather than solved by any particular method of appointment or regulatory regime. These relationships do not involve full privatization (sale of public assets into the private sector) but may involve contracting public sector work to the private sector or to this third sector of q-g bodies.

1. The Quasi-governmental Sectors

In the more advanced and elaborate political systems, quasi-governmental (q-g) bodies have increasingly come to deliver or even devise public policies and services on a noncivil service basis. Managerial assertions that the q-g approach to public services offers better quality have claimed intellectual support from organization theory. Political assertions that the state should itself perform fewer tasks in general and avoid some particular types of task altogether have arisen from antistatist, procommercial or procivil society values. Separating practical issues of how to improve public policy design and delivery from ideological and normative issues of what the state should be doing with its direct budgets and civil service cadres is an essential step in understanding the q-g phenomenon.

Any body which is not part of central or local government may be intended (or may come) to act in an q-g role. Its formal standing may be as an official body ('agency' or, in the UK, 'quango' – quasi-autonomous national government organization), perhaps specifically created by law ('statutory') with its own controlling board. It may be a corporation (company, firm) whether 'for-profit' (commercial) or 'not-for-profit' (philanthropic, charitable). It may be a voluntary membership organization made up of individuals, corporations (a trade association) or other types of body such as schools or colleges. Whatever it once was or may appear to still be, any body which stands outside the formal state bureaucracy may come to behave as a quasi-official extension of state authority. This process commonly has a legal basis (the body undertakes government contracts to provide public services) or a financial one (receiving official grants for its charitable, artistic, or equivalent work). Occasionally, a private body becomes, in effect, quasi-governmental without contracts or other money passing to it but on a simply political and psychological level: the body helps the government by providing information and access to a problem area or target group and is rewarded with consultative status which draws it close to official policies and thinking.

2. Government-appointed Bodies

The rise of a quasi-governmental sector in advanced political systems displays two broad types of body within great variety of detail: 'public bodies' created by governments to do a policy job on a q-g basis, and existing private bodies (commercial, philanthropic, representative, or fraternal) which become significantly q-g in their attitude and behaviour. The former group is always more prominent and significant for public service delivery and therefore also for the problem of 'independence versus accountability' which arises from unelected bodies disposing of public functions and budgets. These bodies are distinguishable from central or local government's own bureaucratic cadres by their separate titles, budgets, governing boards and (latterly) development and 'business' plans, performance targets and other fashionable banners (even though mainstream civil services now often also display them). It is the separate, government-appointed and paid board which most clearly distinguishes these q-g bodies from the government's own direct operations because this board is a legal entity and employer, doing its work through its own staff and contracted or cooperative links with other bodies, including commercial suppliers.

Various terms have been applied since the q-g sector first attracted systematic academic attention some 30 years ago (Smith and Hague 1971, Smith 1975). The term 'the contract state' reflected the US scene with its easier acceptance of business-type contracts for public programs, notably during and after the War on Poverty period. British assumptions (and therefore language) about public services eschewed talk of contracts, although a few had long existed, in public education, for example (Hague et al. 1975). Different theories of the essential exclusivity of state functions were encouraging or discouraging new forms of 'agency' or 'intermediary body' in different European systems, notably in the more pluralist Netherlands or Scandinavia and the more statist France or Italy, respectively.

The British tradition combined a strong state theory, stewarded by a very powerful senior civil service, within a quite rich civil society context—including, for example, the senior professions and leading charities at national level. Nominated public bodies with specialist remits and only generalized 'upwards' accountability to government ministers (and none 'downwards' to users or recipients of their services) were quite familiar devices. In this soil, the British 'quango' form multiplied (Barker 1982). The flexibility and precise control offered by a single-purpose public body was generally irresistible to both parties in government and to their senior civil servants who continually steer and supervise these bodies. By 1996, a properly functional independent analysis of British appointed public bodies found some 6,400 being funded (and therefore in some way controlled) by central government. The 5,750 executive (cf. purely advisory) bodies were judged to have spent some £60B of public money in 1994–5, an increase of 50 percent at constant prices in 16 years, following continual transfers of expenditure functions from central and local governments to new nominated bodies and the creation of new programs under these 'quango' auspices (Hall and Weir 1996).

3. The Politics of Quasi-governmental Bodies

The most ideological and most partisan of political debates about q-g bodies deliberately created by the state seems to have arisen in the UK: the 'quango issue.' Superficially (and tediously) the two main political parties have, for 25 years, accused each other of abuse of the patronage involved. A more serious criticism of all appointees is their lack of accountability. Continental Europe seems to have been spared much of this British conflict, perhaps because business, labor unions, the churches and other civil society formations accept each other and expect to share in delivering public services through special agencies or boards, under broadly consensual political oversight. The Dutch have their three 'pillars' of social service delivery (Catholic, Protestant, and secular), while in Germany it is officially polite for organized capital and organized labor to call themselves 'social partners' (Barker 1997). The USA no more follows that custom than does the UK, but the vast proliferation of appointed and joint bodies which constitute 'America's quangos' seems not to have sparked either union-business rivalry as to patronage or specific partisan hostility. The long-term right wing rumblings against 'big government' subsumes these many 'agencies' within broader issues of overall federal or state civil service numbers and public expenditure levels. Academic critiques have often also taken a broad view of problems and pathologies (Burns 1994, Carter 1994, Kettl 1988).

4. The Rationale of Quasi-governmental Bodies

The principal practical rationale for creating a new public body to tackle either a novel or a familiar policy task is its specialist character. The new single-purpose agency or quango has been expected to succeed whereas the old, multipurpose government department would wearily add this extra burden to its already overstretched bureaucracy. If the new body's budget and staff are also outside the official civil service total budget and numbers, and if a small, 'dedicated' (specialist) office can bring sensitivity rather than standardized bureaucracy to some novel public policy challenge (such as encouraging ethnic or gender rights, offering drug or HIV health care, making grants to artists and theaters, or promoting community development) then there is no contesting this way forward. The same applies where an existing private body is to be a vehicle for such novel tasks by becoming a government contractor or grantee in return for its experienced and expert work on policy design or delivery.

A further rationale may well apply when professional expertise is crucial to a policy or program. Senior scientists and other experts are very unlikely to become civil servants, much less join the military, and can therefore be employed by the state only on their own ground and terms. The US Air Force and US Army could not get the high-quality operations researchers or mathematicians they needed except by founding the RAND Corporation (initially to analyze bombing targets in the USSR) and an applied mathematics centre on the University of Wisconsin's campus, respectively. Even in the crisis of war, the assorted, mainly British, academic intellectuals who were recruited to break the Enigma and other enemy codes at Bletchley Park ('Station X') in 1940 or the scientists and mathematicians organized into the Manhattan Project to build the US atom bomb would perform their best, or even perform at all, only in a carefully managed academic and civilian setting, as their governments realized. These civilian-military contrasts were merely one example of the lessons of organization theory which have declared the 'flat' (not hierarchical) 'open' (not sectionalized) 'organic' or flexible and small agency or company to be the best setting for creative, innovative, interactive or sensitive tasks. As modern governments have been pressed into policy work which is either technically demanding (requiring expert staff) or socially sensitive (requiring nontraditional official styles and methods) so the appeal of specialist, flexible, and suitably qualified staff working in a small single-issue body has steadily increased. With obvious differences in funding and controls, these basic characteristics make either a specifically created new public agency ('quango') or an existing private body drawn in to q-g status the attractive option.

5. The Dilemma of Independence vs. Accountability

The essence of the q-g problem is that practical reasoning favors a democratically responsive government trying to obtain good policy or policy delivery by creating or recruiting a specialist agency ('quango') to concentrate on that job. The trickier the task, in political, technical, or social terms, the greater the appeal of this method, in many cases at least. But this very difficulty and sensitivity prompts critics to claim that democratic accountability to elected representatives (national or local) is particularly needed. Having an unelected body of government appointees running (say) the local mass transit, or even regular public grants to theaters or art galleries may be tolerable but life and death decisions on (say) drug budget allocations to hospitals or decisions affecting employment must be taken directly by elected representatives. To produce the advantages of flexibility, innovation, and effective informality and to attract the most talented and expert staffs or consultants, a q-g body does need to be independent of day-to-day control.

This dilemma of operational independence (in search of creative quality of service) versus public accountability (in support of democratic legitimacy) can only be softened, not solved. A q-g body's initial pioneering independence could be time-limited and fuller reporting and answering of questions and debate then imposed upon it. Turnover of board members could be formally encouraged or even required. In general, an 'explanatory accountability' regime is needed for the army of q-g bodies which advanced political systems now maintain (AMA 1995). Although specific cases or issues are not normally removable or reversible, board members can be made to explain their views and decisions. Rules requiring openness, transparency, and full reporting would all illuminate this explanatory accountability. Even this working culture would inhibit some valuable creative independence in some policy fields. A statutory duty to explain itself to a possibly critical public would be a major challenge for any q-g body, particularly if the courts are also open to calls for their judicial review of any such explanations of actual decisions which appear to have been based on mistakes or illogical argument. The standard work on the British position (Skelcher 1998) explores these ideas.

6. A New Sector of Government and Society

So many tasks of policy formation and delivery; of regulation of private activity 'affected with the public interest' (to use the traditional US phrase); and of social innovation are now required in advanced democratic societies that the rise of this middle sector, standing between state and private sectors can be no surprise. Its lack of much political controversy in these systems suggests a declining popular interest in democratic principles in favor of practical, consumerist attitudes to public services.

See also: Policy Knowledge: Nonprofit Institutions; Public Administration, Politics of

Bibliography

- AMA (Association of Metropolitan Authorities) 1995 Changing the Face of Quangos: Proposals for the Reform of Local Appointed Bodies. AMA, London
- Barker A (ed.) 1982 Quangos in Britain: The Making of Public Policy Networks. Macmillan, London
- Barker A 1997 Other people's quangos: Quasi-government in seven countries. In: Flinders M (ed.) How to Make Quangos More Democratic. Charter 88 Publications, London
- Burns N 1994 The Formation of American Local Governments: Private Values in Public Institutions. Oxford University Press, Oxford
- Carter S L 1994 The Confirmation Mess: Cleaning-Up the Federal Appointment Process. Basic Books, New York
- Hague D C, Mackenzie W J M, Barker A (eds.) 1975 Public Policy and Private Interests: The Institutions of Compromise. Macmillan, London
- Hall W, Weir S 1996 The untouchables: Power and accountability in the Quango state. Democratic Audit Paper #8 The Scarman Trust, London
- Kettl D F 1988 Government by Proxy: Managing Federal Programs. Congressional Quarterly Press, Washington, DC
- Select Committee on Public Administration (1999) Quangos Sixth Report, 1998–99, HC 209 – 1 and 2, 9 November 1999. The Stationery Office, London, Vols 1 and 2I
- Skelcher C 1998 The Appointed State: Quasi-Governmental Organizations and Democracy. Open University Press, Buckingham, UK
- Smith B L R (ed.) 1975 The New Political Economy: The Public Use of the Private Sector. Macmillan, London
- Smith B L R, Hague D C (eds.) 1971 The Dilemma of Accountability in Modern Government: Independence Versus Control. Macmillan, London

A. Barker

Quantification in History

'Quantification' refers to a specific method of historical research that departs from the prevalent practice of textual analysis by actually seeking to measure changes in the past. Due to the mass of data to be handled and the complexity of the calculations involved, the application of quantitative methods usually has to be computer-assisted. In contrast to a mere illustration of certain tendencies by tables or graphs, quantification tends to use analytical statistics in order to probe relationships between certain variables. Such statistical analysis also requires a high degree of formalization in the research design that formulates hypotheses to be tested and tries to combine them into models. The final aim of the quantitative approach is not just to explain a particular set of developments but to make a theoretical contribution to some facet of historical understanding.

1. The Rise of Quantification

Within historical research, the development of quantitative methods was a product of a particular constellation during the 1960s. Already during the Enlightenment some scholars had sought to describe socioeconomic developments by compiling time-series, and by the middle of the nineteenth century national governments took on the task of determining population trends through a series of censuses. But it took the shift to the 'new social history' a century later to direct historical interests away from affairs of state to mass politics, societal changes, demographic transformations, or economic growth. At the same time the arrival of mainframe computers, followed eventually by powerful PCs, made it possible to handle large amounts of data and to use complicated statistical procedures in customized form via statistical packages such as SPSS or SAS. In order to explore these exciting new subjects with novel techniques, historians became interested in the theoretical constructs of the social sciences, borrowing eclectically from political science, sociology, or demography and somewhat less so from economics. The result of this interaction was the rapid development of a new hybrid, combining elements of historical research with social scientific analysis.

During the 1970s, this 'social science history' or 'historical social science' was successfully institutionalized. In the United States the multitude of initiatives in history and the neighboring disciplines combined in founding the Social Science History Association in 1975, and made its annual meeting a showcase of the most innovative work. In France many of the long-term community studies, produced by the Annales School, turned quantitative, compiling detailed time-series of population, prices, or wages and probing their inter-relationship. In Germany, the quantifiers linked with the theory-oriented project of a Historische Sozialwissenschaft to create a vigorous organization, called QUANTUM. Within the decade, a spate of new journals emerged to provide publication outlets for the new work, such as the Journal of Social History, Journal of Interdisciplinary History, Historical Methods Newsletter, Social Science History, Histoire et Mesure, and Historical Social Research. New Textbooks (Dollar and Jensen 1971, Floud 1979) as well as influential anthologies (Aydelotte et al. 1972, Lorwin and Price 1972) provided a powerful platform for the propagation of quantitative research.

2. Research Contributions

The first field transformed by quantitatively-oriented work was the new political history that differed from its predecessor by its attention to collective phenomena (Bogue 1983). For instance, Michael Kater investigated the rise of the Nazi movement in Germany by analyzing its membership files, indicating precisely which social stratum, religious group, gender, region, etc. joined the bandwagon at what time. For democratic societies like the US, Lee Benson's or Alan Bogue's analysis of electoral behavior proved quite productive, since comparing returns over time made it possible to establish which polls were the 'critical elections' when party realignments were transformed by 'ethno-cultural' or other factors. For parliaments without party discipline, Thomas B. Alexander's roll-call analysis also offered a powerful instrument for establishing who actually voted with whom, indicating what networks dominated legislative behavior. This retro-projection of political science methods gradually provided a firmer empirical basis for an analysis of the transformation of mass politics in the last two centuries.

The second area that was deeply affected by quantitative methods and conceptual borrowing from sociology was the new social history (Stearns 1985). As 'history from the bottom up,' this perspective examined previously untouched serial records, such as police files, employment registers, or draft books in order to infer from the behavior of ordinary people what they might have felt and thought. The appeal of this effort was the diffusion of its topics, since the labor history of the Tillys included subjects as different as proletarian living conditions and their collective efforts at protesting through strikes. Another question, treated e.g., by Hartmut Kaelble concerned the pattern of social mobility, comparing the relative openness of societies to upward or downward movement over time or across borders. A related issue was the societal impact of education that required an analysis of the enrollment and composition of schools or universities in order to get at changes in educational opportunities. These quantitative probes produced much new and sometimes conflicting information about the lower orders, the make-up of institutions, and basic trends in societal transformations.

A third area propelled by computer-assisted source collection and statistical analysis was the field of historical demography (Hareven and Vinovskis 1978). For time-periods before national censuses, the demographers faced the challenge of reaggregating vital statistics from the ground up by converting parish registers into reliable measures of natality, nuptiality, or mortality. Under the direction of Anthony Wrigley the Cambridge population project established the outlines of a population history for England, while the demography center in Umea undertook a national project of quantifying church records so as to explain demographic changes in Sweden. American demographers like John Demos and Tamara Hareven instead combined individual life-event data to scrutinize the development of family structures from extended via stem to nuclear families and the like. Other scholars such as Roderick Floud and Richard Steckel studied changes in the height of military recruits or slaves in order to develop more accurate measures of social deprivation. This historical demography amassed a source base for the prestatistical area and produced interesting interpretative concepts for explaining the population transition.

The final area in which quantification transformed research priorities and methods was the new economic history (Davis and Engerman 1987). Redirecting attention away from entrepreneurship, 'cliometrics' as it was also called, inspired efforts to establish indicators of national production and income for the prestatistical age as well as to transform information from manuscript censuses into published form. In the US, a heated debate revolved around the profitability of slavery, with Robert Fogel's and Stanley Engerman's claims producing much controversy, due to their combination of economic and moral argumentation. Much attention also focused on the key factors of economic development, such as railroads, with some scholars actually arguing that their impact had been exaggerated. In Europe discussions revolved around the pattern of industrialization instead, with some specialists like Sidney Pollard proposing a more complex regional diffusion model. On the whole, the quantitative impulse made economic history more rigorous and theoretical, but removed it at the same time further from the mainstream of historical debate.

By the 1980s these signal contributions had managed to overcome traditionalist skepticism and to establish quantification as a new and growing subfield within the historical discipline. Though they were sometimes difficult to read for laymen, high-quality monographs convinced reluctant granting agencies to fund major collective initiatives, such as the Philadelphia Social History Project, directed by Theodore Hershberg. The number of articles with graphs and tables in respected historical journals began to reach almost one-quarter (Kousser 1989). Opinion surveys of the profession suggested that most scholars expected quantification to be here to stay. Even if some critics still bemoaned the spottiness of graduate training in this area, the rapid rise of quantitative methods in historical research had been impressive and their future prospects seemed secure.

3. The Culturalist Challenge

During the decade of the 1980s, however, the seemingly unstoppable progress of the quantitative history 'project' began to stall. By the middle of the decade, the number of quantitative journal articles and the frequency of graduate courses in quantitative techniques suddenly began to drop (Reynolds 1998). It seems that over the past 10 years (plus or minus five!) quantitative history has become increasingly marginalized, since a variety of other methods have risen to prominence, making so-called 'quants' seem rather quaint. Ironically, the demise of quantitative history has occurred simultaneously with the development of enhanced technology, more complete datasets, and increasingly sophisticated models and methods, which, taken together, have rendered quantitative history potentially more useful than ever before.

The factors responsible for this loss of attention are still being debated vigorously. Some scholars attribute the problems afflicting quantitative history to the initial overselling of the method by insufferable practitioners who promised more insights than their research was able to deliver. These critics, comprised largely of traditionalists, have always been suspicious of the proposition that history had anything to learn from the social sciences and have long bristled at heady sentiments such as that expressed by Emmanuel Le Roy Ladurie who predicted in 1967 that in the future 'the historian will be a programmer or he will be nothing' (Rabb 1983). No wonder that such skeptics gladly seized upon Bernard Bailyn's and Lawrence Stone's calls for a revival of the narrative.

Another reason was the cultural turn of many younger historians who rejected both the materialist premises and positivist vision of most practitioners of quantitative history. To these critics, quantitative representations of the past were at once too cold, too remote, too impersonal, and too abstract. Large datasets were said to dehumanize, and 'soulless' quantifiers were assumed to be ready, like Marx's bourgeoisie, to drown all human sentiment 'in the icy water of egotistical calculation' (Coclanis 1992). Moreover, in making fetishes of rigor and precision, quantitative historians purportedly attempted to exact more from the vast, vague, largely unknowable past than historians had any right to claim. Instead, the past was reconfigured as a 'foreign country,' to invoke the title of historian David Lowenthal's influential 1985 book.

The changing demographics of the historical profession, particularly in the United States, also served to reinforce the trend towards qualitative approaches.

As history opened up to women and minorities—groups, generally speaking, less inclined to pursue quantitative approaches to the past—quantitative history could be expected to decline in a relative sense. Just as women and minorities have been under-represented in the hard sciences over the years, they have proven less interested in the more social scientific sides of history. Though both groups have embraced social history as a vehicle for their identity politics, relatively few of their members can be found in fields such as economic history, historical demography, or quantitative political history.

During the 1980s, many historians turned instead to cultural anthropology for methodological inspiration. Rejecting the rigorous, formal and remote, data-driven 'truths' sought by quantifiers, scholars interested in experience and meaning preferred in-depth microstudies, whether of single villages, small groups, or even well-documented individuals. Gradually, 'thick description' came to trump ecological regression, crude death rates, and multiple R-squares, no matter how robust! The philosophical basis of this shift to anthropology was the rise of postmodernism, which deprecated the rationalism, universalism, and empiricism of historical social science. By the late 1990s the ascendancy of cultural studies left quantifiers off in a corner silently counting all by themselves.

4. The Continued Importance of Quantification

The current disregard of quantitative methods in the discipline is unfortunate, since quantification continues to be an essential technique for historical research. Some questions can best be answered through recourse to what Sir William Petty referred to in the seventeenth century as 'Number, Weight, or Measure,' and it is more than 'physics envy' that has drawn scholars to quantitative analyses of the past. Even after conceding that many early practitioners were a bit overly zealous in their claims, it seems fair to suggest that quantitative history can provide the methodological discipline, intellectual rigor, and moral purpose that subjectivist forms of history often lack. With all due respect to such influential postmodernist thinkers such as Baudrillard and Lyotard not every aspect of the past is positional, free-floating, and contextual.

The utility, indeed, the necessity of quantitative history seems more compelling in light of important new developments in the field. Technological constraints have eased considerably, for example, as miniaturization and digitalization in the electronics industry have advanced. Today's personal computers, programmable calculators, and other platforms offer tremendous power and, thus, computational possibilities to quantitative historians. Similarly new developments in statistical packages, spreadsheets, CD-ROM technology, GIS (geographic information systems), and the like have vastly expanded the analytical reach of software that can be applied to historical questions.

The increasing availability of new and/or enhanced sources and datasets also presents unprecedented research opportunities. Materials readily retrievable from established institutions such as the ICPSR (Inter-university Consortium for Political and Social Research) in Ann Arbor, Michigan, and data available on-line from the World Bank, the IMF, and other governmental, quasigovernmental, and nongovernmental organizations and agencies are transforming the nature (and sites) of scholarly production. The new CD-ROM version of the Historical Statistics of the United States, datasets assembled by Yale's Cambodia Genocide Project, the University of Minnesota's IPUMS (Integrated Public Use Micro Sample) Project, drawn from US census records, and the East German central cadre files—to cite but four examples—are of similar scholarly importance, and have tremendous potential as teaching tools. Various research projects undertaken under the auspices of, or promoted by the Association for History and Computing, founded in England in 1987, have proven extremely useful as well.

At the same time, quantitative historians have in recent years developed more sophisticated methods, allowing them to analyze and interpret historical questions with greater sensitivity and precision. Economic historians, for example, have utilized both game-theoretical approaches and advanced econometric techniques to excellent effect, and anthropometric historians have employed important new procedures from auxology and biostatistics to facilitate their reconstruction of our biological past (Steckel 1995). Economic and social historians, along with historical sociologists, have also begun to employ regression analysis in more subtle and refined ways, using temporally recursive regression procedures, when appropriate, instead of standard time-series regression techniques.

Other quantitative historians have begun to 'push the envelope' in different ways, in so doing, often trespassing on the territory of scholars in other social sciences or even in the humanities. Thus, as procedures such as social network analysis (SNA), event-structure analysis, and quantitative language analysis are successfully employed in answering historical questions—quantitative analyses of major 'texts' in order to produce so-called semantic grammars, for example—non- and anti-quantifiers ignore the results at their peril. In addition, quantitative historians' recent incorporation of spatial relationships into historical analysis through spatial-effects regression models and the like has produced similarly impressive results (Griffin and van der Linden 1998).

At the beginning of the twenty-first century, the future prospects of quantification in history are therefore indistinct. Clearly, individual quantitative historians, among the profession's most avid proponents of scientific rationalism, universalism, and empiricism, are continuing to expand the frontiers of their research and are still making important contributions. But whether or not the interest of mainstream historians will return to quantification and the subfield as such will ever again recapture the excitement and energy it possessed in the 1970s remains an open question. The relative popularity of various approaches does not just depend on the quality of their monographic work but on the larger tides of intellectual fashion. However, one unexpected development offers some cause for optimism: though quantitative historians hang on for their professional lives, historically-inclined political scientists, economists, and sociologists are winning kudos in their respective disciplines by bringing quantitative methods to bear on the past.

See also: Economic History; Economics, History of; Historical Demography; Historiography and Historical Thought: Current Trends; History and the Social Sciences; History: Theories and Methods; Measurement Theory: History and Philosophy; Positivism, History of; Postmodernism: Methodology; Prosopography (Collective Biography); Quantification in the History of the Social Sciences; Social History

Bibliography

- Aydelotte W O, Bogue A G, Fogel R W (eds.) 1972 The Dimensions of Quantitative Research in History. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Bogue A G 1983 Clio and the Bitch Goddess. Sage Publications, Beverly Hills, CA
- Coclanis P A 1992 History by the numbers: why counting matters. OAH Magazine of History 7: 5–8
- Davis L E, Engerman S 1987 Cliometrics: the state of the science. Historical Methods 20: 97–106
- Dollar C M, Jensen R J 1971 Historian's Guide to Statistics. Holt, Rinehard and Winston, New York
- Floud R 1979 An Introduction to Quantitative Methods for Historians, 2nd edn. Methuen, London
- Griffin L J, van der Linden M (eds.) 1998 New methods for social history. International Review of Social History 43: 3–8 (Supp. 6)
- Grossbart S R 1992 Quantitative and social science methods for historians. Historical Methods 25: 100–20
- Hareven T K, Vinovskis M A (eds.) 1978 Family and Population in Nineteenth Century America. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Haskins L, Jeffrey K 1990 Understanding Quantitative History. MIT Press, Cambridge, MA
- Hudson P 2000 History by numbers: An introduction to quantitative approaches. Oxford University Press, New York
- Jarausch K H, Hardy K 1991 Quantitative Methods for Historians. University of North Carolina Press, Chapel Hill, NC

- Kocka J 1984 Theories and quantification in history. Social Science History 8: 169–78
- Kousser J M 1989 The state of social science history in the late 1980s. Historical Methods 22: 13–20
- Lorwin V R, Price J M (eds.) 1972 The Dimensions of the Past. Yale University Press, New Haven, CT
- Rabb T K 1983 The development of quantification in historical research. Journal of Interdisciplinary History 13: 591–601
- Reynolds J F 1998 Do historians count anymore? Historical Methods 31: 141–8
- Stearns P N 1985 Social history and history: a progress report. Journal of Social History 19: 319–34
- Steckel R H 1995 Stature and the standard of living. Journal of Economic Literature 33: 1903–40

K. H. Jarausch and P. A. Coclanis

Quantification in the History of the Social Sciences

Quantification means, very broadly, the use of numbers to comprehend objects and events. While quantification is often identified with science, it has been equally significant for business, administration, and the professions. Quantitative methods had a crucial role in shaping the social and behavioral sciences, and remain central to them. The purpose of this article is not to supply a practical guide to the use of quantitative tools in social science, but to examine their backgrounds and assess their cultural significance from the standpoint of science studies and the history of science. In modern times, quantitative methods and the numbers they produce have assumed a powerful role in most societies as intersecting discourses of science, administration, and the public sphere. This article emphasizes the more public uses of quantification.

The broad category of quantification refers to several allied but distinct human activities. Mathematization means the characterization of objects and events in terms of mathematical relationships. While it is not the main topic of this article, it is of course relevant. The expression of scientific theories in mathematical terms has provided one important reason for relying on quantitative or numerical data. There have been other reasons of a technical, administrative, or moral kind. Among the more empirical forms of quantification, measurement grew out of such practical activities as surveying lands or buying and selling. Counting, the basic tool for assigning numbers to sets of discrete objects was deployed for such tasks as inventorying one's possessions or recording human populations. Calculation refers loosely to methods for combining and manipulating numerical information into more readily useable forms. Statistics, a body of methods for analyzing quantitative information, is discussed historically in other essays in these volumes, and receives also some attention here.

1. Theories and Measures

As early as the 1660s, and more systematically from about 1830, social and economic investigators held up quantification as the proper method of science. The growth of university-based social disciplines in the twentieth century, and especially after about 1930, was attended by a widespread faith that through numbers, social research could be made genuinely scientific. A generation or more of positivistically-inclined researchers looked to systematic measurement as the proper foundation for solid, mathematical theory. Some compared its progress with the development of physics in the seventeenth century, and anticipated a breakthrough in the near future.

The most influential historical and philosophical writers on science in the postwar period took almost the opposite view. Koyré (1968), whose philosophical studies of seventeenth-century science inspired the first generation of professional historians of science in the anglophone world, seriously doubted that mere measurements could offer much to a new or unformed science. Science could never have become mathematical, he argued, through the mere processing of empirical measurements. He doubted that Galileo had learned much from rolling balls down inclined planes. The new kinematics applied not to real objects, but to abstract bodies in geometrical space, and Galileo must have derived his law of falling bodies mainly by working out logically the consequences of what he already knew. This mathematical and metaphysical work was, for Koyré, the most important achievement of the new science. Indeed, only through theory had the measures attained scientific meaning. Kuhn 1961, 1976) reaffirmed Koyré's broad argument and provided a historical perspective that reached forward to the nineteenth century. The most successful sciences of the seventeenth-century 'scientific revolution,' including mechanics, astronomy, and geometrical optics, had already been mathematical in ancient times. The more Baconian, experimental studies of the early modern period were comparatively ineffective until a 'second scientific revolution,' beginning around 1800, when new scientific objects such as electricity and heat began to be comprehended mathematically.

Scholars in science studies since about 1980 have tended to dethrone theory in favor of a more respectful attention to scientific practices. Accordingly, they take more seriously the quantification of phenomena that have not been grasped by exact laws. Just as the life of experiment has never been strictly subordinated to theory, so numbers have often been independent of higher mathematics. They are linked not just to theoretical science, but also, and perhaps even more consequentially, to economic and administrative changes. The history of ideas alone cannot convey their full significance.

2. Quantities and Standards

Quantity is not first of all the language of science, imported as something alien into everyday affairs, but an indispensable part of the fabric of life. Yet the aspiration to science has gone a long way toward reshaping the role of numbers and measures in the world. In this—as Max Weber suggested—we find much in common between bureaucratic and scientific rationality. Mathematics has often, and plausibly, been held up as an exemplar of universalized knowledge. The rules of arithmetic, or constants like π , are the same everywhere, at least in principle. Yet the universalism of measures and numbers, particularly when these have empirical content, has been achieved only in a limited way, by overcoming great obstacles. Even now, even in the industrialized West, quantities and prices are managed in everyday activities such as shopping by techniques quite different from those taught in schools (Lave 1986). Before the rise of modern science, in the pre-industrial world, quantification had very different meanings. Numbers were pervasive, but for most purposes their use and meanings were thoroughly local. The process through which they gained general validity is one of the crucial transformations of modernity.

2.1 A Plethora of Units

As Kula (1986) has shown, measures remained immensely variable in Europe as late as the eighteenth century. This was partly by design, since small cities and lesser states often claimed the right to define their own weights and measures as a mark of autonomy and an obstacle to rule by higher authorities. A diversity of measures, however, is the natural state of things wherever the pressures of commerce and administration have been insufficient to bring about unification. At a local level, authorities took some pains to reduce the ambiguity of measurement. A bushel measure, valid for the region, would often be fixed to the town hall, and could be used to settle disputes. In the next town, however, measures might well be different, and over greater distances they varied considerably. The subtle geography of measures, moreover, was not defined exclusively by distance. Milk, oil, and wine came in different units; measures of cloth depended on the width of looms, and also on the costliness of fabric and weave. The practices of measurement, too, were complexly nuanced. A bushel measure, even if the volume was fixed, could be tall and narrow or short and wide; the wheat might or might not be compacted by being poured in from a considerable height; and a complex set of conditions governed whether to heap the bushel, and by how much. Parties to a transaction often negotiated about measures rather than about prices. Add to this the consideration that almost nothing was decimalized, not even money, and it is evident that arithmetical calculation provided no fixed routine for managing affairs or settling disputes (Kula 1986, Frängsmyr et al. 1990). The conversions required by trade provided an important source of employment for mathematicians.

The simplification and standardization of measures was encouraged by the expansion of long-distance trade, but was achieved primarily by governments in alliance with scientists. Among Europeans, it was the British who came nearest to creating uniformity of measures in the eighteenth century. A more systematic, almost utopian, scheme, the metric system, was initiated in the 1790s under the French Revolution. In its most ambitious form this included a new calendar, with the declaration of the Republic defining the Year One, using months of 30 days divided into weeks of 10 days, and even a few decimalized clocks, beating out 100 seconds per minute. The meter was set so that 10 million of them would reach from pole to equator, in the vain hope of integrating geodetic and astronomical measures with those on a human scale (Gillispie 1997). Hence, bold expeditions were sent out into a disordered countryside to survey and measure a meridian. Although the meter was justified in part as a response to pleas in the cahiers de doléance for fixed measures, against the social and economic power implied by seigniorial discretion, the highly rationalized metric system of decimalized conversions and strange Greek names—of milliliters, kilometers, and centigrams—went well beyond this. Not until the July Monarchy, after 1830, did the metric system begin to succeed even in France (Alder 1995). In time, however, it has come to provide a common set of measures for most of the world, with the United States a notable, though partial, holdout.

A precise and maximally rigorous definition of units is a basic element in the infrastructure of modern life. The role of standardized measures in systems of manufacturing based on interchangeable parts is widely recognized. They are indispensable also for large-scale networks such as electric power distribution, telephony, and, by now, computers and the Internet. A collaboration of scientists and bureaucrats was required to create them. In some cases, as with the electrical units defined in the latter nineteenth century, eminent scientists such as James Clerk Maxwell, William Thomson (Kelvin), and Hermann von Helmholtz were deeply involved in the fixing of standards.

Other units, far from the domain of scientific theory, play an indispensable role in the regulation of modern life. Measures of effluent concentrations, for example, are deployed by environmental agencies to regulate pollutants. They depend on meticulous specification not only of instruments, but also of sampling methods, training of technicians, custody of materials, and so on. Since penalties and taxes often depend on them, they are always vulnerable to challenge. In this domain, as in many others, an immense apparatus of instrumentation and control lies behind what scientists and citizens have the luxury (usually) of regarding as 'raw,' or merely 'descriptive,' data.

2.2 Producing Uniformity

Units and instruments are not by themselves sufficient to quantify effectively. A quantifiable world contains reasonably homogeneous objects, objects whose measures can be compared, or that can be grouped together and counted. Nature and unregulated human labor produce a few of these, though real uniformity occurs mainly on a scale—for example, the molecular one—that is not readily accessible to the human senses. Physics was quantified partly in terms of abstractly 'mathematical' entities, such as forces, and partly through increasingly rigorous experimental controls, involving an expanding apparatus of instruments.

In the social world, where quantification is also a tool of administration, these same regulatory processes have helped to produce new quantifiable entities. The investigation and compensation of unemployment, for example, solidified the category of 'the unemployed.' To collect unemployment insurance requires that a person meet certain standards, which are more or less closely monitored, and to which persons who lack work are encouraged to conform. They also must enroll themselves, thereby providing basic data for the statistics. The point here is not that government offices cause people to be without work, though mechanisms of compensation will certainly affect the rates. It is that official categories sharpen definitions, and so help to create countable entities. Most human and social types are variable, or at least fuzzy at the margins (Hacking 1995). Quantification is allied to processes that make them more uniform, and hence countable. A similar story can be told about ethnicity or mental illness. Economic categories such as profits, investment, and trade, are similarly dependent on the processes through which they are recorded and regulated.

3. The Authority of Calculation

Numbers and measures are not merely tools of description and analysis. They work also as guides to action, especially public action. An explicit and formal analysis, often largely quantitative in form, is by now required for a variety of public decisions involving investment or regulation, especially in the United States and Britain. Business organizations, too, rely increasingly on measures and projections in order to make decisions. These analyses are often expressed in money terms, and their modern expansion attests to a triumph of capitalism. But public reliance on economic quantification is by no means an imitation of its commercial uses. The tools of quantitative analysis were developed for as much for government as for business purposes, and have become increasingly dependent on academic researchers. In the background is an evolving political and administrative culture, reflecting changes in the status and composition of elites.

3.1 Commensuration

It is characteristically modern to suppose that a conscientious decision should involve explicit consideration of the available data. Decision by calculation goes beyond this, in expecting a course of action to be dictated objectively by facts. The prototype of this ideal of public reason is cost-benefit analysis. In practice, cost-benefit often involves predictions in many domains, including weather patterns, health, hydrology, ecology, and commerce, but its most distinctive aspect is the attempt to convert a great diversity of considerations into a common financial metric. The difficulties of commensuration are most acute in regard to such considerations as human lives lost or saved, the disappearance of biological populations, or the degradation of a beautiful landscape. To the lay public, this appears equivalent to sacrificing a life for a sum of money, and of very doubtful morality (Sagoff 1988).

Economics provides a rationale for equations of this kind. Economists argue that people routinely accept increased risks for better wages. Neoclassical economic theories presuppose an underlying variable, utility, which individuals seek to maximize. Even if it cannot be directly measured, personal choices therefore involve some implicit commensuration of pleasures and responsibilities, acquisition and leisure, friendship and personal ambition. Cost-benefit analysis did not, however, develop out of theoretical economics, but from specific political and administrative problems of the mid-twentieth century. Engineers, not economists, initially faced the immense difficulties of incorporating life, health, recreation, and scenic beauty along with economic development as they proffered measures of the costs and benefits of water projects. Despite political opposition to some of these measures, a political logic of rationalized choice made them necessary none the less. The task was to devise methods that led to reasonably consistent answers, and where necessary to put aside what seemed their implausibility or even immorality. Beginning in the 1950s, economists and social scientists were recruited into agencies like the US Army Corps of Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation to provide more consistent or more acceptable solutions to these thorny problems (Espeland 1998, Porter 1995).

3.2 Trust and Impersonality

Academic problems of social measurement and commensuration are, thus, embedded in social and political conditions that put a premium on scientific objectivity. In important ways, of course, science and philosophy have always been concerned with objectivity, in the sense of truth. Since the seventeenth century, the relation of fact and values has become more problematical, and for some purposes the credibility of science has been enhanced by its separation from the 'subjective' domain of values. The ambition to provide a scientific, possibly quantitative, basis for public decisions remained quixotic or utopian until at least the late eighteenth century. It remained unrealistic wherever an aristocratic political class retained power. Not everyone would have assented to Frédéric Le Play's assessment that numbers have become necessary only in democracies, where leaders no longer control the wisdom of birth and experience. But the aspiration to replace judgment with objective, quantitative rules grew up in situations where elite authority had become suspect.

The move by American state engineers to an increasingly rigorous cost-benefit methodology was a response to systematic challenge, and exemplifies this point (Porter 1995). So also do other exemplary tools of 'mechanical objectivity,' such as the accountant's bottom line and the test of statistical significance of the social scientist or medical researcher. Accountants, for example, did not abandon willingly what many saw as their professional responsibility to offer an expert judgment of the financial condition of firms. They did so, rather, in the context of regulatory pressure and public distrust. This must be understood in the context of a broad cultural and political history of the twentieth-century, and especially of the United States. Some basic features of that history would include the growth of government, frequent interagency conflict, increasingly effective opposition to administrative secrecy, and public distrust of 'bureaucracy.' The unprecedented quantitative enthusiasm of postwar social science involved, along with its optimism about science, a renunciation of the personal and the subjective that was nicely adapted to contemporary political circumstances. Allied to it was the institutionalized reliance on quantification taught in management and policy schools.

4. A Historical Perspective on Social Science Quantification

Reflective accounts about the social and behavioral sciences have often supposed that their fields have short histories, and that the pursuit of quantification has meant following the track of natural science triumphant. But the rise of a quantitative ethos in natural science can be dated no earlier than the mid-eighteenth century. Systematic measurement until then was almost confined to astronomy, for which a host of 'mathematical instruments' had been developed in China, India, the Near East, and Europe. Many were geometrical and not numerical. Their purposes were practical as well as scientific: to survey land, navigate ships, calculate calendars and horoscopes. Barometers and thermometers helped to extend the domain of measurement into meteorology. Measurement in early modern Europe was associated as closely (or more closely) with natural history as with experimental physics. By 1750, instruments were deployed systematically to measure mountains and other natural wonders and, thus, to lend precision to the appreciation of nature. The development of an exact science of electricity in the later eighteenth century marked the triumph of experimental quantification (Heilbron 1979). Measurement had also become routine in technological endeavors, such as mineral assaying, decades before Lavoisier and his contemporaries began to insist on its centrality to chemistry.

From this perspective, it would be difficult to argue that political and economic studies lagged behind natural science in their reliance on numbers. Among the early members of the Royal Society of London, founded in 1660, were William Petty and John Graunt. Petty announced a new science of 'political arithmetic,' which in his hands involved speculative estimates of population and of wealth. Graunt is noted for his more strictly empirical compilations from the London bills of mortality. Near the same time, Jan de Wit, the Dutch Stadholder, used rudimentary probability theory to assign rates for the sale of annuities, and the astronomer Edmond Halley calculated the first mortality table. Political arithmetic, which entailed the compilation as well as the analysis of demographic and medical records, flourished in the eighteenth century. At the same time, probability theory was pursued as a mathematical theory of belief and credibility (Hacking 1975, Daston 1988). The philosophe and mathematician Condorcet, a leader of the French Revolution who then was hunted down by it, hoped to develop probability into the theoretical basis for elections and judicial decisions (Baker 1975).

4.1 The Nineteenth Century and the Rise of Statistics

By the early nineteenth century, as Kuhn observed, the natural-historical investigation of heat, electricity, and the physics of light had given way to sciences that were both mathematical and quantitative. Possibly the analysis of mortality records for insurance can be regarded as comparable in certain respects. But the explosive growth of quantification beginning in the 1820s, what Hacking (1990) has called an 'avalanche of printed numbers,' was not concentrated in the experimental sciences. Rather, it involved systematic surveys of stellar positions, terrestrial magnetism, weather phenomena, tides, biogeographical distributions, and, most prominently, social statistics.

The collection and investigation of social numbers had expanded gradually over the course of the eighteenth century. Few Enlightenment states had the bureaucratic means to conduct a full census, and most were disinclined to release such sensitive information to their enemies or even their subjects. In many places, too, the people would have viewed census official as harbingers of new taxes or military conscription, and in Britain the census was blocked by a gentry class that refused to be counted. In contrast to piecemeal efforts at home, there were some systematic surveys abroad, the machinery of the information state having been turned loose first of all in colonial situations. Among European states, Sweden pioneered the regular census, in 1749; its results remained secret until 1764. The French used sampling, of a sort, and enlisted mathematicians such as Pierre Simon Laplace to estimate the population. The US census of 1790 heralded a new era of regular, public censuses, which were encouraged in Europe by French military conquest and by the pressure of wartime mobilization. The British decennial census, for example, was instituted in 1801. Only in the 1830s did bureaucratic professionals begin to take over the collection of social and economic numbers in the most advanced European states.

At the same time, an increasing pace of quantitative study by voluntary organizations made 'statistics,' pursued by 'statists,' a plausible 'science of society.' One model for it was developed by the Belgian Adolphe Quetelet, whose quantitative pursuits ranged from observational astronomy and meteorology to the bureaucratic organization of official statistics. He argued for an alliance of data gathering with mathematical probability, in the quest to uncover 'social laws.' Apart from life insurance, however, most statistical collection was in the control of reformers and administrators with little mathematical knowledge. Their enthusiasm for counting was perhaps indiscriminate, yet it was nurtured by specific anxieties about poverty, sanitation, epidemic disease, economic dislocation, and urban unrest. Social investigation, still more than natural science, was an object of contest, and there were active efforts to organize a social science to speak for working people (Yeo 1996). Karl Marx's immense statistical labors for his Capital, drawing mainly from official British inquiries whose results he praised as honest and reliable, testify impressively to the credibility of social numbers. Middle-class organizations had more staying power than working-class ones, and better standing to claim the mantle of 'social science.' In Britain, the Statistical Society of London (founded 1834) and the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science (1857) joined bureaucrats with professionals and even aristocratic political leaders. In Germany, statistics became a university discipline, which, from about 1860 to 1900, combined empirical quantification with a historicized 'national economics,' in a reformist campaign for state action on behalf of workers and peasants. Some of the founders of social science in America were educated in this tradition, as was Max Weber. Emile Durkheim, too, engaged with it, as his Suicide of 1897 plainly attests (Porter 1986).

The nineteenth-century science of statistics embraced much of the subject matter of the modern social sciences. It overlapped, and sometimes competed, with political economy, political science, geography, anthropology, ethnology, sociology, and demography. These stood for genres, more or less distinct, though not for anything so definite as modern professional disciplines. Their quantitative methods were not identical, but neither were they clearly differentiated from each other or from measurement in biology. There was much uncertainty and debate from 1830 through the end of the century as to whether statistics was a science, with its own subject matter, or only a method. It was resolutely empirical, even to the point that sampling seemed too speculative. Far from being allied to any mathematical social science, statistics was more often at war with deduction and abstract theory. Some, like the economist William Stanley Jevons, would claim that political economy should be mathematical because it was inherently quantitative, but he could not attach the mathematical formulations he introduced to empirical numbers.

4.2 Quantification in the Modern Social and Behavioral Sciences

Toward the end of the nineteenth century, a more mathematical field of statistics began to develop. The most influential version of the new statistics was developed within a British biometric tradition by Francis Galton and Karl Pearson. At almost the same time, however, distinct social and behavioral sciences began to crystallize, in part around increasingly distinct quantitative methods. All were conceived as ways to enhance the scientific standing of their fields, and each was engaged also with issues of politics, policy, and the management of economies and populations. The typology to follow is intended to be suggestive, and certainly cannot be exhaustive.

4.2.1 Physical anthropology and eugenics. The measurement of humans was carried out for bureaucratic as well as scientific purposes throughout the nineteenth century. The increasing concern with race in anthropology was linked to a preoccupation with skulls, whose measures were used to distinguish distinct 'races' of Europeans. What Francis Galton called 'correlation' was developed to measure the interconnections among physical human characteristics, their perpetuation from one generation to another, and their relation to measures of merit or achievement.

4.2.2 Psychometrics and psychology. Correlation provided also a solution to a problem of contemporary psychophysics, related to education. Gustav Theodor Fechner began applying the methods of error theory to the measurement of sensory discrimination in the mid-nineteenth century. Psychophysics was plagued, however, by the problem that a task—for example, of distinguishing two slightly different weights—could not be repeated indefinitely, because the subject learned over time to do better. Indeed, the left hand acquired some of the fine discrimination developed through practice with the right hand. By the end of the century, this obstacle had become a topic of investigation in its own right, as an approach to the psychology of learning. Systematic use of experimental randomization was developed for studies of this kind (Dehue 1997). They provided also a wide field of application for correlational methods. Did childhood study of dead languages really train the mind for speedier or more thorough learning of other subjects, such as science, history, or literature? The growth of mental testing in the early twentieth century opened another question of correlations. To what extent did students who proved themselves adept in some particular study excel also in others? Charles Spearman's g, or general intelligence, and the 'intelligence quotient' or IQ, which flourished in America, presupposed a basic unity of the mental faculties. Psychometricians and educational psychologists developed a body of statistical methods to measure this intelligence, or to decompose it, and to assess the relations of its components (Danziger 1990).

In the 1930s and 1940s, as psychology turned resolutely experimental, quantification became practically mandatory. Once again, educational psychology and parapsychology took the lead in the assimilation of novel methods of experimental design and analysis. The new paradigm of a proper experiment involved a randomized design of control and experimental populations, yielding results that would, in most cases, be subjected to analysis of variance (ANOVA). A worthwhile result was defined in part by a test of significance: the 'null hypothesis' that the treatment had no effect should be rejected at some specified level, commonly 0.05 (Gigerenzer et al. 1989).

4.2.3 Econometrics and economics. The new mathematics of marginalism was developed in the 1870s and self-consciously reconciled to the classical tradition in the 1890s by Alfred Marshall. His work included abundant graphical illustrations, but these involved quantities that could not easily be measured. The origins of econometrics are largely distinct. From origins in the 1870s to the establishment of a society and a journal in the 1930s, the field focused on the study of business cycles (Morgan 1990). Econometricians took their numbers where they could get them, often from public sources. They were highly dependent on national accounts, prepared by governments, and indeed participated in structuring these accounts. The paradigmatic statistical tool of econometrics, adapted from biometrics mainly after 1950, was regression analysis.

4.2.4 Surveys. From the founding of statistical societies in the 1830s, social science has relied on surveys to learn about how lives and opinions. Charles Booth's monumental studies of East London beginning in the 1880s inspired a movement of surveys of towns and regions in Britain and America. At first, researchers were expected to examine everyone, but after 1900, sampling began to gain acceptance. Arthur Bowley and then Jerzy Neyman developed sampling methods that permitted generalization using probability theory. The techniques of survey sampling have linked sociology and political science to marketing and political campaigns (Bulmer et al. 1991, Desrosières 1998).

4.2.5 Modeling. By the late twentieth century, the use of models was pervasive in natural and social sciences alike. Modeling methods are far too diverse to think of summing them up, but the modeling outlook deserves comment. It is perhaps under this rubric that mathematical methods are most often integrated with the data of tallies and measurements. A quantitative model, very broadly, means working out the consequences of certain assumptions for a particular situation or problem. Often, models are used for predicting, and they can equally well be purely academic or highly pragmatic, for very specific applications. In the twentieth century they have come to pervade the sciences. Among the social disciplines, modeling is especially central to economics.

5. Conclusion

Quantification by now is virtually as important for social as for natural science. Its expansion since the 1700s reveals some key characteristics of the social and behavioral sciences: among them, the drive for the status of science, the role of applied studies in forming academic ones, and the often problematic relationship of theoretical to empirical work. The quantification of social phenomena goes back several centuries, and is by no means a mere product of the effort to attain scientific standing. Indeed, the advance of measurement and statistical analysis in social science is not distinctively academic, but has been greatly stimulated by administrative and political demands. Yet quantification in social science has, since the 1800s, been surrounded by a certain mystique, as an indication of rigor or at least of scientific maturity. It should be regarded not as the key to all mysteries, but as a powerful set of tools and concepts, to be integrated as much as possible with theoretical understanding and with other ways of comprehending social phenomena.

See also: Econometrics, History of; Psychometrics; Scaling and Classification in Social Measurement; Scientific Revolution: History and Sociology; Statistics, History of; Statistics: The Field

Bibliography

- Alder K 1995 A revolution to measure: The political economy of the metric system in France. In: Wise N (ed.) The Values of Precision. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ pp. 39–71
- Baker K 1975 Condorcet: From Natural Philosophy to Social Mathematics. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
- Bulmer M, Bales K, Sklar K (eds.) 1991 The Social Survey in Historical Perspective, 1880–1940. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Daston L 1988 Classical Probability in the Enlightenment. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Danziger K 1990 Constructing the Subject: Historical Origins of Psychological Research. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Dehue T 1997 Deception, efficiency, and random groups: Psychology and the gradual origination of the random group design. Isis 88: 653–73
- Desrosières A 1998 The Politics of Large Numbers. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Espeland W 1998 The Struggle for Water. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
- Frängsmyr T, Heilbron J, Rider R (eds.) 1990 The Quantifying Spirit in the Eighteenth Century. University of California Press, Berkeley, CA
- Gigerenzer G, Swijtink Z, Porter T, Daston L, Beatty J, Krüger L 1989 The Empire of Chance: How Probability Changed Science and Everyday Life. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Gillispie C 1997 Pierre Simon Laplace, 1749–1827: A Life in Exact Science. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Hacking I 1975 The Emergence of Probability. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Hacking I 1990 The Taming of Chance. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Hacking I 1995 Rewriting the Soul. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Heilbron J 1979 Electricity in the 17th and 18th Centuries: A Study in Early Modern Physics. University of California Press, Berkeley, CA
- Koyré A 1968 Metaphysics and Measurement. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Kuhn T 1961 The function of measurement in modern physical science. In: Woolf H (ed.) Measurement. Bobbs-Merrill, Indianapolis, IN pp. 31–63
- Kuhn T 1976 Mathematical versus experimental traditions in the development of physical science. Journal of Interdisciplinary History 7: 1–31 (reprinted in Kuhn T 1977 The Essential Tension. University of Chicago Press, Chicago, pp. 31–65)
- Kula W 1986 Measures and Men (Szreter R trans.). Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Lave J 1986 The values of quantification. In: Law J (ed.) Power, Action, and Belief: A New Sociology of Knowledge? Routledge, London pp. 88–111
- Morgan M 1990 The History of Econometric Ideas. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Porter T 1986 The Rise of Statistical Thinking, 1820–1900. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Porter T 1995 Trust in Numbers: The Pursuit of Objectivity in Science and Public Life. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Sagoff M 1988 The Economy of the Earth: Philosophy, Law, and the Environment. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Yeo E 1996 The Contest for Social Science. Rivers Oram Press, London

T. M. Porter

Quantifiers, in Linguistics

1. Introduction

Quantifiers are free-standing expressions whose meanings involve the notion of quantity, such as English three, several, numerous, most, every, one hundred and twenty three, all but seventeen, and so forth.

The basic semantic structure of quantification is bipartite, consisting of the quantifier itself plus the expression that it quantifies. For example, in a sentence such as John saw three cats, three is the quantifier, and cats the quantified expression.

Quantification has traditionally been of great interest to semanticists, logicians and philosophers of language, due at least in part to the perceived ‘logical’ or ‘mathematical’ nature of the meanings involved. As such, it is striking to observe how such basic and seemingly immutable meanings may, in different languages, be expressed with very different morpho-syntactic strategies, exhibiting a great degree of cross-linguistic variation.

Quantifiers may be classified internally, with respect to their morphosyntactic structure and basic semantic properties. In addition, they may be classified externally, with regard to the syntactic and semantic relationships between the quantifiers and the quantified expressions and/or the remainder of the sentences in which they occur.

2. Internal Classifications

Internal classifications of quantification make reference to a variety of fundamental morphosyntactic and semantic properties.

2.1 Mass and Count Quantifiers

One of the most basic distinctions is between mass and count quantifiers (Pelletier 1979, Allan 1980). Mass quantifiers constitute expressions which denote an undifferentiated homogeneous mass; for example, English much is a mass quantifier, because it forms expressions such as much milk, much cake. In contrast, count quantifiers constitute expressions which refer to one or more countable units of characteristic size and shape; for example, English many is a count quantifier, because it forms expressions such as many cats, many cakes. Whereas many quantifiers belong to just one of the two types, mass or count, some quantifiers are undifferentiated with respect to the mass/count distinction, and may appear in expressions of either kind.

An interesting case is that of the so-called ‘classifier languages,’ many of which are located in the East Asian linguistic region (Craig 1986; see example (4) below). In such languages, many or all of the count quantifiers cannot occur in immediate construction with the noun that they quantify; instead, the quantifier must occur in construction with a classifier, and the quantifier-plus-classifier constituent may then occur in construction with the noun. Typically, the classifier makes reference to various characteristics—size, shape, function, and so forth—of the quantified noun. Accordingly, different nouns often require different classifiers. However, in some cases, different classifiers may occur with the same noun, sometimes resulting in subtle differences in meaning.

2.2 Existential and Universal Quantifiers

Of particular interest to logicians are the existential and universal quantifiers (Vendler 1967, Heim 1982, Gil 1995). Existential quantifiers, such as English some and a(n), form expressions denoting at least a minimal, non-zero amount or number of the quantified expression, for example some water, a boy. Universal quantifiers, such as English all and every, form expressions referring to an exhaustive amount or number of the quantified expression, for example all the water, every boy. Existential and universal quantifiers are semantically related to each other through negation by means of the classical ‘square of opposition’: thus, in English, Not a boy came is equivalent to All the boys did not come, and Not all the boys came is equivalent to A boy did not come.

Existential quantification, in many languages, is inextricably intertwined with singular number and/or indefiniteness: in some cases they are expressed identically, while in other cases they are expressed by means of the same marker occurring in different constructions, or by means of similar though not identical markers. Universal quantification, too, is expressed in a variety of different ways across languages. Some languages, such as English, do have ‘dedicated’ universal quantifiers, that is to say, words such as all and every whose primary or exclusive function is the expression of universal quantification. However, many other languages lack such words, instead making use of more complex circumlocutions if and when the expressive need arises.

Given the importance of existential and universal quantifiers in mathematical logic, it is worthy of note how relatively unimportant these quantifiers are within the grammatical systems of languages. It is indeed not all that common to find a single form, in any language, whose interpretation corresponds precisely and unproblematically to either the existential or the universal quantifier. Moreover, there is probably no language in which expressions of existential and universal quantification constitute a natural grammatical class to the exclusion of other expressions. The diversity of morphosyntactic expression of existential and universal quantifiers across the world's languages suggests that, although greatly valued by logicians, they may not be endowed with privileged status vis à vis the structure of language.

2.3 Mid-range Quantifiers

‘In between’ the existential and the universal quantifiers lie a variety of mid-range quantifiers, such as, in English, few, several, many, most, and so forth. Among the mid-range quantifiers, a particularly privileged category is that of cardinal numerals—quantifiers which refer to natural numbers, for example, one, two, thirteen, one hundred and twenty seven (Menninger 1969, Hurford 1975). Complex phrasal numerals often make use of syntactic patterns available elsewhere in the language; however, in addition, they sometimes exhibit unique structural features not found in other grammatical domains.

2.4 Other Internal Classifications

Quantifiers are sometimes classified as either strong (alternatively referred to as definite) or weak (indefinite) (Milsark 1977). Strong quantifiers, such as English all and most, are inherently definite in their meaning, whereas weak quantifiers, such as English some and three, are not. Strong and weak quantifiers often exhibit different syntactic behaviour; for example, strong quantifiers are typically awkward or ungrammatical in existential sentences, e.g.,? There is all the water on the floor.

Some further semantic distinctions are captured by the categories of increasing (alternatively referred to as upward entailing) and decreasing (or downward entailing) (Keenan and Stavi 1986). A quantifier is increasing if a sentence containing it would be logically true in a situation in which the amount or number of quantified expressions involved is larger than that explicitly stipulated by the quantifier, for example, at least three. Conversely, a quantifier is decreasing if a sentence containing it would be logically true in a situation in which the amount or number of quantified expressions involved is smaller than that explicitly stipulated by the quantifier, for example, at most three. Other quantifiers are neither increasing nor decreasing, for example exactly three.

An interesting problem is posed by simple monomorphemic quantifiers such as three. At first blush, such quantifiers appear to be neither increasing nor decreasing: if somebody says There are three cats on the bed, the mental picture that is conjured up is, of course, one of three cats, not two, or four, or any other number. However, a moment's reflection will reveal an important asymmetry. If in fact there are exactly two cats on the bed, then the above sentence is clearly false. In contrast, if there are exactly four cats on the bed, then, in most contexts, the above sentence would obviously be misleading and inappropriate—but it would not, strictly speaking, be false. Thus, while the pragmatic appropriateness conditions of three resemble those of exactly three, the actual truth conditions of three are identical to those of at least three. Hence, three is, in fact, increasing.

3. External Classifications

External classifications of quantification make reference to the morphosyntactic and semantic relationships which obtain between the quantifiers and the quantified expressions and/or the remainder of the sentences in which they occur.

3.1 Nominal and Verbal Quantifiers

One basic semantic classification relates to the category of the quantified expression, specifically whether it is of a nominal or verbal nature (Gil 1993). For example, in the English sentence John saw three cats, the numeral three quantifies a noun; accordingly this sentence illustrates nominal quantification. In contrast, in the sentence John sang three times, the numeral phrase three times quantifies a verb; hence this sentence instantiates verbal quantification.

Up to a point, nominal and verbal quantification exhibit parallel grammatical properties. Obvious, but still worth noting, is the fact that in both of the preceding sentences, the same numeral, three, is used. However, nominal and verbal quantification also differ in many ways; typically, verbal quantification is more highly marked than its nominal counterpart.

3.2 Continuous and Discontinuous Quantifiers

A distinct albeit related syntactic classification pertains to the position of the quantifier with respect to the quantified expression, specifically, whether or not the two form a continuous constituent (Gil 1993, Bach et al. 1995). Sentences (1)–(4) below all instantiate nominal quantification, in which a numeral quantifies an expression referring to an animal; however, each of the examples exhibits a different syntactic configuration.

- (1) HEBREW
raiti [šaloš arnavot]
 see-PAST: 1:SG three-F rabbit-PL:F
 'I saw three rabbits'
- (2) TAGALOG
Tatlo [ang nakita three TOP PAT.TOP: PFV-see kong baboy]
 DIR: 1:SG-LIG pig
 'I saw three pigs'
 ('The pigs seen by me were three')
- (3) KUTENAI (Matthew Dryer, p.c.) hu [qa'sa' wu:kati] cupqa
 1:SG three-PRV see-IND deer
 'I saw three deer' ('I three-saw deer')
- (4) JAPANESE
Watasi wa inu o
 1:SG TOP dog ACC sanbiki mita
 three-CLF see-PFV
 'I saw three dogs' ('I saw dogs three')

In Modern Hebrew, (1), as in its English gloss, the quantifier groups with the quantified expression, šaloš arnavot, to the exclusion of the remainder of the sentence; in Tagalog, (2), the quantifier tatlo stands alone as a sister to the remainder of the sentence, which forms a constituent; in Kutenai, (3), the quantifier occurs in construction with the verb, qa'sa' wu:kati, to the exclusion of the remainder of the sentence, while in Japanese, (4), the quantifier sanbiki is a sentential adverb not forming an obvious constituent with any part of the remainder of the sentence.

Constructions (1) and (2) exemplify continuous quantification, in which the quantifier and the quantified expression form a constituent. In contrast, constructions (3) and (4) exemplify discontinuous quantification, in which the quantifier occurs apart from the quantified expression. Examples (1)–(4) above illustrate the distinction between continuous and discontinuous quantification with respect to nominal quantification. In principle, a similar distinction may also be drawn with respect to verbal quantification, though examples of discontinuous verbal quantification are more hard to come by.

3.3 Scope and Scopal Quantifiers

When two quantified expressions are present in the same construction, a variety of semantic relations may obtain between the two expressions (Jackendoff 1971, Gil 1982b). The following English sentence, containing two numerically quantified NPs, may, at least potentially, be interpreted in any or all of the following four ways.

- (5) Three boys saw two girls
- (a) ‘Each of three boys saw each of two girls’ not scope differentiated: strong symmetric.
 - (b) ‘Three boys saw two girls between them’ not scope differentiated: weak symmetric.
 - (c) ‘Three boys saw two girls each’ scope differentiated: wide scope for three boys distributive key: three boys; distributive share: two girls.
 - (d) ‘Two girls were seen by three boys each’ scope differentiated: wide scope for two girls distributive key: two girls; distributive share: three boys.

Interpretations (5a) and (5b) both involve a single set of three boys and a single set of two girls: each of the two NPs has independent reference. These interpretations are accordingly characterized as non-scope-differentiated, or symmetric. Interpretations (5c) and (5d) present a more complex picture. In (5c) there is a single set of three boys; however, each of the three boys is associated with a different set of two girls. Thus, while the subject NP has independent reference, the direct-object NP is referentially dependent on the subject NP. In this interpretation, then, the subject NP has scope over the direct-object NP. More precisely, the two NPs are in a relationship of distributivity, with the subject NP as distributive key, and the direct-object NP as distributive share. In (5d), a mirror-image situation obtains. Here, there is a single set of two girls; however, each of the two girls is associated with a different set of three boys. Accordingly, while the direct-object NP has independent reference, the subject NP is referentially dependent on the direct-object NP; the direct-object NP has scope over the subject NP. Here too then, a relation of distributivity obtains; this time, though, it is the direct object NP which is the distributive key and the subject NP which is the distributive share.

The above four interpretations are not equally readily available for speakers of English. Specifically, the symmetric interpretations (5a) and (5b) are more easily available than the asymmetric interpretations (5c) and (5d). Moreover, between the latter two interpretations, (5c) with wide scope for the subject NP, is more readily available than (5d) with wide scope for the direct-object NP. These preferences are not accidental; rather, they are particular consequences of more general principles governing the assignment of quantifier scope across languages.

Given the general preference for symmetric interpretations, languages typically have at their disposal various lexical and morphosyntactic devices whose function is to induce the more marked asymmetric interpretations, when these are required. Consider the following English sentences:

- (6) (a) All the men carried three suitcases.
(b) Every man carried three suitcases.

Sentences (6a) and (6b) differ in the lexical choice of quantifier within the subject NP. Whereas in (6a), with all, a variety of scope relationships may obtain between the two NPs, and the number of suitcases may vary between three in total and three per man, in (6b), with every, the subject NP has scope over the direct object NP, and the suitcases number three per man. Whereas all, like three, is a simple quantifier, every is a scopal quantifier, that is to say, a quantifier endowed with an additional denotational component, one that forces a particular scope relationship to obtain between the NP in which it occurs, and some other expression. In particular, it is a distributive-key quantifier, inducing a relationship of distributivity, in which the NP containing the quantifier in question is the distributive key, or element with wide scope (Gil 1995).

A different kind of scopal quantifier is exemplified by the following pair of Maricopa sentences:

- (7) MARICOPA
- (a) ʔipač ʔii xmokm man-PL:NOM stick 3-three-SG-DS
upaavk
3-carry-PL-REAL
‘The men carried three sticks’
 - (b) ʔipač ʔii xmokxperm man-PL:NOM stick 3-three-SG-DIST.SHARE-DS
upaavk
3-carry-PL-REAL
(i) ‘The men carried three sticks each’
(ii) ‘The men carried the sticks in threes’

Sentences (7a) and (7b) differ only in the form of the numeral within the direct-object expression. Sentence (7a) contains a simple numeral, xmok- ‘three,’ and is ambiguous in roughly the same ways as its English gloss. In contrast, sentence (7b) contains the same numeral plus the suffix -xper, whose effect is to mark the numeral xmok- and the expression containing it as distributive share. The ambiguity exhibited by sentence (7b) results from different expressions being selected as the distributive key counterpart. Under interpretation (7b(i)), the subject NP ʔipač ‘men’ is chosen as distributive key: the sticks accordingly number three per man. Under interpretation (7b(ii)), the verb upaavk 'carried' is chosen as distributive key: here the sticks accordingly number three per carrying. Cross-linguistically, distributive-share numerals are formed by a variety of formal processes, including affixation (as in the above example), periphrasis, reduplication, and suppletion (Gil 1982a).

3.4 Quantifier as a Grammatical Category

Quantifier is primarily a semantic category: an expression is a quantifier only if it bears certain meaning properties. One of the most striking characteristics of quantifiers is the absence of any distinctive shared formal morphosyntactic features, which might justify the positing of a corresponding grammatical category of quantifier. Within languages, different quantifiers often display different grammatical properties. And across languages, the 'same' quantifier may exhibit different morphosyntactic behavior as well. Thus, in terms of their formal properties, quantifiers constitute a heterogeneous collection, exhibiting a great amount of morphological and syntactic diversity.

Looking within individual languages, there is probably no language within which there is a formal grammatical category consisting exactly of all quantifiers but no other expressions. Rather, in most or all languages, different quantifiers exhibit different arrays of grammatical properties, some grouping together with expressions belonging to one category, others patterning together with expressions belonging to some other category, yet others exhibiting idiosyncratic morphological or syntactic behaviour.

Looking across languages, quantifiers with the same meaning often exhibit quite different morphological and syntactic behaviour. Examples (1)–(4) above showed how the numeral 'three,' as a nominal quantifier, may occur, in different languages, in a variety of different constructions, exhibiting continuous and discontinuous quantification of various kinds. Even if attention is restricted to the most well-known type, that of continuous NP-internal quantification, as in (1), a great amount of cross-linguistic variation may be observed. In particular, in different languages, nominal quantifiers in attributive NP internal position may resemble, to various degrees, nouns, adjectives, and/or verbs.

4. Delimitation of Quantification

The discussion in the preceding sections was based on a bipartite definition of quantifiers as 'free-standing expressions' whose meanings 'involve the notion of quantity.' Like many similar definitions, this one is useful, but not unproblematical. Specifically, in addition to prototypical quantifiers such as those discussed above, there are numerous expressions and construction types for which it is difficult to adjudicate whether or not they may appropriately be characterized as quantificational.

The first part of the definition is formal: in order for an expression to be considered as a quantifier, it must be free standing—a word or a phrase, rather than an affix or some other bound morphological unit. Accordingly, various kinds of clitics, particles, and other intermediate units smaller than words but larger than affixes may provide borderline cases straddling the boundary between what is a quantifier and what is not. The distinction between free and bound forms is what underlies the distinction between quantification and the semantically-related grammatical category of number. Specifically, whereas quantifiers are free standing, number markers are bound forms. However, in some instances it may be difficult to adjudicate whether a form associated with a quantificational meaning is free or bound, and hence whether it constitutes an instance of quantification or of number. In order to determine whether forms such as these are quantifiers or number markers, it may be necessary to make use of additional diagnostic criteria distinguishing quantifiers from number markers.

The second part of the definition of quantifier is the obvious semantic condition: its meaning must involve the notion of quantity. While in many instances this is quite straightforward, in other cases, quantificational meanings may shade off gradually into other kinds of meanings not generally considered to be quantificational. One class of expressions related in meaning to nominal quantifiers are those denoting size and other scalar properties. An important class of expressions related to verbal quantifiers are those marking aspectual categories, such as perfect and progressive. More generally, different quantifiers in different languages may be related to an extremely broad range of non-quantificational concepts, synchronically and/or diachronically.

See also: Lexical Semantics; Logic and Linguistics; Numeral Systems; Semantics; Word Classes and Parts of Speech

Bibliography

- Allan K 1980 Nouns and countability. Language 56: 541–67
- Bach E, Jelinek K E, Kratzer A, Partee B H (eds.) 1995 Cross-Linguistic Quantification. Kluwer Academic Publishers, Dordrecht, The Netherlands
- Craig C (ed.) 1986 Noun classes and categorization. Typological Studies in Language 7
- Gil D 1982a Distributive numerals. PhD. dissertation, University of California, Los Angeles, CA
- Gil D 1982b Quantifier scope, linguistic variation, and natural language semantics. Linguistics and Philosophy 5: 421–72
- Gil D 1993 Nominal and verbal quantification. Sprachtypologie und Universalienforschung 46: 275–317

- Gil D 1995 Universal quantifiers and distributivity. In: Bach E, Jeline K E, Kratzer A, Partee B H (eds.) Quantification in Natural Languages. Kluwer, Dordrecht, The Netherlands, pp. 321–62
- Heim I 1982 The semantics of definite and indefinite noun phrases. PhD. dissertation, University of Massachusetts, Amherst, MA
- Hurford J R 1975 The Linguistic Study of Numerals. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Jackendoff R S 1971 Semantic Interpretation in Generative Grammar. MIT Press, Cambridge, MA
- Keenan E L, Stavi J 1986 A semantic characterization of natural language determiners. Linguistics and Philosophy 9: 253–326
- Menninger K 1969 Number Words and Number Symbols [trans. Broneer P.]. MIT Press, Cambridge, MA
- Milsark G 1977 Toward an explanation of certain peculiarities in the existential construction in English. Linguistic Analysis 3: 1–30
- Pelletier F J (ed.) 1979 Mass Terms: Some Philosophical Problems. Synthese Language Library, Reidel, Dordrecht, The Netherlands
- Vendler Z 1967 Linguistics and Philosophy. Cornell University Press, Ithaca, NY

D. Gil

Quantitative Cross-national Research Methods

1. The Main Challenges of Quantitative Nation Comparisons

Quantitative cross-national comparisons have become an important feature of all the social sciences. Their popularity has been spurred, in part, by the increasing availability of good data for a growing number of countries and, in part, by the diffusion of statistical skills among researchers. There are many constraints and potential pitfalls involved in cross-national statistical analyses, and these will be the main theme of this article. But this research strategy has, regardless, proven itself of great scientific value. It has, above all, helped highlight how fundamental many international variations are, thus, providing a powerful check against parochialism and unwarranted generalizations. Quantitative macrocomparisons have also proven themselves eminently useful in testing the validity of core theoretical assumptions, such as the convergence thesis that has long dominated development and modernization theory in political science and sociology especially.

Quantitative nation comparisons will, however, inevitably face a number of tradeoffs; some more serious than others. One is that the capacity for broader generalization that quantification permits is bought at the price of less attention to the contextual reality of individual nations. The uniqueness of a nation's culture, historical heritage, and endemic logic is lost easily when all we actually observe are a few indicators. Moreover, these indicators may mean somewhat different things in the unique context of specific countries (Ragin 1987). Scholars are frequently quite sensitive to this issue and so attempt to embed their statistical analyses within the histories and social uniqueness of the countries being studied. Also, as Ragin (1994) argues and empirically demonstrates, Boolean analysis can help overcome this dilemma by enabling us to build conjunctural models with very few cases and to analyze nonevents. But the approach is somewhat circumscribed. It needs to be guided by strong theory and background knowledge, its applicability is limited to relatively few cases, and it may be biased in favor of corroborating nonadditive, conjunctural models.

A second constraint has to do with the often limited number of observations available. This is especially true of studies of advanced (OECD) democracies where the N rarely exceeds 25. In broader worldwide comparisons, however, the N approaches 200. Many researchers attempt to supplement the paucity of nations by collecting longitudinal data on each nation, as with pooled cross-sectional and time series analyses. A 20-year time series for 20 countries yields 400 observations; a 20-year time series for 200 nations yields 4,000. As ever, longer data series for individual countries become available, the small N problem will gradually diminish.

Small samples do not necessarily pose problems of statistical inference, especially when the substantive theory is strong. They do, however, limit what statistical tools can be brought to bear. Fearon (1991) argues that the smaller the sample size, the greater is the need to make counterfactuals explicit—in other words, to tighten the theoretical formulation about the precise conditions that will (or will not) produce an outcome. Vague theory implies uncertainty about the number of contending explanations (which can grow very large) and about their mutual relationship within a causal order. The consequences of this include causal misspecification, multi-colinearity and large error terms. The last two of these can only be managed by having more observations. Without them, estimations are likely to yield results that are not robust. The less ambiguous the theory, the less the need for large N 's. Small N 's are, therefore, an especially acute problem in disciplines without a firm theoretical architecture, like sociology or political science. Western (1998a) argues that Bayesian estimation, by allowing for greater uncertainty, produces more robust results when N 's are few, theory vague, and explanations are many.

Small N 's can even hold advantages, because a limited nation sample implies that the researcher can gain more easily maximum advantage from diagnostic scrutiny of the residual plots. A set of systematic outliers, for example, can be easily identified in terms of their nationhood, and any good comparativist should be able to pin down what variable(s) drives their deviance from the fitted regression line. Diagnostics on small samples can approach the advantages of in-depth case studies.

The constraints imposed by small samples are generally well known to researchers. There are additional problems inherent in quantitative national comparisons that are both more generic and potentially more serious, but also less recognized. Chief among these are issues related to: qualitative and limited dependent variables, the potential for selection bias, possible lack of independence between observations and, finally, the question of endogeneity of variables.

2. Qualitative and Limited Dependent Variables

Many dependent variables in cross-national research are either qualitative (assuming discrete values) or limited (they assume continuous values within some range). The choice whether to measure a variable in a qualitative or continuous way is often controversial. Bollen and Jackman (1989), for example, argue that difficulties in classifying some political regimes speak in favor of using continuous scales because 'Dichotomizing democracy blurs distinctions between borderline cases.' In contrast, Przeworski et al. (in press) prefer to treat regimes dichotomously or multinomially.

When the dependent variable is either qualitative or limited, we need to use nonlinear models. Whether we give political regimes the values of 0–1 (as do Przeworski et al. in press) or 1–100 (as does Bollen 1980), it remains that the value on the dependent variable cannot exceed its maximum when the independent variable(s) tend to infinity, and it cannot fall below its minimum when these variables tend to infinity. Linear models, at best, can provide an approximation within some range of the independent variables.

The standard model when the dependent variable is multinomial is where $j = 0, 1, \dots, J-1$ and F is the cumulative distribution function. Since such models are covered by any standard textbook we need not present them here. Such models can be applied to panel data unless the number of repeated observations is large.

$$\Pr(Y = j, X = x) = F(x) \quad (1)$$

'Event history analysis' is one particular class of nonlinear models applied in cross-national research. In such models the dependent variable is an event, such as a revolution, regime transition, or a policy adoption. The general model is

$$\Pr(Y(t+dt) = j) = f(y(t), x(t)), dt \quad (2)$$

Most often, such models can be conveniently estimated as

$$\log S(t) = \log(1 - F(t)) \quad (3)$$

where $S(t)$ is the survival function, or the probability that an event lasts beyond time t , and $F(t)$ is the cdf.

For dichotomous dependent variables, logit and probit give very similar results. For multinomial variables, it is often assumed that the errors are independent across the values of the dependent variable, which leads to a logit specification. But this implies a strong assumption, namely the irrelevance of independent alternatives that rarely holds in practice. Multinomial probit, in turn, requires computing multiple integrals, which was until recently computationally expensive. Alternatives would be semi- and nonparametric methods.

The distributions that are commonly used in estimating survival models include the exponential, Weibul, logistic, and Poisson distributions. But, except for the Weibul and exponential, it is very difficult to distinguish statistically between such distributions.

Methods for studying qualitative dependent variables are now standard textbook fare, but what warrants emphasis is that the traditional distinction between 'qualitative' and 'quantitative' research is becoming increasingly obsolete. Phenomena such as social revolutions may be rare, but this just means they occur with a low probability. They can, nevertheless, be studied systematically using maximum likelihood methods.

3. The Problem of Selection Bias

In comparative research we are often interested in the effect of some systemic feature, institution, or policy on some outcome. Examples include the effect of labor market institutions on unemployment, the effect of political regimes on economic growth, or the effect of electoral rules on the number of political parties.

In such cases, the question is how some feature of X affects some outcomes Y in the presence of conditions Z , or $PR(Y, X, Z)$, where the hypothesis is that $y = f(x)$. The generic problem is how to isolate the effects of X and Z on Y .

If sampling is exogenous (i.e., the probability of observing any y is independent of z), the $pr(Y = yz) = pr(y)$, and standard statistical methods can be used. But if $pr(Y = yz)$ is different under different conditions Z , sampling is endogenous and the assumptions of the standard statistical model are violated.

To exemplify the problem: suppose we want to know the impact of political regimes on economic growth. We observe Chile in 1985 (Z), which was a dictatorship (X), in which case per capita income declined at the rate of $Y = -2.26$. To assess the effect of political regimes, we need to know what would have been the rate of growth (Y) in Chile had it been a democracy. This cannot be answered with the available observations because Chile in 1985 was indeed a dictatorship. The comparativist in such a case would proceed quasi-experimentally, and look for a case that matches Chile in all aspects except authoritarianism. In this way one would compare an authoritarian with a democratic 'Chile.'

But what if Chile's status as a dictatorship in 1985 was due to some factors that also affected its economic performance? This could be because growth itself influences the survival of regimes; a country's level of development may be associated both with regime selection and growth; some unobservable factors (say 'enlightened leadership' or, perhaps, measurement error) may be common to both variables. Whatever the underlying selection mechanism, the basic consequence is that there will be cases without a match, and this implies that our inferences will be biased.

The problem raised by nonrandom selection is how to make inferences from what we observe to what we do not. It is a problem of identification (Manski 1995). For what do we know when we observe Chile as a dictatorship in 1985? We observe the fact that, given conditions Z , the Chilean regime (X) is a dictatorship. We also know its rate of economic growth, given that it is a dictatorship under conditions Z . We do not observe, however, its rate of growth as a democracy under conditions Z . The issue is one of counterfactual observations: the rate of growth that an observation with $Z = zi$, observed under dictatorship, would have had under democracy. We do not know what this value is and, hence, we face under-identification.

What we need to know are two distributions, $P(Y = y, x = j, Z)$ and $P(Y = y, x = k, Z)$, and their expected values, where we now think of the possible values of X more generally as $j, k = 0, 1, 2, \dots, N$. The first is the distribution of Y in the entire population if all cases were observed as dictatorships; the second is the distribution of Y in the entire population if all cases were observed as democracies. Clearly, if we want to know the impact on y of being in states x , we need to determine the difference between these two distributions, conditional on z .

It may seem strange to refer to the 'population' as including unobserved cases. But in order to compare the effects of states x on the performance of an individual case characterized by a zi , we must allow the case to be potentially observable under the full range of X . We observed this case as $X = j$, but must also imagine the possibility that it would have been Xj . We must think in terms of a 'superpopulation' consisting of a continuum of potential cases. The actual sample is then regarded as having been drawn by 'nature' from this superpopulation.

If the actual population is an exogenous sample of the potential one, any multivariate combination (xi, zi) can be drawn with a positive probability. Such exogenous sampling allows us to isolate the effect of x on y given z , that is, to 'control' for z the effects of x on y . If the sample is exogenous, we can 'match' pairs ($xi = j, zi$) and ($xi = k, zi$). But if sampling is endogenous, there will be some cases without a 'match': some of the xi 's will not have support. Where we have nonrandom selection, quasi-experimental comparisons fail regardless of the number of observations.

The methods to correct for selection bias consist of constructing counterfactuals, that is, of filling the unobserved supports of the distribution Y for all X . Following Heckman (1979), when sampling is not random, the regressions $y = f(x, z)$ suffer from omitted variable bias. When such regressions are estimated on the basis of the observed sample, the variable that is omitted is the expected value of the error in the equation that specifies how the observations are selected into the sample

$$\Pr(x = j) = F(Z) + u \quad (4)$$

If

$$E(uj \mid x = j) = 0 \quad (5)$$

then

$$E(uj \mid x) = juE(u \mid x) \quad (6)$$

where ju is a regression coefficient of uj on u .

Finally, $E(ux = j) = j$, where the f 's are the inverse Mill ratios, or the hazard rates. Since we know that Yj is observed when $x = j$, we can write the expected values in the observed sample as

$$E(yj \mid x = j, z) = zj + juj \quad (7)$$

Note that if this equation is estimated on the basis of the observed sample, the variable j is omitted from the specification.

We can now see why controlling for the variables that enter both into selection and outcome equations may indeed worsen the selection bias. Following Heckman (1988), we distinguish first between selection on observables and on unobservables. Selection on observables occurs when the expected covariance $E(uju \mid z) \neq 0$, but once the observed variables Z are controlled for it vanishes, so that $E(uju \mid z) = 0$. Selection is on unobservables when $E(uju) \neq 0$ and $E(uju \mid z) = 0$, which means that controlling for the factors observed by the investigator does not remove the covariance between the errors in the outcome and the selection equations. Now note that the regression coefficient $ju = \text{cov}(uju) / \text{var}(uj)$. If selection is on unobservables, controlling for some variable x in the outcome equation may reduce the error variance uj without equally reducing the covariance uju . Hence, the coefficient on the omitted variable will be larger and the bias will be exacerbated.

In short, the expected values of the observed cases will be biased because they co-vary with the variable which determines which cases are observed. If selection is exclusively on observables, this bias can be corrected by traditional controlling techniques. But if it is on unobservables, such controls only worsen the bias.

Correcting for selection bias is not uncontroversial. It has been found that corrections for selection are not robust, but are highly sensitive to relatively minor changes in assumptions about distributions (Goldberger 1983). Others have found that some estimation methods fail to correct for this bias and may even exacerbate it (Stolzenberg and Relles 1990). As Heckman (1988) argues, the quandary we face is that different methods of correcting for selection bias are robust if there is no bias to begin with; if there is, there is no guarantee that the methods are robust.

The logic of the problem is similar whether we study large or small N 's. When de Toqueville concluded that revolutions do not bring about social change, the reason might be that they occur only in countries where it is difficult to change society. Even when $N = 1$, the issue of selection bias does not disappear: The French revolution in 1789 may have been caused by the same conditions that made social change so difficult. It is possible that a revolution in a country where social relations are easier to change would have provoked change. But then a revolution would not have been necessary.

Comparativists who conduct case studies cannot benefit from statistical distributions to generate the counterfactuals. Yet, as in all cases of comparison the problem remains and it should, therefore, be standard practice to ask counterfactual questions of one's case or cases.

4. The Problem of Independence

Statistical inference must assume that the observations on a variable are independent one of the other. Is country A's performance truly independent of what happens in country B? Is what happens at $t+1$ independent of events in t ? Usually not, and this implies the need for corrective procedures. In most cases, however, rigorous correction will entail that the de facto N (nations or years) diminishes; in some instances, statistical dependency cannot be resolved at all.

Cross-sectional analysis almost invariably assumes that nations and their properties (say budgets or institutions) are independent one of the other. This should not be assumed. We know that the Scandinavian countries have a shared history, deliberately learning from each other through centuries, thus creating similar institutions and path dependencies. The same goes for Austria and Germany, for Belgium and The Netherlands and, arguably, for all the Anglo-saxon nations. World samples have a similar problem: Japan's long hegemony in East Asia will have influenced Korean society; Confucianism has had a pervasive influence throughout the region. Similar stories are easily told for Latin America and Africa. If the World is a set of nation clusters, the real N is not 20-odd OECD countries or 150-odd World nations.

When nations form families, but are treated as if they were all unique and independent, we are likely to get biased coefficients and, very probably, unequal error variance (heteroskedasticity). Sweden alone will drive the regression line in just about any welfare state analysis, and when also Denmark and Norway are treated as discrete observations, the bias is multiplied in so far as all three in reality form part of the same political family ('Scandinavia'). Diffusion effects that operate between members of a nation-cluster can also result in heteroskedastic disturbance in the cross-section. Such can be corrected by, for example, adding a variable that captures the common underlying property that drives the disturbance (say, a dummy for being 'Scandinavia') but, again, this correction absorbs precious degrees of freedom in a small N study and, substantively, amounts to reducing the three nations to one observation.

Lack of independence in a time-series is normally taken for granted, since this year's budget or election outcome is almost inevitably related to last year's budget or the previous election. The standard assumption is a first-order (AR1) serial correlation. In comparative research virtually all time-series applications are pooled with cross-sections. But, where N 's are very small, one may as well simply compare across individual time-series estimations, as do Esping-Andersen and Sonnberger (1991). Time-series are meant to capture historical process. Yet as Isaac and Griffin (1989) argue, they easily end up being a-historical.

Pooling cross-sectional with time-series data (panel regressions) has become very widespread, especially in studies of the limited group of advanced (OECD) societies. In many cases, the panel design is chiefly cross-sectional (more nations than years); others are temporally dominated (for a discussion, see Stimson 1985). Panel models are especially problematic because they can contain simultaneous diachronic and spatial interdependence and, worse, the two may interact. The standard method for correcting contemporaneous error correlation (GLS) applies only where the t 's well exceed nations (which is rare). The consequence is that t -statistics are overestimated, errors underestimated, and the results may therefore not be robust (Beck and Katz 1995). The Beck and Katz (1995) procedure can correct for temporal and cross-sectional dependency one at a time, but if the two interact, no solution exists. See also Beck et al. (1998) for an application to maximum likelihood estimation.

Panel models can be based on two types of theoretical justification. One is that events or shocks occur over time that affect the cross-sectional variance.

There is, for example, a huge recent literature on the impact of labor market 'rigidities' on unemployment: regulations vary across nations but also across time because of deregulatory legislation (see, for example, Nickell 1997). Deregulation in a country should produce a break in its time series, and the autocorrelation element will be split into the years preceding and following the break. The second justification, not often exploited, is to interpret autocorrelation as an expression of institutional or policy path dependency. In this instant, the rho must be treated as a variable. The problem, of course, is that the rho is likely to combine theoretically relevant information as well as unknown residual autocorrelation. The researcher can accordingly not avoid including a variable that explicitly measures path dependency.

If we insist on faithful adherence to the real world, panel regressions may require so much correction against dependency that the hard-won additional degrees of freedom that come with a time-series are easily eaten up. And how many can truthfully claim that time and country dependencies do not interact? Indeed, most sensible comparativists would assume they do: if nations form part of families it should also be the case that the timing of their shocks, events, or policies is interdependent. Such intractable problems are certainly much more severe in small- N comparisons. Here, a marginal difference in measurement, the inclusion or exclusion of one country, the addition or subtraction of a year here or there, or the substitution of one variable for another, can change the entire model.

One alternative is to construct multilevel models which explicitly take into account the possibility that nations may 'cluster' (for an overview, see Goldstein 1987). Nieuwbeerta and Ultee (1999) have, for example, estimated a three level (nation, time, and individual) model of the impact of class on party choice within the context of nations' social mobility structure. A second alternative, in particular when the dependent variable is categorical, is to exploit the advantages of event history analysis. But, here the time series needs to be quite long considering that theoretically interesting events, such as revolutions, democratization, or even welfare reforms, are far between. In the event history context, analytical priority usually is given to temporal change, which brings it much closer to traditional time series analysis. But rather than having to manipulate autocorrelation, time sequencing (states and events) is actively modeled and thus gains analytic status. For an application to nation comparisons, see, for example, Western (1998b), which also can stand as an exemplar of how to minimize the interdependency problem.

There are two particular cases where the lack of independence among observations simply prohibits adequate estimation. The first, noted above, occurs when time and nation dependencies interact. The second is when 'globalization' penetrates all nations and when many nations (such as the European Union) become subsumed under identical constraints. In this instance, existing cross-national correlations will strengthen and we may, indeed be moving towards an $N = 1$. Of course, global shocks or European Union membership do not necessarily produce similar effects on the dependent variable across nations or time. If nations' institutional filters differ, so will most likely the impact of a global shock on, say, national unemployment rates. Here we would specify interaction effects, but that would be impossible in a pure cross-section, and extremely difficult in a time series, unless we already know how the lag structure will differ according to institutional variation.

5. The Endogeneity Problem

All probabilistic statistics require conditional independence, namely that the values of the predictor variables are assigned independently of the dependent variable. The basic problem of endogeneity occurs when the explanans (X) may be influenced by the explanandum (Y) or both may be jointly influenced by an unmeasured third. The endogeneity problem is one aspect of the broader question of selection bias discussed earlier.

The endogeneity issue has been debated intensely within the economic growth literature in terms of the causal relationship between technology and growth. But it applies equally to many fields. For example, comparativists often argue that left power explains welfare state development. But are we certain that left power, itself, is not a function of strong welfare states? Or, equally likely, are both large welfare states and left power just two faces of the same coin, different manifestations of one underlying, yet undefined, phenomenon? Would Sweden have had the same welfare state even without its legendary social democratic tradition? Perhaps, if Sweden's cultural past over-determines its unique kind of social democracy and social policy. If this kind of endogeneity exists, the true X for Sweden is not left power but a full list of all that is 'Sweden.' The vector of the X 's becomes a list of all that is nationally unique.

The endogeneity problem becomes easily intractable in quantitative cross-national research because we observe variables (Y 's and X 's) that represent part of the reality of the nations we sample. Our variables are in effect a partial reflection of the society under study, and the meaning of a variable score for one nation may not be metrically equivalent to that of another—a weighted left cabinet score of 35 for Denmark and 40 for Sweden probably misrepresents the Danish–Swedish difference if, that is, the two social democracies are two different beasts.

A related, and equally problematic, issue arises in the interpretation of coefficient estimations. In the simple cross-sectional regression, the coefficient for left power, economic development or for coordinated bargaining can only be interpreted in one way: as a constant, across-the-board effect irrespective of national context. If Denmark had 5 points more left power, its welfare state should match the Swedish (all else held constant). In fixed-effects panel regressions, the X 's are assumed to have an identical impact on Y , irrespective of country. Often we cannot accept such assumptions.

The reason that we cannot is that it is difficult to assume that variables, say a bargaining institution or party power balance, will produce homogenous, monotonically identical, effects across nations for the simple reason that they are embedded in a more complex reality (called nation) which has also given rise to its version of the dependent variable. In this case, the bias remains equally problematic whether we study few or many N 's; it will not disappear if we add more nations. Quantitative national comparisons rarely address such endogeneity problems. Studies of labor market or economic performance routinely presume that labor market regulations or bargaining centralization are truly exogenous variables, whose effects on employment is conditionally identical whether it is Germany, Norway, or the United States. The same goes for welfare state comparisons with their belief that demography and left power are fully exogenous and conditionally unitary.

There exist several, not necessarily efficient, ways of correcting for the endogeneity bias. If we have some inkling that the bias comes from variable omission, the obvious correction entails the inclusion of additional controls. An example of this kind was Jackman's (1986) argument that Norway's North Sea Oil was over-determining the results in the Lange and Garrett (1985) study. Small N studies with strong endogeneity have little capacity to extend the number of potentially necessary controls. A second approach is to limit endogeneity in X by reconceptualizing and, most likely, narrowing Y . The welfare state literature provides a prototypical example: aggregate social expenditure increasingly was replaced by measures of specific welfare state traits.

Controls, no matter how many, will however not resolve the problem under conditions of strong sampling bias. As discussed above, the best solution in such a situation is to concentrate more on the theoretical elaboration of causal relations between variables. If we can assume that our estimations are biased because Y affects the values on X , or because both are jointly attributable to a third underlying force, thinking in counterfactual terms ('would Sweden's welfare state be the same without Sweden's social democracy') will force the researcher to identify more precisely the direct or derived causal connections (Fearon 1991). If bias can be assumed to come from the assumption of monotonically homogeneous effects of the X across all nations, the researcher's attention should concentrate on identifying more precisely the conditional mechanisms that are involved in the causal passage from an X to a Y (why and how will a 5-point rise in left power make the Danish welfare state converge with the Swedish?).

6. Conclusion

The difficulties and tradeoffs that we have synthesized above are intrinsic to all quantitative research, but are often more difficult to deal with in national comparisons because of the inevitability of small samples of countries and of the ways in which nations have developed together in interaction and will continue to do so even more in the future, given globalization. However, the difficulties should not be seen as paralyzing research but rather as stimulating attempts to deal with them. Indeed, in most practical situations today, each of these problems can be dealt with, albeit not perfectly. So, today's partial vices may be the impetus to tomorrow's virtues. Although we may never be able to completely resolve all problems, ongoing trends suggest that our capacity to conduct good quality research in this field is improving rapidly. For one, the constraints of small N 's are diminishing because of rapid progress in data quality and quantity, covering both more years and nations. Second, the field has made great strides in terms of researchers' substantial comparative knowledge of the nations and cultures under study. Hence, our ability to interpret and contextualize statistical findings has greatly strengthened. And this, in turn, is a major precondition for what we believe is the single most effective tool with which to manage the challenges of quantitative comparison: namely, to systematically think in terms of counterfactuals.

Bibliography

- Amemyia T 1985 Advanced Econometrics. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Beck N, Katz J N 1995 What to do (and not to do) with times-series, cross-section data. American Political Science Review 89: 634–47
- Beck N, Katz J N, Tucker R 1998 Taking time seriously: Time series-cross-section analysis with a binary dependent variable. American Journal of Political Science 42: 1260–88
- Blossfeld H P, Roehwer G 1995 Techniques of Event History Modelling: New Approaches to Causal Analysis. L. Erlbaum, Mahwah, NJ
- Bollen K A 1980 Issues in the comparative measurement of political democracy. American Sociological Review 45: 370–90
- Bollen K A, Jackman R W 1989 Democracy, stability, and dichotomies. American Sociological Review 54: 612–21
- Esping-Andersen G, Sonnberger H 1991 The demographics of age in labor market management. In: Myles J, Quadagno J (eds.) States, Labor Markets, and the Future of Old-Age Policy. Temple University Press, Philadelphia, PA, pp. 227–49

- Fearon J D 1991 Counterfactuals and hypothesis testing in political science. World Politics 43: 169–95
- Goldberger A 1983 Abnormal selection bias. In: Karlin S, Amemyia T, Goodman L A (eds.) Studies in Econometrics, Time Series, and Multivariate Statistics. Academic Press, New York
- Goldstein H 1987 Multilevel Models in Educational and Social Research. Oxford University Press, New York
- Heckman J J 1988 The microeconomic evaluation of social programs and economic institutions. In: Chung-Hua Series of Lectures by Invited Eminent Economists no. 14. The Institute of Economics, Academia Sinica, Taipei, China
- Hsiao C 1986 Analysis of Panel Data. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Isaac L W, Griffin L J 1989 A historicism in time-series analyses of historical process. American Sociological Review 54: 873–90
- Jackman R 1986 The politics of economic growth in industrial democracies, 1974–1980: Leftist strength or North Sea oil? Journal of Politics 49: 242–56
- Janoski T, Hicks A (eds.) 1994 The Comparative Political Economy of the Welfare State. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Lange P, Jarrett G 1985 The politics of growth. Journal of Politics 47: 792–827
- Maddala G S 1983 Limited-dependent and Qualitative Variables in Econometrics. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Nickell S 1997 Unemployment and labor market rigidities: Europe versus North America. Journal of Economic Perspectives 11(3): 55–74
- Nieuwebeerta P, Ultee W 1999 Class voting in Western industrialized countries, 1945–1990: systematizing and testing explanations. European Journal of Political Research 35: 123–60
- Przeworski A, Alvarez M R, Cheibub J A, Limongi F in press Democracy and Development: Political Regimes and Material Welfare in the World, 1950–1990. Cambridge University Press, New York
- Ragin C 1987 The Comparative Method. University of California Press, Berkeley, CA
- Ragin C 1994 A qualitative comparative analysis of pension systems. In: Janoski T, Hicks A M (eds.) The Comparative Political Economy of the Welfare State. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK, pp. 320–45
- Stimson J A 1985 Regression in time and space: A statistical essay. American Journal of Political Science 29: 914–47
- Western B 1998a Causal heterogeneity in comparative research: A Bayesian hierarchical modeling approach. American Journal of Political Science 42: 1233–59
- Western B 1998b Between Class and Market: Postwar Unionization in the Capitalist Democracies. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ

G. Esping-Andersen and A. Przeworski

Quasi-Experimental Designs

The theory of quasi-experimentation addresses one of the great unanswered questions in the social and behavioral sciences: how can researchers make a valid causal inference when units cannot be randomly assigned to conditions? Like all experiments, quasi-experiments deliberately manipulate presumed causes to discover their effects. However, quasi-experiments are also defined by what they do not do: the researcher does not assign units to conditions randomly. Instead, quasi-experiments use a combination of design features, practical logic, and statistical analysis to show that the presumed cause is likely to be responsible for the observed effect, and other causes are not. The term nonrandomized experiment is synonymous with quasi-experiment; and the terms observational study and nonexperimental design often include quasi-experiments as a subset. This article discusses the need for quasi-experimentation, describes the kinds of designs that fall into this class of methods, reviews the intellectual and practical history of these designs, and notes important current developments.

1. The Need for Quasi-experimentation

Given the desirable properties of randomized experiments, one might question why quasi-experiments are needed. When properly implemented, randomized experiments yield unbiased estimates of treatment effects, accompanied by known probabilities of error in identifying effect size. Quasi-experimental designs do not have these properties. Yet quasi-experiments are necessary in the arsenal of science because it is not always possible to randomize. Ethical constraints may preclude withholding treatment from needy people based on chance, those who administer treatment may refuse to honor randomization, or questions about program effects may arise after a treatment was already implemented so that randomization is impossible. Consequently, the use of quasi-experimental designs is frequent and inevitable in practice.

2. Kinds of Quasi-experimental Designs

The range of quasi-experimental designs is large, including but not limited to: (a) Nonequivalent control group designs in which the outcomes of two or more treatment or comparison conditions are studied but the experimenter does not control assignment to conditions; (b) Interrupted time series designs in which many consecutive observations over time (prototypically 100) are available on an outcome, and treatment is introduced in the midst of those observations to demonstrate its impact on the outcome through a discontinuity in the time series after treatment; (c) Regression discontinuity designs in which the experimenter uses a cutoff score on a measured variable to determine eligibility for treatment, and an effect is observed if the regression line (of the assignment variable on outcome) for the treatment group is discontinuous from that of the comparison group at the cutoff score; (d) Single-case designs in which one participant is repeatedly observed over time (usually on fewer occasions than in time series) while the scheduling and dose of treatment are manipulated to demonstrate that treatment controls outcome.

In the preceding designs, treatment is manipulated, and outcome is then observed. Two other classes of designs are sometimes included as quasi-experiments, even though the presumed cause is not manipulated (and often not even manipulable) prior to observing the outcome. In (e) case-control designs, a group with an outcome of interest is compared to a group without that outcome to see if they differ retrospectively in exposure to possible causes in the past; and in (f) correlational designs, observations on possible treatments and outcomes are observed simultaneously, often with a survey, to see if they are related. Because these designs do not ensure that cause precedes effect, as it must logically do, they usually yield more equivocal causal inferences.

3. The History of Quasi-experimental Designs

Quasi-experimental designs have an even longer history than randomized experiments. For example, around 1,850 epidemiologists used case-control methods to identify contaminated water supplies as the cause of cholera in London (Schlesselman 1982), and in 1898, Triplett used a nonequivalent control group design to show that the presence of audience and competitors improved the performance of bicyclists. In fact, nearly all experiments conducted prior to Fisher's work were quasi-experiments.

However, it was not until 1963 that the term quasi-experiment was coined by Campbell and Stanley (1963) to describe this class of designs. Campbell and his colleagues (Cook and Campbell 1979, Shadish et al. in press) extended the theory and practice of these designs in three ways. First, they described a large number of these designs, including variations of the designs described above. For example, some quasi-experimental designs are inherently longitudinal (e.g., time series, single case designs), observing participants over time, but other designs can be made longitudinal by adding more observations before or after treatment. Similarly, more than one treatment or control group can be used, and the designs can be combined, as when adding a nonequivalent control group to a time series.

Second, Campbell developed a method to evaluate the quality of causal inferences resulting from quasi-experimental designs—a validity typology that was elaborated in Cook and Campbell (1979). The typology includes four validity types and threats to validity for each type. Threats are common reasons why researchers may be wrong about the causal inferences they draw. Statistical conclusion validity concerns inferences about whether and how much presumed cause and effect co-vary; examples of threats to statistical conclusion validity include low statistical power, violated assumptions of statistical tests, and inaccurate effect size estimates. Internal validity concerns inferences that observed co-variation is due to the presumed treatment causing the presumed outcome; examples include history (extraneous events that could also cause the effect), maturation (natural growth processes that could cause an observed change), and selection (differences between groups before treatment that may cause differences after treatment). Construct validity concerns inferences about higher-order constructs that research operations represent; threats include experimenter expectancy effects whereby participants react to what they believe the experimenter wants to observe rather than to the intended treatment, and mono-operation bias in which researchers use only one measure that reflects a construct imperfectly or incorrectly. External validity concerns inferences about generalizing a causal relationship over variations in units, treatments, observations, settings, and times; threats include interactions of the treatment with other features of the design that produce unique effects that would not otherwise be observed.

Third, Campbell's theory emphasized addressing threats to validity using design features—things that a researcher can manipulate to prevent a threat from occurring or to diagnose its presence and potential impact on study results (see Table 1). For example, suppose maturation (normal development) is an anticipated threat to validity because it could cause a pretest-post-test change like that attributed to the treatment. The inclusion of several consecutive pretests before treatment can indicate whether the rate of maturation before treatment is similar to the rate of change from during and after treatment. If it is similar, maturation is a threat. All quasi-experiments are combinations of these design features, thoughtfully chosen to diagnose or rule out threats to validity in a particular context. Conversely, Campbell was skeptical about the more difficult task of trying to adjust threats statistically after they have already occurred. The reason is that statistical adjustments require making assumptions, the validity of which are usually impossible to test, and some of which are dubious (e.g., that the selection model is known fully, or that the functional form of errors is known).

Other scholars during this time were also interested in causal inferences in quasi-experiments, such as Cochran (1965) in statistics, Heckman (1979) in economics, and Hill (1953) in epidemiology. However, Campbell's work was unique for its extensive emphasis on design rather than statistical analysis, for its theory of how to evaluate causal inferences, and for its sustained development of quasi-experimental theory

Table 1

Design elements used in constructing quasi-experiments

Assignment (Control of assignment strategies to increase group comparability)Cutoff-based assignment. Controlled assignment to conditions based solely on one or more fully measured covariates. This can yield an unbiased effect estimate*Other nonrandom assignment.* Various forms of ‘haphazard’ assignment that sometimes approximate randomization (e.g., alternating assignment in a two condition quasi-experiment whereby every other unit is assigned to one condition, etc.)Matching and stratifying. Efforts to create groups equivalent on observed covariates in ways that are stable, do not lead to regression artifacts, and are correlated with the outcome. Preference is for pretreatment measures of the outcome itself*Measurement* (Use of measures to learn whether threats to causal inference actually operate)

Post-test observations

Nonequivalent dependent variables. Measures that are not sensitive to the causal forces of the treatment, but are sensitive to all or most of the confounding causal forces that might lead to false conclusions about treatment effects (if such measures show no effect, but the outcome measures do show an effect, the causal inference is bolstered because it is less likely due to the confounds)Multiple substantive post-tests. Used to assess whether the treatment affects a complex pattern of theoretically predicted outcomes

Pretest observations

Single pretest. A pretreatment measure on the outcome variable, useful to help diagnose selection bias*Retrospective pretest.* Reconstructed pretests when actual pretests are not feasible—by itself, a very weak design feature, but sometimes better than nothing*Proxy pretest.* When a true pretest is not feasible, a pretest on a variable correlated with the outcome—also often weak by itself*Multiple pretest time points on the outcome.* Helps reveal pretreatment trends or regression artifacts that might complicate causal inference*Pretests on independent samples.* When a pretest is not feasible on the treated sample, one is obtained from a randomly equivalent sample*Complex predictions* such as predicted interactions. Successfully predicted interactions lend support to causal inference because alternative explanations become less plausible*Measurement of threats to internal validity.* Help diagnose the presence of specific threats to the inference that A caused B such as whether units actively sought out additional treatments outside the experiment*Comparison groups* (Selecting comparisons that are ‘less nonequivalent’ or that bracket the treatment group at the pretest(s))Single nonequivalent groups. Compared to studies without control groups, using a nonequivalent control group helps identify many plausible threats to validity*Multiple nonequivalent groups.* Serve several functions. For instance, groups are selected that are as similar as possible to the treated group but at least one outperforms it initially and at least one underperforms it, thus bracketing the treated group*Cohorts.* Comparison groups chosen from the same institution in a different cycle (e.g., sibling controls in families or last year’s students in schools)Internal (vs. external) controls. Plausibly chosen from within the same population (e.g., within the same school rather than from a different school)Treatment (Manipulations of the treatment to demonstrate that treatment variability affects outcome variability)Removed treatments. Showing an effect diminishes if treatment is removed*Repeated treatments.* Reintroduces treatments after they have been removed from some group—common in laboratory sciences or where treatments have short-term effects*Switching replications.* Reverses treatment and control group roles so that one group is the control while the other receives treatment, but the controls receive treatment later while the original treatment group receives no further treatment or has treatment removed*Reversed treatments.* Provides a conceptually similar treatment that reverses an effect—e.g., reducing access to a computer for some students but increasing access for others*Dosage variation.* Demonstrates that outcome responds systematically to different levels of treatment and method over four decades. Both the theory and the methods he outlined were widely adopted in practice during the last half of the twentieth century, and his terms like internal and external validity became so much a part of the scientific lexicon that today they are often used without reference to Campbell.

4. Contemporary Research about Quasi-experimental Design

4.1 Statistics and Quasi-experimental Design

Although work on the statistical analysis of quasi-experimental designs deserves separate treatment, several contemporary developments deserve mention here. One is the work of statisticians such as Paul Holland, Paul Rosenbaum, and Donald Rubin on statistical models for quasi-experimental designs (e.g., Rosenbaum 1995). They emphasize the need to measure what would have happened to treatment participants without treatment (the counterfactual), and focus on statistics that can improve estimates of the counterfactual without randomization. A central method uses propensity scores, a predicted probability of group membership obtained from logistic regression of actual group membership on predictors of outcome or of how participants got into treatment. Matching, stratifying, or co-varying on the propensity score can balance nonequivalent groups on those predictors, but they cannot balance groups for unobserved variables, so hidden bias may remain. Hence these statisticians have developed sensitivity analyses to measure how much hidden bias would be necessary to change an effect in important ways. Both propensity scores and sensitivity analysis are promising developments warranting wider exploration in quasi-experimental designs.

A second statistical development has been pursued mostly by economists, especially James Heckman and his colleagues, called selection bias modeling (Winship and Mare 1992). The aim is to remove hidden bias in effect estimates from quasi-experiments by modeling the selection process. In principle the statistical models are exciting, but in practice they have been less successful. A series of studies in the 1980s and 1990s found that effect estimates from selection bias models did not match results from randomized experiments. Economists responded with various adjustments to these models, and proposed tests for their appropriate application, but so far results remain discouraging. Most recently, some economists have improved results by combining selection bias models with propensity scores. Although selection bias models cannot yet be recommended for widespread adoption, this topic continues to develop rapidly and serious scholars must attend to it. For example, other economists have developed useful econometrically based sensitivity analyses. Along with the incorporation of propensity scores, this may promise a future convergence in statistical and econometric literatures.

A third development is the use of structural equation modeling (SEM) to study causal relationships in quasi-experiments, but this effort has also been only partly successful (Bollen 1989). The capacity of SEM to model latent variables can sometimes reduce problems of bias caused by unreliability of measurement, but its capacity to generate unbiased effect estimates is hamstrung by the same lack of knowledge of selection that thwarts selection bias models.

4.2 The Empirical Program of Quasi-experimental Design

Many features of quasi-experimentation pertain to matters of empirical fact that cannot be resolved by statistical theory or logical analysis. For these features, a theory of quasi-experimental design benefits from empirical research about these facts. Shadish (2000) has presented an extended discussion of what such an empirical program of quasi-experimentation might look like, including studies of questions like the following:

(a) Can quasi-experiments yield accurate effect estimates, and if so, under what conditions?

(b) Which threats to validity actually occur in practice (e.g., pretest sensitization, experimenter expectancy effects), and if so, under what conditions?

(c) Do the design features in Table 1 improve causal inference when applied to quasi-experimental design, and if so, under what conditions?

Some of this empirical research has already been conducted (see Shadish 2000, for examples). The methodologies used to investigate such questions are eclectic, including case studies, surveys, literature reviews (quantitative and qualitative), and experiments themselves. Until very recently, however, these studies have generally not been systematically used to critique and improve quasi-experimental theory.

5. Conclusion

Three important factors have converged at the end of the twentieth century to create the conditions under which the development of better quasi-experimentation may be possible. First, over 30 years of practical experience with quasi-experimental designs have provided a database from which we can conduct empirical studies of the theory. Second, after decades of focus on randomized designs, statisticians and economists have turned their attention to improving quasi-experimental designs. Third, the computer revolution provided both theorists and practitioners with increased capacity to invent and use more sophisticated and computationally intense methods for improving quasi-experiments. Each in their own way, these three factors have taken us several steps closer to answering that great unanswered question with which this article began.

See also: Campbell, Donald Thomas (1916–96); Comparative Studies: Method and Design; Experimental Design: Overview; Experimental Design:

Randomization and Social Experiments; Experimentation in Psychology, History of; Panel Surveys: Uses and Applications

Bibliography

- Bollen K A 1989 Structural Equations with Latent Variables. Wiley, New York
- Campbell D T, Stanley J C C 1963/1966 Experimental and Quasi-experimental Designs for Research. Rand-McNally, Chicago
- Cochran W G 1965 The planning of observational studies in human populations. Journal of the Royal Statistical Society, Series A General 128: 234–66
- Cook T D, Campbell D T 1979 Quasi-experimentation: Design and Analysis Issues for Field Settings. Rand-McNally, Chicago
- Heckman J J 1979 Sample selection bias as a specification error. Econometrica 47: 153–61
- Hill A B 1953 Observation and experiment. The New England Journal of Medicine 248: 995–1001
- Rosenbaum P R 1995 Observational Studies. Springer-Verlag, New York
- Schlesselman J J 1982 Case-Control Studies: Design, Conduct, Analysis. Oxford University Press, New York
- Shadish W R 2000 The empirical program of quasi-experimentation. In: Bickman L (ed.) Validity and Social Experimentation: Donald Campbell's Legacy. Sage Publications, Thousand Oaks, CA
- Shadish W R, Cook T D, Campbell D T in press Experimental and Quasi-experimental Designs for Generalized Causal Inference. Houghton-Mifflin, Boston
- Triplett N 1898 The dynamogenic factors in pacemaking and competition. American Journal of Psychology 9: 507–33
- Winship C, Mare R D 1992 Models for sample selection bias. Annual Review of Sociology 18: 327–50

W. R. Shadish

Queer Theory

'Queer theory' is a notoriously unstable phrase, and one much in contention. As a new theoretical movement with equally new political counterparts, it is in constant flux and development, and is characterized more by what it challenges and contests than by what it offers in the shape of a unified social theory. Drawing on the work of theorists such as Eve Sedgwick and Judith Butler, queer theory 'describes those gestures or analytical models which dramatise incoherencies in the allegedly stable relations between chromosomal sex, gender and sexual desire (Jagose 1996). In this sense, queer theory is a challenge to the 'obvious categories (man, woman, latina, jew, butch, femme), oppositions (man vs. woman, heterosexual vs. homosexual), or equations (gender = sex) upon which conventional notions of sexuality and identity rely' (Hennessy 1993). Queer theory argues instead that sexual desire and sexual practices are not reducible or explicable solely in terms of identity categories, such as gender, race, class, or sexual orientation. It is radically anti-essentialist, in that it challenges a notion of homosexuality as intrinsic, fixed, innate, and universally present across time and space.

Queer theorists reject any mode of thought that relies on a conception of identity as unified and self-evident (e.g., I have sex with people of the opposite sex, therefore I must be heterosexual), and instead demonstrate that desires, sexual practices, and gendered identities are performances and enactments, rather than expressions of 'true' subjectivity. Heterosexuality is therefore challenged by queer theory not simply as a 'hegemonic' mode of identity, but as a false claim to unity and coherence that is constantly undermined by the incoherencies of sex and gender, incoherencies that the queer analytic hopes to expose and celebrate.

1. Intellectual Origins

In the broadest sense, queer theory emerged in what might be called the postmodern moment, when intellectual unease with unitary and cohesive frameworks of knowing reached a fever pitch. While impossible to summarize here, queer theory's allegiance to postmodern and/or poststructural modes of thought can be traced in its challenge to the notion of unitary identity (as in 'gay' or 'straight'), its refusal to understand sexuality through a singular and unified lens (homosexual desire, feminist theory, gender), a rejection of binary models (gay/straight, man/woman, biological/social, real/constructed), and a more generic critique of identity-based theories and politics that, according to poststructuralist accounts, invariably reproduce the very conditions of repression they desire to challenge. For example, the term 'gay' or 'homosexual' might be critiqued as a (fictional) category that shores up the binary opposition between 'gay' and 'straight' that is itself part of the repressive logic of identity. To claim 'gayness' is therefore not simply or solely an act of self-revelation but is also a way of corraling sexuality within the framework of a category that only appears coherent but that, when opened up, reveals its instability (e.g., Am I still gay if I sleep with a person of the opposite sex? Or if I sleep with those of the same sex but only in certain conditions and in certain ways? Or if my self-understanding is of myself as 'straight?'). Queer theory, in that sense, has developed within and through the deconstructive impulse of poststructuralism, challenging assertions of unitary identity and necessary linkages (between, say, sexual desire and gender orientation) and arguing instead for a more provisional, contingent, and fluid conception of the 'queer' in contemporary culture.

While queer theory emerges as coterminous with postmodern impulses, it also traces its intellectual origins in lesbian/gay studies and feminist theory even as it challenges those very paradigms. While for some the term queer theory is simply a synonym for 'lesbian and gay studies' or even 'feminist theory,' for many it signifies a real shift away from what is understood to be the 'essentialist' underpinnings of those more traditionally defined fields. In that sense, queer theory positions itself as a theoretical framework that rejects the typical binarisms (man/woman, gay/straight) in favor of a more universalist and overarching critique of the whole edifice of 'normalization,' a set of rules, regulations, and normative commands that create the rubric of 'good' vs. 'bad' sexualities. Queer theory takes issue with the ways in which feminist theory has tended to analyze sexuality within the framework of gender, and contests the ways in which 'gay' assumes a lining up of identity with acts, behavior with being. Drawing on the pioneering work of postmodern thinkers such as Michel Foucault and Eve Sedgwick, as well as hard-working historians such as Jonathan Ned Katz, queer theory joins in the disarticulating of sexual identities, sexual practices, and gender that characterizes contemporary postmodern theorizing. Indeed, queer theory takes all the mainstreaming, normalizing impulses to task—be it the scientific move of disciplines or the ethnic minority model of mainstream gay organizations. In general, then, queer theory can be understood as part of the larger intellectual ferment of the late twentieth century that has challenged the very core concepts of Western humanism: identity, science, truth, and authenticity.

2. Social Context

If queer theory develops out of the intellectual movements of poststructuralism, feminist theory, and lesbian and gay studies, it also emerged in the context of recent political alliances and strategies. As the gay community faced AIDS, and governmental reluctance to address this disease was slow and insufficient, gay activist groups developed new, 'in your face' strategies, exemplified by the work of groups such as ACT-UP and Queer Nation. While not always or necessarily drawing on queer theory explicitly, these groups helped to define the terrain of the intellectual discourse by emphasizing a nonnormative, anti-assimilationist alternative to traditional identity politics and minority group formations. As Warner (1991) argues,

The insistence on 'queer'—a term defined against 'normal' and generated precisely in the context of terror—has the effect of pointing out a wide field of normalization, rather than simple intolerance, as the site of violence. Its brilliance as a naming strategy lies in combining resistance on the broad social terrain of the normal with more specific resistance on the terrains of phobia and queer-bashing, on one hand, or of pleasure on the other. 'Queer,' therefore, also suggests the difficulty in defining the population whose interests are at stake in queer politics. And as a partial replacement for 'lesbian and gay' it attempts partially to separate questions of sexuality from those of gender.

Queer theory therefore has a strong affinity with radical political praxis and thus brings to the academy an intellectual movement informed substantively by political crises and interventions.

3. Core Challenges

Queer theory takes as its primary theoretical and analytic focus the destabilization of 'gay and lesbian' and the disruption of the category of gender, particularly in terms of how gendered analysis is often understood to be the appropriate intellectual framework for the study of sexuality. Queer theory critiques the conceptualization of gender as a self-evident and unified category, and argues that this framework leads inexorably to another kind of polarizing and oppressing logic in which categories of identity become ways to 'police' populations whose behaviors, desires, and modes of living seem somehow discordant with the identity in question.

Because queer theory understands sexuality as fluid, mobile, and plural, the concept of 'performance' has been a central one, insisting on the situational and provisional nature of identity. Thus, 'gay' or 'lesbian' or even 'woman' are not understood as self-evident and essential categories, but rather are understood to be enactments of subjectivity. In this queer reading of identity, gender is understood as process, acquisition, enactment, creation. Thus, queer theorists often take as their analytic site the spaces where these performances occur and are highlighted—cross-dressing and drag, for example. Rather than assert a universal humanism (gays are essentially the same as heterosexuals, women are 'as good as' men), queer theory embraces the vilified, denigrated, ostracized identities (much as it embraces the epithet 'queer') and sees in these hybrid spaces (the transsexual, the drag queen) possibilities for a more thorough-going critique of normative culture and its repressive apparatuses.

Therefore, for queer theorists, the problem is not primarily one of bigotry, or lack of tolerance, or even homophobia per se, but rather the edifice of categorization and normalization that forces even those considered 'deviant' to tie behaviors and identities to narrow lines of power, lines that always imply repression and limitation. Queer theory celebrates sexual 'otherness' outside of identity categories (even outside those putatively radical categories such as 'gay' and 'lesbian') because it believes fervently that the power of domination is to be found primarily in the production and enforcement of identity itself. Identities, even alternative ones, carry with them normative assumptions about correct and incorrect ways of living and loving. And while identities give meaning to our lives, they also curtail possibilities by promoting a false sense of unity (this is what a homosexual is) to a human life that is invariably riven with contradictions and inconsistencies. Thus queer theorists search for and celebrate moments of sexual subjectivity that appear outside of, or resistant to, firm categories of unified identity.

4. Queer Theory and the Academy

Queer theory cannot, by any stretch of the imagination, be located in any singular field or characterized by any unified methodology. While it is undoubtedly true that queer theory has found a more hospitable home in the humanities (particularly in departments of comparative literature and English), increasing numbers of social scientists (particularly those working within the broad framework of cultural studies) are engaging with queer theory and adapting it to their own research agendas. However, part of the uniqueness of queer theory comes in its deployment of multiple strategies to analyze a myriad of social and cultural phenomenon. In that sense, queer theory itself becomes a model of a new sort of trans- or even antidisciplinarity in the academic world. That is why most of the interventions in queer theory emerge from specific and located microstudies, rather than from large-scale, grand theoretical ventures. In that way, queer theory evinces much similarity with the growing 'field' of cultural studies, itself marked by a traversing of typical academic and disciplinary boundaries. And, given its emphasis on performativity and on non-normativity, queer theory presents a challenge to academic discourses that seek assimilation within mainstream intellectual life. It is precisely that mainstreaming, that incorporation, that queer theory sets its sights on.

5. Some Critical Notes

Queer theory has been critiqued from any number of locations, but none so persuasively as feminist theorists and theorists of color. Both the feminist and race critiques of queer focus on the ways in which queer theory often assumes implicitly a white, gay maleness as the prototype of queer subjectivity. In addition, both feminists and radical theorists of color have been suspicious of any theoretical framework that vitiates the need for an aggressive identity politics (a politics based on a notion of a unified and 'real' identity—gay, woman, etc.), given that identity politics have been for many the route to social change. For many feminist theorists, queer theory is seen as naive in its claim to transcend gender as a meaningful category of analysis. For them, it is seen as having eviscerated the centrality of gender to social identity, social power, sexuality and sexual, identity by dethroning gender critique as the cornerstone of the critique of both homophobia and sexism. Queer theory, it is argued, sees patriarchal sexuality and sexist culture as almost tangential to the analysis of the repression of sexualities, while feminists have long argued that, for example, homophobia emerges from the larger and more pervasive rubric of sexist and patriarchal ideology and practice.

The point that gender is not the only significant marker of difference is an important one, and one that deserves development and reiteration. The regimes of sexuality and gender are not identical, either historically or theoretically, but many remain skeptical of their premature separation. In much of queer writing, it appears that feminism emerges as the enemy, the agent of a repressive regime of identity categorization, rather than heterosexism and patriarchal violence. Feminism is often depicted in queer theoretical writings as an outdated and essentialist relic of a humanist past, and queer theory, in its transcendence of gender, race, and class, as the postmodern mode of the future. Martin (1994) has argued that, for Sedgwick and others, race and gender often assume a fixity, a stability, a ground, whereas sexuality (typically thematized as male) becomes the 'means of crossing' and the figure of mobility. In the process of making the female body the 'drag' on the (male) play of sexuality, 'the female body appears to become its own trap, and the operations of misogyny disappear from view.'

Queer theory's relation to the politics and theorizing of racialized identities is no less fraught with difficulties than its relation to feminism and feminist identities. The generalizing tendencies of queerness (queer as everything not normatively heterosexual) has the potential to evacuate the specificities of racialized identities in favor of a queer universalism that claims multiracial status without ever developing seriously a race-based critique of heteronormativity, and without ever considering seriously the ways in which heterosexual dominance depends on certain racial ideologies. Queer can 'de-race' the homosexual of color in much the same way 'old-time' gay studies often has, effectively erasing the specificity of 'raced' gay existence under a queer rubric in which whiteness is not problematized. Dhairyam (1994) critiques the implicit whiteness of queerness while still attempting to activate the category 'queer women of color': 'Queer theory comes increasingly to be reckoned with as critical discourse, but concomitantly writes a queer whiteness over raced queerness, it domesticates race in its elaboration of sexual difference.' Anzaldúa (1991) also accuses white academics of co-opting the term 'queer' and using it to construct 'a false unifying umbrella which all "queers" of all races, ethnicities and classes are shoved under.'

Many have argued that queer theory lives in a realm of almost utopian idealism and abstraction, where the material conditions of marginalized populations are 'performed' away by theoretical sleights of hand, as if oppression is solely a matter of sexuality, and its representation and regulation. This inattention to material social relations (commodification, the fluctuations of international capital, shifting forms of familial life, rise in antigay activism, regressive social legislation, increasing disenfranchisement of people of color, etc.) and the academicism of much of queer writing might be problems for a lesbian/gay praxis that is both class and race conscious.

6. Future Directions

Many self-defined queer theorists have taken these criticisms to heart and are attempting to reframe queer theory to pay more attention to structural social conditions, bodily realities, and the lived vicissitudes of race, class, and gender violence. Hennessy's (1994) piece is an exemplary attempt to hold on to the insights of queer theory while insisting that we pay attention to the material social conditions (such as class) that help to determine who can or cannot have access to the brave new queer world. She demands forcefully that queer theorists pay more attention to the processes of commodification and avoid valorizing a politics of the outrageous at the expense of attending to the realities of structured social relations, relations not reducible to the discursive or cultural, although certainly not determinative of them either. Queer may hold out some possibilities for a politics and a theory that challenges the fixity and clarity of identity, that speaks to the fractured (non)self of postmodern subjectivity. The queer challenge to the notion of sexual identity as monolithic, obvious, and dichotomous is a healthy corrective to our vexing inability to see beyond the limitations of the homo/hetero opposition. In addition, the openness of the term 'queer' provides the possibility of theorizing 'beyond the hyphen,' beyond the additive models (race, class, gender, sexual orientation = oppressed identity) that have so often seemed to set up new hierarchies, or instead retreated into an empty recitation of 'difference.' In this sense, queer theory can make theoretical and political space for more substantive notions of multiplicity and the intersecting and often contradictory lines of desire, identity, and sexuality.

See also: Androgyny; Feminist Ethics; Feminist Movements; Feminist Theology; Feminist Theory; Feminist Theory: Postmodern; Feminist Theory: Radical Lesbian; Foucault, Michel (1926–84); Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Youth; Gay/Lesbian Movements; Gender and Feminist Studies; Gender, Class, Race, and Ethnicity, Social Construction of; Gender Ideology: Cross-cultural Aspects; Heterosexism and Homophobia; Homosexuality and Psychiatry; Lesbians: Historical Perspectives; Lesbians: Social and Economic Situation; Male Dominance; Masculinities and Femininities; Nontraditional Families and Child Development; Rationality and Feminist Thought; Regulation: Sexual Behavior; Sexual Behavior and

Maternal Functions, Neurobiology of; Sexual Behavior: Sociological Perspective; Sexual Orientation and the Law; Sexual Orientation: Biological Influences; Sexual Preference: Genetic Aspects; Sexual Risk Behaviors; Sexuality and Gender; Sexually Transmitted Diseases: Psychosocial Aspects; Transsexuality, Transvestism, and Transgender

Bibliography

- Anzaldúa G 1991 To(o) queer the writer—loca, escritora y chicana. In: Warland B (ed.) Inversions: Writing by Dykes, Queers, and Lesbians. Press Gang Publishers, Vancouver, BC, pp. 249–63
- Beemyn B, Eliason M (eds.) 1996 Queer Studies: A Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, and Transgender Anthology. New York University Press, New York
- Bergman D 1993 Disciplining gay and lesbian studies. Andrew R. Hilén Lecture at the University of Washington, Seattle, WA
- Butler J 1990 Gender Trouble: Feminism and the Subversion of Identity. Routledge, New York
- Butler J 1991 Imitation and gender insubordination. In: Fuss D (ed.) Inside/Out. Routledge, New York, pp. 13–31
- Butler J 1993a Critically queer. GLQ: A Journal of Lesbian and Gay Studies 1: 17–32
- Butler J 1993b Bodies That Matter. Routledge, New York
- de Lauretis T 1991 Queer theory: Lesbian and gay sexualities, an introduction. Differences 3(2): iii–xviii
- D'Emilio J 1983 Sexual Politics, Sexual Communities: The Making of a Homosexual Minority in the United States, 1940–1970. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
- Dhairiyam S 1994 Racing the lesbian, dodging white critics. In: Doan L (ed.) The Lesbian Postmodern. Columbia University Press, New York pp. 25–46
- Doty A 1993 Making Things Perfectly Queer: Interpreting Mass Culture. University of Minnesota Press, Minneapolis, MN
- Duggan L 1992 Making it perfectly queer. Socialist Review 22(1): 11–31
- Duggan L 1994 Queering the state. Social Text 39: 1–14
- Editors 1990/1993 Introduction. Radical America 24(4): 2–13
- Fuss D (ed.) 1991 Inside/Out: Lesbian Theories, Gay Theories. Routledge, New York
- Harper P B, White E F, Cerullo M 1990/1993 Multi/Queer/Culture. Radical America 24(4): 27–37
- Hennessy R 1993 Queer theory: A review of the Differences special issue and Wittig's The Straight Mind. Signs 18(4): 964–73
- Hennessy R 1995 Queer visibility in commodity culture. Cultural Critique 29: 31–76
- Jagose A 1996 Queer Theory: An Introduction. New York University Press, New York
- Kader C, Piontek T 1992 Introduction. Discourse 15(1): 5–10
- Katz J N 1995 The Invention of Heterosexuality. Dutton, New York
- Kitzinger C, Wilkinson S 1994 Virgins and queers: Rehabilitating heterosexuality? Gender & Society 8(3): 444–63
- Martin B 1993 Lesbian identity and autobiographical difference(s). In: Abelow H, Barale M A, Halperin D M (eds.) The Lesbian and Gay Studies Reader. Routledge, New York pp. 274–93
- Martin B 1994 Sexualities without genders and other queer Utopias and gay and lesbian studies. Diacritics 24(2–3): 104–21

- Moraga C, Hollibaugh A 1983 What we're rollin around in bed with: Sexual silences in feminism. In: Snitow A, Stansell C, Thompson S (eds.) Powers of Desire: The Politics of Sexuality. Monthly Review Press, New York, pp. 394–405
- Morton D (ed.) 1996 The Material Queer: A LesBiGay Cultural Studies Reader. Westview Press, Boulder, CO
- Nunokawa J 1992 Identity crisis: Queer politics in the age of possibilities. Interview by Alisa Solomon. Village Voice 30 (June): 27
- Phelan S 1993 (Be)Coming out: Lesbian identity and politics. Signs 18(4): 773–90
- Reid-Pharr R 1990/1993 The spectacle of blackness. Radical America 24(4): 57–65
- Rubin G S 1993 Thinking sex: notes for a radical theory of the politics of sexuality. In: Abelove H, Barale M A, Halperin D M (eds.) The Lesbian and Gay Studies Reader. Routledge, New York, pp. 3–44
- Sedgwick E K 1989 Across gender, across sexuality: Willa Cather and others. South Atlantic Quarterly 88(1): 53–72
- Sedgwick E K 1990 Epistemology of the Closet. University of California Press, Berkeley, CA
- Sedgwick E K 1991 How to bring your kids up gay. Social Text 29: 18–27
- Sedgwick E K 1993 Tendencies. Duke University Press, Durham, NC
- Seidman S 1994 Queer pedagogy/queer-ing sociology. Critical Sociology 20(3): 167–76
- Seidman S (ed.) 1996 Queer Theory/Sociology. Blackwell, Cambridge, MA
- Seidman S 1997 Difference Troubles: Queering Social Theory and Sexual Politics. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Smith B 1993 Queer politics: Where's the revolution? The Nation 5 (July): 12–16
- Stein A 1992 Sisters and queers: The decentering of lesbian feminism. Socialist Review 22(1): 33–55
- Walters S 1995 Material Girls: Making Sense of Feminist Cultural Theory. University of California Press, Berkeley, CA
- Walters S 1996 From here to queer: Radical feminism, post-modernism, and the lesbian menace (or, Why can't a woman be more like a fag?) Signs 21(4) (Summer): 830–69
- Warner M 1991 Fear of a queer planet. Social Text 9(4): 3–17
- Warner M 1992 From queer to eternity: An army of theorists cannot fail. Voice Literary Supplement June: 18–19
- Warner M (ed.) 1993 Fear of a Queer Planet: Queer Politics and Social Theory. University of Minnesota Press, Minneapolis, MN
- Whisman V 1993 Identity crises: Who is a lesbian, anyway? In: Stein A (ed.) Sisters, Sexperts, Queers. Plume, New York, pp. 47–60

S. D. Walters

Questionnaires: Assessing Subjective Expectations

Questionnaires are used to elicit from individuals a broad array of objective information about their experiences and environments, as well as subjective information about their thoughts and perceptions. An important objective of social and behavioral science research is to make questionnaires more informative.

In practical terms, how should the questionnaire be administered and what should be its content? Aspects of questionnaire administration include when and where the data are collected, who does the data collection, and the mode of administration (e.g., face-to-face, telephone, or Internet). Aspects of content begin with the basic matter of determining the purposes of the questionnaire and end with specific issues of item wording, the sequencing of questions, and the formatting of responses.

This article focuses on a single topic about questionnaires—how to elicit respondents' subjective expectations of future events. For example, demographers ask women to predict their future fertility and political scientists ask citizens to predict their voting behavior in upcoming elections. Researchers use the responses to expectation questions to predict fertility, voting behavior, and other future events. They also use the responses to assess how individuals' perceptions of the future are related to the decisions they make today. Subjective expectations of future events seem to be measured with increasing frequency. Yet the social and behavioral sciences have not formed a common view on how subjective expectations should be conceptualized and measured. A particularly intriguing controversy, described in this article, concerns the relative merits of verbal and probabilistic forms of questioning.

1. Subjective Concepts and Measures

A US National Research Council (NRC) panel study on Surveying Subjective Phenomena has distinguished subjective from objective phenomena as follows (Turner and Martin 1984, p. 8):

Subjective phenomena are those that, in principle, can be directly known, if at all, only by persons themselves, although a person's intimate associates or a skilled observer may be able to surmise from indirect evidence what is going on 'inside.' Objective phenomena are those that can be known by evidence that is, in principle, directly accessible to an external observer.

The NRC panel acknowledged that the sharp dichotomy just drawn is not always tenable, but the essential idea clearly has content: subjective phenomena are not amenable to external verification.

The social and behavioral sciences have a common interest in understanding subjective phenomena, but the various disciplines have not been able to agree on concepts or measures. The conceptual problem is to characterize what is going on 'inside.' A reader of social and behavioral science research encounters an enormous variety of subjective concepts in use, with concepts that are central to one discipline often playing no role in others. A modest sense of this variety can be obtained by scanning the introductory chapter of Turner and Martin (1984), which mentions affect, aspirations, attitudes, disappointments, dispositions, emotions, frustrations, fulfillment, happiness, hopes, intentions, motives, opinions, plans, preferences, quality of life, satisfaction, and values.

The measurement problem is to obtain empirical evidence on what is going on 'inside.' A reader of empirical research in sociology, social psychology, or political science finds much analysis of subjective data elicited from survey respondents through questionnaires. Yet a reader of anthropology or economics finds little reliance on questionnaire responses. Anthropologists, who tend to recoil from the tightly scripted structure of questionnaires, have preferred to elicit information through conversations. Economists, who tend to be skeptical of subjective data of any kind, have sought to infer subjective phenomena from observations of behavior and experiences.

To illuminate the diversity of perspectives on subjective phenomena, this article examines how different disciplines have used questionnaires to study subjective expectations about potential future events. How persons perceive the future is a shared concern of all social and behavioral science disciplines. Yet there is a wide spectrum of views on how expectations should be conceptualized and measured.

Section 2 examines the prevailing practice in economics of inferring expectations from realization data, and recalls early efforts to collect data on economic expectations through questionnaires. Section 3 describes qualitative attitudinal research as practiced by sociologists and social psychologists. Section 4 describes the growing body of research in economics and cognitive psychology eliciting subjective probabilities of future events. Section 5 considers the relative merits of qualitative and probabilistic modes of questioning. Section 6 poses directions for future research on subjective expectations. See Dominitz and Manski (1999) for a more detailed exposition of the subjects discussed below.

2. Inference on Expectations in Economics

Early in their careers, economics students are taught that a good economist believes only what people do, not what they say. Skeptical of subjective data, economists have sought to infer expectations of future events by combining data on past experiences with assumptions about processes of expectation formation. This is a daunting task. To infer expectations from data on past experiences, economists must speculate about what information persons possess and how they use the available information to form their expectations.

Consider, for example, the matter of income expectations. Economists often assume that persons use their own past incomes to forecast their future incomes. Perhaps so, but how do persons form expectations of future income conditional on past income? Economists often assume that persons have rational expectations; that is, they know the actual stochastic process generating their income streams. Perhaps so, but what is this stochastic process? The practice has been to specify the income process up to some parameters and use available data on income realizations to estimate the parameters. Authors differ, however, in their specifications. So the literature displays competing models of expectations formation, with no clear way of distinguishing among them. See Dominitz and Manski (1997a).

If inference on expectations from data on experiences is so challenging, why do economists not collect and analyze data on expectations? The answer lies at least partly in the history of a scientific controversy that began in the 1940s and persisted until the 1960s. In the 1940s, the US Federal Reserve Board began to fund an annual Survey of Consumer Finances, conducted by the University of Michigan Survey Research Center (SRC), that elicited qualitative assessments of expected household finances. A typical question took this form:

How about a year from now—do you think you people will be making more money or less money than you are now, or what do you expect?

The usefulness of responses to such qualitative questions was controversial and the Federal Reserve Board appointed a committee to assess their value. The Federal Reserve Consultant Committee on Consumer Survey Statistics (1955) issued findings that questioned the predictive power of the SRC expectations data. The negative findings of the Committee were challenged by SRC researchers, notably George Katona, a leading proponent of research on consumer attitudes and expectations (Katona 1957). A contentious conference on expectations data followed (National Bureau of Economic Research 1960). Then Juster (1964) reported an intensive study, drawing largely negative conclusions, of the usefulness of qualitative expectations data in predicting individual behavior.

The Federal Reserve–SRC controversy only concerned the usefulness of a certain type of qualitative expectations data in predicting consumer behavior. Academic economists, however, appear to have drawn the broader conclusion that all expectations data are suspect. Economists also failed to take note when Juster (1966) proposed elicitation of probabilistic expectations of consumer durable purchases and reported favorable empirical evidence. Exploration of this idea had to wait a quarter century, as described in Sect. 4.

3. Qualitative Attitudinal Research

The Federal Reserve–SRC controversy may have soured most economists on the usefulness of qualitative expectations data, but the collection and analysis of such data have long been important activities in other behavioral and social science disciplines. Many questions in common use have a structure similar to that of this General Social Survey (GSS) question eliciting expectations of job loss (Davis and Smith 1994):

Thinking about the next twelve months, how likely do you think it is that you will lose your job or be laid off—very likely, fairly likely, not too likely, or not at all likely?

This GSS question illustrates well a basic persistent problem that researchers face in interpreting qualitative expectations data—assessment of the inter- and intrapersonal comparability of responses. Respondents are often asked to report whether a specified event is ‘expected,’ ‘likely,’ or ‘probable’ to occur. Sometimes they are asked to report their strength of belief in the event on a numerical scale with undefined units. Do different respondents interpret these verbal phrases and numerical scales in the same way? Does a given respondent interpret them in the same way when asked about different events? Cognitive research does not give reason to think that responses should be or are comparable. Indeed, the available empirical evidence indicates that interpretations of qualitative expectations questions vary substantially between persons (see Sect. 5).

Concern about interpersonal comparability comes into even sharper focus when considering the events about which respondents are asked. Attitudinal researchers often ask respondents about vaguely defined future outcomes, as in this SRC question (Curtin 1982):

Now looking ahead—do you think that a year from now you (and your family living there) will be better off financially, or worse off, or just about the same as now?

How should a respondent interpret the phrase ‘better off financially?’ Do different respondents interpret it the same way? The data provide no way of knowing.

A second persistent problem in qualitative attitudinal research is that the coarseness of the response options limits the information contained in the responses. Consider, for example, the fertility question asked female respondents in the annual June Supplement to the Current Population Survey of the US Bureau of the Census:

Looking ahead, do you expect to have any (more) children?
Yes No Uncertain

The three response options can express little of the richness of the uncertainty that women may perceive about their future childbearing. Savage (1971, p. 795) called attention to the problem when he observed that ‘Yes, No, or Maybe is Not Enough.’ Juster (1966) hypothesized that a person facing a Yes/No expectations question responds as would a statistician asked to make a best point prediction of a future random event. Manski (1990) formalized this hypothesis and derived an upper bound on the information about expectations a researcher can extract from responses to Yes/No questions.

4. Elicitation of Probabilistic Expectations

A growing body of research in economics and cognitive psychology elicits expectations in the form of subjective probabilities. For example, the Survey of Economic Expectations uses this question to elicit expectations of job loss (Dominitz and Manski 1997b):

What do you think is the percent chance that you will lose your job during the next 12 months?

The National Longitudinal Study of Youth: 1997 Cohort of the US Bureau of Labor Statistics elicits the fertility expectations of teenage [girls/boys] as follows:

What is the percent chance that you will become the [mom/dad] of a baby sometime between now and when you turn 20?

Probabilistic questions of similar structure are posed in other national surveys, such as the Health and Retirement Study (Juster and Suzman 1995) and the Bank of Italy’s Survey of Household Income and Wealth, as well as in small-scale surveys such as the one described in Quadrel et al. (1993).

The idea that probabilistic elicitation of expectations might improve on the traditional qualitative approaches of attitudinal research developed independently in economics and in cognitive psychology. In economics, the idea appears to have originated with Juster (1966), who recommended elicitation of purchase probabilities for consumer durable goods. Market researchers were immediately attracted to Juster’s proposal, and elicitation of purchase probabilities has since become a common practice in market research (e.g., Jamieson and Bass 1989). However, the idea that expectations might be elicited probabilistically from survey respondents did not draw serious attention within economics until the early 1990s, when economists began to re-assess the discipline’s self-imposed prohibition on the collection and analysis of subjective data.

Elicitation of subjective probabilities has a more continuous history of research in cognitive psychology. Psychologists have long conducted calibration studies assessing the accuracy of elicited expectations reports when the outcome is known. Lichtenstein et al. (1982) reviewed findings from calibration studies dating back to 1906. McClelland and Bolger (1994) updated the review with findings from 1980 through 1994. Whereas the older studies mostly examined the accuracy of experts (e.g., weather forecasters’ reported probabilities of precipitation), the more recent research typically analyzes the expectations of non-experts, especially students situated in a cognitive laboratory.

5. Qualitative vs. Probabilistic Expectations

As this article is written, a consensus has yet to emerge on the relative merits in practice of qualitative and probabilistic elicitation of subjective expectations. However, there is reasonably widespread agreement that elicitation of probabilistic expectations has several a priori desirable features. Perhaps the most basic attraction is that probability provides a well-defined absolute numerical scale for responses. Hence there is some reason to think that responses may be inter- and intrapersonally comparable.

A second attraction is that some empirical assessment of the internal consistency and external accuracy of respondents' expectations is possible. A researcher can use the algebra of probability (Bayes Theorem, the law of total probability, etc.) to examine the internal consistency of a respondent's elicited expectations about different events. In those cases where probability has a frequentist interpretation, a researcher can compare elicited subjective probabilities with known event frequencies, as is done in calibration studies, and reach conclusions about the correspondence between subjective beliefs and frequentist realities.

A third consideration is the usefulness of elicited expectations in predicting prospective outcomes. Suppose that respondents have reasonably accurate expectations about the likelihood of future events. Then, as argued by Juster (1966), Savage (1971), and Manski (1990), numerical responses to probability questions should have more predictive power than categorical responses to qualitative expectations questions.

These a priori desirable features of probabilistic expectations data must be weighed against a set of unresolved issues. Perhaps the most basic concern is that there is no direct way to assess how well elicited subjective probabilities reflect respondents' thinking. Of course this concern is not specific to elicitation of probabilities. Interpretation of responses to subjective questions of any type runs up against the generic problem that a researcher cannot directly observe a respondent's thinking.

A specific concern in the elicitation of probabilities is that respondents may not think probabilistically about uncertain events. A large and diverse literature suggests that persons may think about uncertain events using less than the full structure of modern probability theory (e.g., Camerer and Weber 1992). If so, then questions eliciting precise probabilities force respondents to give point responses when only interval responses may be meaningful.

Within cognitive psychology, there has long been controversy about the way in which humans internally represent their beliefs, and their ability and willingness to express their internal beliefs as numerical probabilities. Ferrell and McGoey (1980) posed models in which individuals may have some difficulty expressing beliefs as numerical probabilities, but nevertheless concluded that elicitation of numerical subjective probabilities is feasible. However, Zimmer (1983), who argued that humans process information using verbal rather than numerical modes of thinking, concluded that expectations should be elicited in verbal rather than numerical forms.

Wallsten et al. (1993) has reported that a majority of respondents prefer to communicate their own beliefs verbally and to receive the beliefs of others in the form of numerical probabilities. This asymmetry is intriguing but only marginally relevant to the design of expectations questions. The relevant question is not what communication mode respondents prefer to use, but rather what modes they are willing and able to use. Wallsten et al. (1993) report that virtually all of their respondents were willing to communicate their beliefs numerically, should the situation warrant it. Certainly the accumulating experience of economists using questionnaires to elicit probabilistic expectations has been that respondents are willing and able to communicate their beliefs in numerical probabilistic terms (e.g., Dominitz and Manski 1997a, 1997b, Hurd and McGarry 1995).

A related theme of cognitive research has been to learn how individuals associate numerical probabilities and verbal phrases such as 'very likely,' 'probable,' or 'rarely' (e.g., Wallsten et al. 1986). A central finding is that individuals vary considerably in the numerical probabilities that they associate with given verbal phrases. There is, however, controversy about the proper conclusion to be drawn. Should one conclude that individuals differ in their interpretation of verbal phrases, in their interpretation of numerical probabilities, or in their interpretation of both? The empirical findings are compatible with all of these conclusions.

6. Expectations Formation and Behavior

Empirical research on subjective expectations is still in its infancy. Basic questions about the conceptualization and measurement of expectations are not yet resolved. When sufficiently satisfactory answers to these questions are achieved, research will be able to move to yet more challenging and interesting matters.

Future research should seek to understand how persons form their expectations. Attitudinal researchers have given little systematic thought to this basic matter. Researchers who conceptualize expectations in probabilistic terms have not been able to agree on how persons update their subjective probabilities in light of new evidence. Economists and statistical decision analysts have commonly assumed that persons apply Bayes rule to update their expectations.

Psychologists have reported intriguing empirical evidence to the contrary (e.g., Kahneman et al. 1982), but the practical import of this evidence remains unsettled. Many social scientists hypothesize that persons form expectations by observation of the behavior and experiences of others in their environments. However, we know precious little about the nature of social learning processes.

Research on subjective expectations should aim to understand how a person's perception of the future affects behavior. Economists suppose that youth make schooling choices based on their expectations of the returns to schooling relative to labor market activity. They also hypothesize that uncertainty about future income induces individuals to increase savings, thereby decreasing consumption. Criminologists suggest that perceived risks of crime victimization may cause individuals to take precautions in their daily activities. Public health researchers speculate on how perceptions of health risks affect smoking, drug use, and unprotected sexual behavior. To shed light on these and similar questions of practical import will require much more intensive collection and analysis of expectations and behavioral data than the social and behavioral sciences have yet undertaken.

See also: Classical (Psychometric) Test Theory; Test Administration: Methodology

Bibliography

- Camerer C, Weber M 1992 Recent developments in modeling preferences: Uncertainty and ambiguity. Journal of Risk and Uncertainty 5: 325–70
- Curtin R 1982 Indicators of consumer behavior: The University of Michigan Surveys of Consumers. Public Opinion Quarterly 46: 340–52
- Davis J, Smith T 1994 The General Social Surveys, 1972–1994, Cumulative File. National Opinion Research Center, Chicago
- Dominitz J, Manski C 1997a Using expectations data to study subjective income expectations. Journal of the American Statistical Association 92: 855–67
- Dominitz J, Manski C 1997b Perceptions of economic insecurity: Evidence from the survey of economic expectations. Public Opinion Quarterly 61: 261–87
- Dominitz J, Manski C 1999 The several cultures of research on subjective expectations. In: Smith J, Willis R (eds.) Wealth, Work, and Health: Essays in Honor of F. Thomas Juster. University of Michigan Press, Ann Arbor, MI
- Federal Reserve Consultant Committee on Consumer Survey Statistics 1955 Smithies Committee report in Reports of the Federal Reserve Consultant Committees on Economic Statistics. Hearings of the Subcommittee on Economic Statistics of the Joint Committee on the Economic Report, 84th US Congress
- Ferrell W, McGoe P 1980 A model of calibration for subjective probabilities. Organizational Behavior and Human Performance 26: 32–53
- Fishbein M, Ajzen I 1975 Belief, Attitude, Intention, and Behavior: An Introduction to Theory and Research. Addison-Wesley, Reading, MA
- Hurd M, McGarry K 1995 Evaluation of the subjective probabilities of survival in the health and retirement study. Journal of Human Resources 30: S268–92
- Jamieson L, Bass F 1989 Adjusting stated intentions measures to predict trial purchase of new products: A comparison of models and methods. Journal of Marketing Research 26: 336–45
- Juster F T 1964 Anticipations and Purchases. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Juster F T 1966 Consumer buying intentions and purchase probability: An experiment in survey design. Journal of the American Statistical Association 61: 658–96
- Juster F T, Suzman R 1995 An overview of the health and retirement study. Journal of Human Resources 30: S7–56
- Kahneman D, Slovic P, Tversky A (eds.) 1982 Judgment Under Uncertainty: Heuristics and Biases. Cambridge University Press, New York
- Katona G 1957 Federal Reserve Board Committee Reports on Consumer Expectations and Savings Statistics. Review of Economics and Statistics 39: 40–6
- Lichtenstein S, Fischhoff B, Phillips L 1982 Calibration of probabilities: The state of the art to 1980. In: Kahneman D, Slovic P, Tversky A (eds.) Judgment Under Uncertainty: Heuristics and Biases. Cambridge University Press, New York
- Manski C 1990 The use of intentions data to predict behavior: A best case analysis. Journal of the American Statistical Association 85: 934–40
- McClelland A, Bolger F 1994 The calibration of subjective probabilities: Theories and models 1980–94. In: Wright G, Ayton P (eds.) Subjective Probability. Wiley, New York
- National Bureau of Economic Research 1960 The Quality and Economic Significance of Anticipations Data. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Quadrel M, Fischhoff B, Davis W 1993 Adolescent (in)vulnerability. American Psychologist 48: 102–16
- Savage L 1971 Elicitation of personal probabilities and expectations. Journal of the American Statistical Association 66: 783–801
- Schuman H, Johnson M 1976 Attitudes and behavior. Annual Review of Sociology 2: 161–207
- Turner C, Martin E (eds.) 1984 Surveying Subjective Phenomena. Russell Sage Foundation, New York
- Wallsten T, Budescu D, Rapoport A, Zwick R, Forsyth B 1986 Measuring the vague meanings of probability terms. Journal of Experimental Psychology: General 115: 348–65
- Wallsten T, Budescu D, Zwick R, Kemp S 1993 Preferences and reasons for communicating probabilistic information in verbal or numerical terms. Bulletin of the Psychonomic Society 31: 135–8
- Zimmer A 1983 Verbal vs. numerical processing of subjective probabilities. In: Scholz R (ed.) Decision Making Under Uncertainty. North-Holland, Amsterdam

C. F. Manski

Questionnaires: Cognitive Approaches

Respondents' answers to standardized questions presented in self-administered questionnaires or face-to-face and telephone interviews are a major source of social science data. These answers, however, are profoundly influenced by characteristics of the question asked, including the wording of the question, the format of the response alternatives, and the context in which it is presented. The cognitive and communicative processes underlying these influences are increasingly well understood and this article reviews their implications for question wording and questionnaire construction.

1. Respondents' Tasks

Answering a question requires that respondents (a) interpret the question to understand what is meant and (b) retrieve relevant information from memory to form an answer. In most cases, they cannot provide their answer in their own words but (c) need to map it onto a set of response alternatives provided by the researcher. Finally, (d) respondents may wish to edit their answer before they communicate it to the interviewer for reasons of social desirability and self-presentation. Respondents' performance at each of these steps is context dependent and profoundly influenced by characteristics of the questionnaire (Sudman et al. 1996, Chap. 3), including its administration mode (self-administered, or face-to-face, or telephone interview; Schwarz et al. 1991).

1.1 Question Comprehension

The key issue at the question comprehension stage is whether respondents' understanding of the question matches the meaning the researcher had in mind. Not surprisingly, methodology textbooks urge researchers to write simple questions and to avoid unfamiliar or ambiguous terms (see Sudman and Bradburn 1983, for good practical advice). However, understanding the literal meaning of a question is not sufficient to provide an informative answer. When asked, 'What have you done today?' respondents are likely to understand the words—yet, they still need to determine what kind of activities the researcher is interested in. Should they report, for example, that they took a shower, or not? Providing an informative answer requires inferences about the questioner's intention to determine the pragmatic meaning of the question.

To infer the pragmatic meaning, respondents draw on contextual information, including the content of adjacent questions and the nature of the response alternatives. Their use of this information is licensed by the tacit assumptions that govern the conduct of conversation in daily life, which respondents apply to the research interview (Clark and Schober 1992, Schwarz 1996). These pragmatic inferences have important implications for questionnaire construction.

1.1.1 Question context. Respondents interpret questions in the context of the overall interview and a term like 'drugs' acquires different meanings when presented in survey pertaining to respondents' medical history rather than to crime in the neighborhood. Moreover, they assume that adjacent questions are meaningfully related to one another, unless otherwise indicated. They may infer, for example, that an ambiguous 'educational contribution' refers either to fellowships that students receive, or tuition they have to pay, depending on the content of adjacent questions. Finally, they hesitate to reiterate information they have already provided, consistent with conversational norms that discourage redundancy. For example, questions pertaining either to happiness with one's life or to life-satisfaction typically elicit highly similar answers, unless both questions are presented together. In the latter case, respondents assume the researcher wouldn't ask for the same thing twice and differentiate between both questions, resulting in less similar answers. In self-administered questionnaires, question interpretation is influenced by preceding as well as following questions, whereas only preceding questions can exert an influence in face-to-face and telephone interviews (see Clark and Schober 1992, Sudman et al. 1996, Schwarz 1996 for extensive reviews).

1.1.2 Response alternatives. Most questions are presented with a fixed set of response alternatives, which facilitates administration and data analysis. Far from being 'neutral' measurement devices, however, response alternatives influence question interpretation (Schwarz and Hippler 1991). First, consider the differences between open and closed response formats. When asked in an open response format 'What have you done today?' respondents are likely to omit activities that the researcher is obviously aware of (e.g., 'I gave a survey interview') or may take for granted anyway (e.g., 'I took a shower'). Yet, if these activities were included in a closed list of response alternatives, most respondents would endorse them. At the same time, such a list would reduce reports of activities that are not represented on the list, even if an 'other' option were provided, which respondents rarely use. Both of these question form effects reflect that response alternatives can clarify the intended meaning of a question by specifying what the researcher is interested in. When using a closed response format, it is therefore important to ensure that the list of response alternatives covers the full range of behaviors or opinions.

Similarly, suppose respondents are asked how frequently they felt 'really irritated' recently. To infer if 'really irritated' refers to major or to minor annoyances, respondents may draw on an apparently formal feature of the question, namely the numeric values of the frequency scale. When the scale presents low (high) frequency alternatives, respondents infer that the researcher is interested in rare (frequent) events. Hence, they report on major annoyances (which are relatively rare) when given a low frequency scale, but on minor annoyances when given a high frequency scale. As a result, the same question elicits reports of substantively different experiences, depending on the frequency scale used (Schwarz 1996, Chap. 5, Schwarz and Hippler 1991).

In sum, apparently formal differences in the response alternatives can profoundly influence respondents' interpretation of the question. Far from reflecting superficial responding, such effects indicate that respondents do their best to make sense of the question asked by drawing on the full range of information available to them—including information the researcher never intended to provide. To safeguard against unintended question interpretations, researchers have developed a number of different pretesting procedures, reviewed in Sect. 3.

1.2 Recalling or Computing a Judgment

Once respondents determined what the researcher is interested in, they need to recall relevant information from memory. In some cases, respondents may have direct access to a previously formed relevant judgment that they can offer as an answer. In most cases, however, they will not find an appropriate answer readily stored in memory and will need to compute a judgment on the spot. The different judgmental processes pertaining to behavioral questions and opinion questions are discussed in Sect. 2 and Attitude Measurement, respectively.

1.3 Formatting the Response

Unless the question is asked in an open response format, respondents need to format their answer to fit the response alternatives provided by the researcher. Respondents observe these question constraints and avoid answers that are not explicitly offered, as already seen in Sect. 1.1.2. For example, many more respondents answer 'don't know,' or choose a middle alternative, when these options are explicitly offered than when they are not (see Schwarz and Hippler 1991, for a review). Under which conditions the addition or omission of these response options results in different substantive conclusions, and whether some respondents are more likely to be affected by the response alternatives than others, is the topic of some debate (see Krosnick and Fabrigar in press).

Response formatting processes are particularly relevant when rating scales are used (Sudman et al. 1996, Chap. 4). Specifically, respondents use the most extreme stimuli to anchor the endpoints of the scale. Hence, a given stimulus will be rated as less extreme if presented in the context of a more extreme one, than if presented in the context of a less extreme one. In addition, if the number of stimuli to be rated is large, respondents attempt to use all categories of the rating scale about equally often. Hence, two similar stimuli may receive different ratings when only a few stimuli are presented, but may receive the same rating when a large number of stimuli has to be located along the scale. Accordingly, ratings of the same object cannot be directly compared when they were collected in different contexts, rendering comparisons over time or between studies difficult. The psychometric properties of rating scales have been the topic of extensive investigation (see Krosnick and Fabrigar in press). Seven point scales seem to be best in terms of reliability, percentage of undecided respondents, and respondents' ability to discriminate between scale points. Moreover, scales that provide verbal labels for each scale value seem more reliable than scales with verbal endpoints only.

Finally, respondents' choice of a given response alternative is often influenced by the order in which the alternatives are presented. Under the auditory presentation conditions of telephone interviews, a given alternative is more likely to be endorsed when it is presented last rather than first (referred to as a recency effect). Under the visual presentation conditions of a self-administered questionnaire, a given alternative is more likely to be endorsed when it is presented first rather than last (referred to as a primacy effect; see Sudman et al. 1996, Chap. 6, for a discussion of the underlying processes).

1.4 Editing the Response

Finally, respondents may want to edit their response before they communicate it, reflecting considerations of social desirability and self-presentation (see DeMaio 1984 for a review). Not surprisingly, the impact of self-presentation concerns is more pronounced in face-to-face interviews than in self-administered questionnaires. It is important to emphasize, however, that influences of social desirability are limited to potentially threatening questions and are typically modest in size. These influences can be reduced through techniques that ensure the confidentiality of the answer (see Sudman and Bradburn 1983 for detailed advice).

2. Asking Questions about Behavior

Most questions about respondents' behavior are frequency questions, pertaining, for example, to how often the respondent has bought something or has missed a day at work during some specified period of time. Researchers would ideally like respondents to identify the behavior of interest; to scan the reference period; to retrieve all instances that match the target behavior; and to count these instances to determine the overall frequency of the behavior. This, however, is the route that respondents are least likely to take.

Except for rare and very important behaviors, respondents are unlikely to have detailed representations of numerous individual instances of a behavior stored in memory. Instead, the details of various instances of closely related behaviors blend into one global representation, rendering it difficult to distinguish and retrieve individual episodes. Accordingly, a 'recall-and-count' model does not capture how respondents answer questions about frequent behaviors or experiences. Rather, their answers are likely to be based on some fragmented recall and the application of inference rules to compute a frequency estimate. Accordingly, the best we can hope for under most conditions is a reasonable estimate, unless the behavior is rare and of considerable importance to respondents.

Conway (1990) provides a useful introduction to psychological research into autobiographical memory (i.e., individuals' memory for their experiences and behaviors) and Bradburn et al. (1987), Sudman et al. (1996, Chaps. 7–9), Tourangeau et al. (2000), and the contributions in Schwarz and Sudman (1994) review the implications for questionnaire construction. Section 2.1 summarizes what researchers can do to facilitate recall and Sect. 2.2 addresses respondents' estimation strategies.

2.1 Facilitating Recall

2.1.1 Recall cues and reference periods. If researchers are interested in obtaining reports that are based on recalled episodes, they may simplify respondents' task by providing appropriate recall cues and by restricting the recall task to a short and recent reference period. There are, however, important drawbacks to both of these strategies. Although the quality of recall will generally improve as the retrieval cues become more specific, respondents are likely to restrict their memory search to the particular cues presented to them, reflecting that the cues constrain the meaning of the question. As a result, respondents will omit instances that do not match the specific cues, resulting in under-reports if the list is not exhaustive. Moreover, using a short reference period may result in many 'zero' answers from respondents who rarely engage in the behavior, thus limiting later analyses to respondents with a high behavioral frequency. Finally, reference periods of different length may result in different question interpretations. Long reference periods ('How often have you been angry last year?') suggest that the researcher is interested in relatively rare events, whereas short reference periods ('How often have you been angry last week?') indicate an interest in frequent events. Hence, respondents may report on substantively different behaviors, e.g., rare and intense vs. frequent but minor episodes of anger.

Not surprisingly, different recall cues are differentially effective. The date of an event is the poorest cue, whereas cues pertaining to what happened, where it happened, and who was involved have been found to be very effective. In addition, recall will improve when respondents are given sufficient time to search memory. Recalling specific events may take up to several seconds and repeated attempts to recall may result in the retrieval of additional material, even after a considerable number of previous trials. Unfortunately, respondents are unlikely to have sufficient time to engage in repeated retrieval attempts in most research situations, and may often not be motivated to do so even if they had the time. This is particularly crucial in the context of survey research, where the available time per question is usually less than one minute.

Moreover, the direction in which respondents search memory may influence the quality of recall. Specifically, better recall is achieved when respondents begin with the most recent occurrence of a behavior and work backward in time than when they begin at the beginning of the reference period. This presumably occurs because memory for recent occurrences is richer and the recalled instances may serve as cues for recalling previous ones. Given free choice, however, respondents tend to prefer the less efficient strategy of forward recall.

Yet, even under optimal conditions, respondents will frequently be unable to recall an event or some of its critical details, even if they believed they would 'certainly' remember it at the time it occurred. In general, the available evidence suggests that respondents are likely to under-report behaviors and events, which has led many researchers to assume that higher reports of mundane behaviors are likely to be more valid. Accordingly, a 'the-more-the-better' rule frequently is substituted for external validity checks.

2.1.2 Dating recalled instances. After recalling or reconstructing a specific instance of the behavior under study, respondents have to determine if this instance occurred during the reference period. This requires that they understand the extension of the reference period and that they can accurately date the instance with regard to that period. Reference periods that are defined in terms of several weeks or months are highly susceptible to misinterpretations. For example, the term 'during the last 12 months' can be construed as a reference to the last calendar year, as including or excluding the current month, and so on. Similarly, anchoring the reference period with a specific date ('Since March 1, how often ...?') is not very helpful because respondents will usually not be able to relate an abstract date to meaningful memories.

The most efficient way to anchor a reference period is the use of salient personal or public events, often referred to as landmarks. In addition to improving respondents' understanding of the reference period, the use of landmarks facilitates the dating of recalled instances. Given that the calendar date of an event will usually not be among its encoded features, respondents were found to relate recalled events to other, more outstanding events in order to reconstruct the exact time and day. Accordingly, using public events, important personal memories or outstanding dates (such as New Year's Eve) as landmarks was found to reduce dating biases (see Sudman et al. 1996, Tourangeau et al. 2000 for reviews).

Without a chance to relate a recalled event to a well-dated landmark, time dating is likely to reflect both forward and backward telescoping, that is, distant events are assumed to have happened more recently than they did, whereas recent events are assumed to be more distant than they are (Sudman et al. 1996, Chap. 8).

2.2 Estimation Strategies

In most cases, respondents need to rely on estimation strategies to arrive at an answer (Sudman et al. 1996, Chap. 9). Which strategy they use is often a function of the research instrument and hence to some extent under researchers' control.

2.2.1 Decomposition strategies. Many recall problems become easier when the recall task is decomposed into several subtasks. To estimate how often she has been eating out during the last three months, for example, a respondent may determine that she eats out about every weekend and had dinner at a restaurant this Wednesday, but apparently not the week before. Based on such partial recall she may arrive at an estimate of '18 times during the last 3 months.' Such estimates are likely to be accurate if the respondent's inference rule is adequate, and if exceptions to the usual behavior are rare.

In the absence of these fortunate conditions, however, decomposition strategies are likely to result in overestimates because people usually overestimate the occurrence of low frequency events and underestimate the occurrence of high frequency events. Hence, asking for estimates of a global, and hence frequent, category (e.g., 'eating out') is likely to elicit an underestimate, whereas asking for estimates of a narrow, and hence rare, category (e.g., 'eating at a Mexican restaurant') is likely to elicit an overestimate. The observation that decomposition usually results in higher estimates does therefore not necessarily reflect better recall.

2.2.2 Subjective theories. A particularly important inference strategy is based on subjective theories of stability and change (Ross 1989). In answering retrospective questions, respondents often use their current behavior or opinion as a bench-mark and invoke an implicit theory of self to assess whether their past behavior or opinion was similar to, or different from, their present behavior or opinion. The resulting estimates are correct to the extent that the subjective theory is correct. This, however, is often not the case.

In many domains, individuals assume a rather high degree of stability, resulting in retrospective reports that are too close to the current state of affairs, thus underestimating the degree of change that has occurred over time. For example, retrospective estimates of income or of tobacco, marijuana, and alcohol consumption were found to be heavily influenced by respondents' income or consumption habits at the time of interview. On the other hand, when respondents have reason to believe in change, they will detect change, even though none has occurred. Assuming, for example, that therapy is helpful, respondents may infer that their problem behavior prior to therapy was more frequent than was actually the case. Relying on such theory-driven retrospective reports, researchers may infer therapeutic success where none has occurred (see Ross 1989 for examples).

2.2.3 Response alternatives. In many studies, respondents are asked to report their behavioral frequencies by checking the appropriate alternative on a frequency scale of the type shown in Table 1. Assuming that the researcher constructed a meaningful scale, respondents commonly believe that the values in the middle range of the scale reflect the 'average' or 'usual' behavioral frequency, whereas the extremes of the scale correspond to the extremes of the distribution. Given this assumption, respondents can use the range of the response alternatives as a frame of reference in estimating their own behavioral frequency. This strategy results in higher estimates along scales that present high rather than low frequency response alternatives, as shown in Table 1. As may be expected, the impact of frequency scale is most pronounced for frequent and mundane behaviors, which are poorly represented in memory (see Schwarz 1996 for a review).

In addition to influencing respondents' behavioral reports, response alternatives may also affect subsequent comparative judgments. For example, a frequency of '2½ h a day' constitutes a high response on the low frequency scale, but a low response on the high frequency scale shown in Table 1. Checking this alternative, a respondent may infer that their own TV consumption is above average in the former case, but below average in the latter. Hence, respondents in this study reported lower satisfaction with the variety of things they do in their leisure time when the low frequency scale suggested that they watch more TV than most other people.

Table 1
Reported daily TV consumption as a function of response alternatives

	Low frequency alternatives		High frequency alternatives
Up to $\frac{1}{2}$ h	7.4 percent	Up to $2\frac{1}{2}$ h	62.5 percent
$\frac{1}{2}$ h to 1h	17.7 percent	$2\frac{1}{2}$ h to 3h	23.4 percent
1h to $1\frac{1}{2}$ h	26.5 percent	3h to $3\frac{1}{2}$ h	7.8 percent
$1\frac{1}{2}$ h to 2h	14.7 percent	$3\frac{1}{2}$ h to 4h	4.7 percent
2h to $2\frac{1}{2}$ h	17.7 percent	4h to $4\frac{1}{2}$ h	1.6 percent
More than $2\frac{1}{2}$ h	16.2 percent	More than $4\frac{1}{2}$ h	0.0 percent

Note $N = 132$. Adapted from Schwarz et al. (1985). Response scales: Effects of category range on reported behavior and comparative judgments: Reprinted by permission from Public Opinion Quarterly 49: 388–95

To avoid these systematic influences of response alternatives, it is advisable to ask frequency questions in an open response format, such as, 'How many hours a day do you watch TV? ... hours per day.' Note that such an open format needs to specify the relevant units of measurement, for example, 'hours per day' to avoid answers like 'a few.'

As another alternative, researchers are often tempted to use vague quantifiers, such as 'sometimes,' 'frequently,' and so on. This, however, is the worst possible choice (see Pepper 1981 for a review). Most importantly, the same expression denotes different frequencies in different content domains, for example, 'frequently' suffering from headaches reflects higher absolute frequencies than 'frequently' suffering from heart attacks. Moreover, different respondents use the same term to denote different objective frequencies of the same behavior. For example, suffering from headaches 'occasionally' denotes a higher frequency for respondents with a medical history of migraine than for respondents without that migraine history. Accordingly, the use of vague quantifiers reflects the objective frequency relative to respondents' subjective standard, rendering vague quantifiers inadequate for the assessment of objective frequencies, despite the popularity of their use.

3. Pretesting

Given the complexity of the question answering process, extensive pretesting is of paramount importance. Traditionally, questions were often assumed to 'work' if respondents could provide an answer. Recent psychological research, however, facilitated the development of more sensitive pretest procedures (Sudman et al. 1996, Chap. 2, Schwarz and Sudman 1996). These procedures include the extensive use of probes and think-aloud protocols (summarily referred to as cognitive interviewing), detailed codings of interview transcripts, and the use of expert systems that alert researchers to likely problems. Drawing on these procedures, researchers can increase the odds that respondents understand the question as intended and use cognitive strategies that are likely to produce a meaningful answer.

See also: Content Validity; Questionnaires: Assessing Subjective Expectations; Sample Surveys, History of; Sample Surveys: Methods; Social Survey, History of

Bibliography

- Bradburn N M, Rips L J, Shevell S K 1987 Answering autobiographical questions: The impact of memory and inference on surveys. Science 236: 157–61
- Clark H H, Schober M F 1992 Asking questions and influencing answers. In: Tanur J M (ed.) Questions about Questions. Sage, New York, pp. 15–48
- Conway M A 1990 Autobiographical Memory: An Introduction. Open University Press, Milton Keynes, UK
- DeMaio T J 1984 Social desirability and survey measurement: A review. In: Turner C F, Martin E (eds.) Surveying Subjective Phenomena, Vol. 2. Russell Sage Foundation, New York, pp. 257–281
- Krosnick J A, Fabrigar L in press Handbook of Attitude Questionnaires. Oxford University Press, Oxford, UK
- Pepper S C 1981 Problems in the quantification of frequency expressions. In: Fiske D W (ed.) Problems with Language Imprecision (New Directions for Methodology of Social and Behavioral Science), Vol. 9. Jossey-Bass, San Francisco
- Ross M 1989 The relation of implicit theories to the construction of personal histories. Psychological Review 96: 341–57
- Schuman H, Presser S 1981 Questions and Answers in Attitude Surveys. Academic Press, New York
- Schwarz N 1996 Cognition and Communication: Judgmental Biases, Research Methods, and the Logic of Conversation. Erlbaum Associates, Mahwah, NJ
- Schwarz N, Hippler H J 1991 Response alternatives: The impact of their choice and ordering. In: Biemer P, Groves R, Mathiowetz N, Sudman S (eds.) Measurement Error in Surveys. Wiley, Chichester, UK, pp. 41–56
- Schwarz N, Strack F, Hippler H J, Bishop G 1991 The impact of administration mode on response effects in survey measurement. Applied Cognitive Psychology 5: 193–212
- Schwarz N, Sudman S (eds.) 1994 Autobiographical Memory and the Validity of Retrospective Reports. Springer Verlag, New York
- Schwarz N, Sudman S (eds.) 1996 Answering Questions: Methodology for Determining Cognitive and Communicative Processes in Survey Research. Jossey-Bass, San Francisco

- Sudman S, Bradburn N M 1983 Asking Questions. Jossey-Bass, San Francisco
- Sudman S, Bradburn N M, Schwarz N 1996 Thinking about Answers: The Application of Cognitive Processes to Survey Methodology. Jossey-Bass, San Francisco
- Tanur J M (ed.) 1992 Questions about Questions. Sage, New York
- Tourangeau R, Rips L J, Rasinski K 2000 The Psychology of Survey Responses. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK

N. Schwarz

Quetelet, Adolphe (1796–1874)

1. Life and Career

Born in Ghent (Belgium) to a French father and Flemish mother, the young Quetelet started his career as a teacher, and besides his interest in mathematics, he also had artistic talents.

Quetelet was the first student to obtain a doctorate in 1819 at the newly founded State University of Ghent. In his dissertation he presented a new geometric function called the focal curve. In 1819 he was appointed mathematics professor at the Atheneum in Brussels and in 1820 he was elected to the Académie royale des sciences et des belles-lettres. The academy became the central place from which Quetelet directed all his other activities. In 1823 his scientific orientation took a decisive turn: he proposed the foundation of a new observatory to the Dutch government, and in the same year he was sent to Paris for further preparation of this plan. At the Paris observatory, contacts were established with Laplace, Poisson, and Fourier, and Quetelet's interests in probability theory and astronomy stem from this short period in France. The construction of the Brussels observatory was completed only in 1832, but in the meantime Quetelet had also become involved in the planning of the 1830 population census.

Unfortunately this census was never completed as a result of the Belgium's secession from The Netherlands in 1830. But, elected as secretary for life at the Academy in 1834, Quetelet remained in control not only of the activities in meteorology, astronomy, and physical geography located at the observatory, but also of the activities in demography and statistics at the Bureau de Statistique and, from 1841 on, at the Commission centrale de Statistique. The procedures to be used in the new census were tried out first in Brussels in 1842, and the nationwide census took place in October 1846. Both the method of census taking and the subsequent analyses with detailed breakdowns by age and marital status set new standards for similar undertakings in most other European countries. In the meantime Quetelet had gained an international reputation, first by the publication of his Physique Sociale in 1835, in which he brought together his earlier statistical work on demographic subjects, anthropometry, and criminology, and then by his relentless efforts to establish statistics as a new internationally oriented and empirically grounded scientific discipline. The latter was accomplished mainly through organizing a steady succession of international statistics conferences and by inspiring the foundation of statistical societies in other countries.

In 1855, however, Quetelet suffered a major stroke, and from then on his own scientific contribution was seriously reduced. But, until his death in 1874, he continued to inspire statistical applications in a wide variety of fields, and above all, to promote international comparability of statistical information. In Desrosières' words (1993, p. 95), 'Quetelet was the orchestra conductor of 19th Century statistics.'

2. Quetelet's Contribution to Statistics and Demography

Quetelet's statistical work was profoundly influenced by early probability theory—particularly the binomial distribution of events with equal odds—and by the use that Laplace had made of the Gaussian bell curve in astronomy. From Laplace he had gained the insight that the binomial distribution could also represent measurement error in astronomical observations, and Quetelet was convinced that this would also hold for measurements in the physical, social, and 'moral' domains. In the 1820s, measurements and frequency distributions pertaining to these domains and based on large numbers were still very rare. Quetelet had to use the frequency distribution of the chest circumferences of over 5,000 Scottish recruits to verify his hypothesis that these would conform to the binomial distribution (Hacking 1990, pp. 108–11). In a series of heights of French recruits, however, he detected a deviation from the expected distribution and therefore suspected the presence of systematic errors associated with attempts to avoid conscription. This illustrates how Quetelet used theoretical distributions to assess measurement reliability.

His use of the bell curve led him also into far deeper water: he proposed the notion of l'homme moyen or the average man, of which all members of a given population would be imperfect copies. For Quetelet, and for many after him, the emergence of a bell curve is a strong indication that there must be a link between the individuals producing this particular frequency distribution. Individuals would be drawn as balls from the same urn, and populations would correspond to different urns. The average men, each reconstructed from a different population, would therefore facilitate comparisons between populations, which themselves would be sufficiently homogeneous. Quetelet's 'average man' has often been misunderstood and misused. First, Quetelet was never preoccupied exclusively by averages. Whenever possible he presented complete distributions, and one of his contributions to demography is precisely his systematic presentation of age-specific distributions of vital events or of other occurrences (e.g., crime). This is the beginning of the statistical study of the life cycle. Second, Quetelet would be quite shocked to see his average man being associated with national prejudice, e.g., the stingy Scot, the thrifty Frenchman, ..., for the simple reason that these would all be unmeasured attributes. In fact, he perceived his average man as an antidote against statements based on prejudice, anecdote, and impression. It is for this reason that Quetelet can be considered as one of the founding fathers of modern empirical sociology: adequate statistical measurement presupposes operationalization with satisfactory reliability and validity.

The most fundamental critique of the average man came from A. Lexis who discovered that the variances of observed distributions are generally too large to uphold the thesis of balls drawn from the same urn. The hypothesis of a homogeneous population ceased to be tenable, and this would have major consequences for the advancement of statistics and for theories in the biological and social sciences (cf. Desrosières 1993, 111ff). In present day multivariate analyses we now routinely calculate 'little average men' in terms of subgroup means, odds ratios for different subpopulations at risk, and for different combinations of categories of co-variables. Furthermore, these numerous 'little average men' are compared and the results are tested for the presence or absence of significant differences.

The use of the bell curve was taken one step further by Quetelet's younger colleague and professor of mathematics at his alma mater in Ghent. Pierre-François Verhulst (1804–49) imagined that the growth rate r of a population would evolve according to a normal distribution. The size of a population, or of any other stock, would then follow a logistic curve, i.e. the elongated S-curve, with 50 percent of the total growth corresponding to the maximum of r , and then leveling off toward a saturation plateau. The logistic curve proved to have many applications: later demographic transitions produced population evolutions that very closely resemble the logistic curve, and diffusion processes modeled along the principle of contagion (of rumors, knowledge, disease, technology, etc.) or of competition commonly led to growth curves in accordance with Verhulst's logistic.

It is rather ironic that Verhulst's view of this particular form of population change did not feed back into Quetelet's own demographic work. Quetelet continued to think within the framework of a stationary population. Like several observers before him (e.g., Vauban, Süssmilch), Quetelet had been impressed by the observation that both numbers and distributions of vital events (deaths, births, marriages, ages at marriage, and age differences between spouses) showed a remarkable stability over time. His early work with Smits on the demography of the low countries had convinced him even more. Only major disturbances, such as a revolution, were capable of producing a temporary distortion (cf. his causes constantes et causes accidentelles in the Physique sociale). Quetelet kept thinking in terms of a homeostatic model, in the same way as Malthus had before him.

In his construction of the Belgian life table of 1841–50, centered around the census of 1846 and in his 'population tables' (population by age, sex, and marital status simultaneously) of 1850, Quetelet explicitly discusses the properties of a stationary population and shows that the actual age composition ought to be the same as the l_x or ${}_nL_x$ functions of the life table (l_x = number of survivors at each exact age x ; ${}_nL_x$ = number of person-years lived in the age interval x to $x+n$). Furthermore, Quetelet goes on to show that the hypothesis of constant mortality could be relaxed (1835 p. 310, 1850 p. 16): 'the necessary condition for deducing a population table (i.e., an age structure) from a life table is that the deaths by age annually preserve the same ratios [in French: rapports] between them' (present author's translation and clarifications).

Quetelet was clearly on the way to show that there exists a neutral mortality decline which does not affect the shape of the age distribution (for the proof see A. J. Coale 1972 pp. 33–6). What Quetelet never developed—probably because there was not yet a need for it in pre-transition Belgium—was the model of a stable population with a growth rate different from zero. Yet, his demographic work shows that he can be considered as an early founding father of the branch of contemporary demography called 'indirect estimation.' In this branch extensive use is made of population models (stationary, stable, quasistable), of model life tables, and of the mathematical properties of particular model distributions for detecting and correcting errors in recorded data, and especially for estimating basic demographic parameters of mortality, fertility, and nuptiality on the basis of fragmentary information. Modern historical demography and the demography of developing countries progressed rapidly thanks to these techniques and ways of thinking.

3. Quetelet's Contribution to Sociology

In contrast to Auguste Comte, Quetelet never developed a general plan for a new social science, and by 1900 many of his ideas had already become outdated (cf. J. Lottin 1912, pp. 391–515). He is, however, highly typical of the beginnings of sociology: there is this new entity, called 'society,' that can be studied and analyzed from the outside with objective methods. This entity follows its own ‘laws’ (i.e., patterning, regularities) and these can be detected via statistical methods. At first, Quetelet’s sociology had a deterministic ring, and his distinction between causes constantes and causes accidentelles led straight into the debate pitting collective determinism against individual freedom of action. Quetelet is clearly more impressed by the causes constantes, but in various places in his work he also proposed a solution to the conundrum. In an early letter to Villermé of 1832, for instance, Quetelet writes the following: ‘As a member of society [in French: corps social], the individual experiences at each moment the social requirements [la nécessité des causes] and pays them regular tribute; but as an individual he masters these influences [causes] to some extent, modifies their effect and can seek to reach a superior state’ (quoted in Desrosières 1993, pp. 103–4; present author’s translation). In other words, through socialization the actor becomes an integral part of society, but individual and institutional agency (for Quetelet: the advancement of the sciences) play decisive roles in social change.

For many of his contemporaries the deterministic ring of the Physique Sociale of 1835 continued to be a source of steady criticism, particularly when Quetelet went on with his assertion that the causes accidentelles merely compensate each other. Later on, however, Emile Durkheim viewed the social influence on individuals and the feedback stemming from individual and collective action in very much the same way as Quetelet. Durkheim’s equally holistic view of society, as in his Formes élémentaires de la vie religieuse, was directly influenced by Quetelet’s work.

In actual practice, however, Quetelet remains essentially a master of ‘comparative statics’ rather than of ‘social dynamics.’ He paid little attention to the effects of early industrialization (definitely a cause constante) or to the impact of the economic, social, and health crises of the 1840s. This is very surprising for a chief statistician and demographer. The social reform movements, the rise in real wages, and the decline in adult mortality in Belgium since the 1860s also remain without comment. His successors in sociology were much more alert to analyzing the dynamics of the major societal transformations they were witnessing.

4. Contributions to Psychology

Quetelet’s 1835 work on the development of human faculties has also had a major impact on the field of developmental psychology (Baltes 1983, Lindenberger and Baltes 1999). His work is the first effort to consider, based on empirical evidence, the nature of intellectual development from childhood into old age.

Treating human-ontogenetic development as a life-long process is a fairly recent advent in psychology.

Researchers in this field have been drawn to Quetelet’s early efforts in this regard. They have also emphasized that Quetelet in his discussion of methodological issues was able to prefigure some of the issues that are of high significance for modern researchers. Among these are the role of period effects and selective survival.

See also: Censuses: Demographic Issues; Censuses: History and Methods; Demography, History of; Distributions, Statistical: Approximations; Distributions, Statistical: Special and Continuous; Distributions, Statistical: Special and Discrete; Elicitation of Probabilities and Probability Distributions; Individual/Society: History of the Concept; Life Table; Measurement Theory: History and Philosophy; Measurement Theory: Probabilistic; Population Size Estimation and Capture–Recapture Methods; Simultaneous Equation Estimates (Exact and Approximate), Distribution of; Statistical Methods, History of: Pre-1900; Statistical Systems: Censuses of Population; Statistics, History of

Bibliography

- Académie Royale de Belgique 1997 Actualité et universalité de la pensée scientifique d’Adolphe Quetelet. Classe des sciences, actes du colloque 24–25.10.96, Brussels, Belgium
- Baltes P B 1983 Life-span developmental psychology: Observations on history and theory revisited. In: Lerner R M (ed.) Developmental Psychology: Historical and Philosophical Perspectives. Erlbaum, Hillsdale, NJ, pp. 79–111
- Coale A J 1972 The Growth and Structure of Human Populations—A Mathematical Investigation. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Desrosières A 1993 La politique des grands nombres—Histoire de la raison statistique. Editions la Découverte, Paris
- Hacking I 1990 The Taming of Chance. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Lindenberger U, Baltes P B 1999 Die Entwicklungspsychologie der Lebensspanne (Lifespan-Psychologie): Johann Nicolaus Tetens (1736–1807) zu Ehren. Zeitschrift für Psychologie 207: 299–323
- Lottin J 1912 Quetelet, statisticien et sociologue. Institut Supérieur de Philosophie, Louvain, France
- Mailly E 1875 Essai sur la vie et les ouvrages de L-A-J. Quetelet. Annuaire de l’Académie Royale de Belgique 41: 5–191
- Porter T M 1986 The Rise of Statistical Thinking. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Quetelet A 1832 Sur la possibilité de mesurer l’influence des causes qui modifient les éléments sociaux—Lettre à M. De Villermé. Correspondance Mathématique et Publique 7: 321–46
- Quetelet A 1833 Recherches sur le penchant au crimes aux différents âges. M. Hayez, Brussels, Belgium
- Quetelet A 1835 Sur l’homme et le développement de ses facultés, ou essai de physique sociale. Editions Bachelier, Paris [2nd edn. 1869 eds C. Muquart, Brussels]
- Quetelet A 1847 De l’influence du libre arbitre de l’homme sur les faits sociaux, et particulièrement sur le nombre des mariages. Bulletin de la Commission Centrale de Statistique Brussels 2: 135–55

- Quetelet A 1846 Lettres à S.A.R. le Duc Regnant de Saxe Cobourg et Gotha, sur la théorie des probabilités, appliquée aux sciences morales et politiques. M. Hayez, Académie Royale, Brussels, Belgium
- Quetelet A 1848 Du système social et des lois qui le régissent. Guillaumin et Cie, Paris
- Quetelet A 1849 Nouvelles tables de mortalité pour la Belgique. Bulletin de la Commission Centrale de Statistique, Brussels 4: 1–22
- Quetelet A 1850 Nouvelles tables de population pour la Belgique. Bulletin de la Commission Centrale de Statistique, Brussels 4: 1–24
- Stigler S M 1986 The History of Statistics—The Measurement of Uncertainty Before 1900. Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA

R. Lesthaeghe

Queues

The intuitive notion that everybody has of the so familiar ‘queues’ or waiting lines closely parallels its mathematical meaning. Queueing systems are simplified mathematical models to explain congestion. This is a field of impressive activity and growth, which has mainly been concerned with the building of the models and the study of its probability properties. Relatively little effort has been put into their statistical analysis. In this article, the main concepts underlying simple queueing systems are discussed; some Bayesian inferential tools are also given.

1. Queueing Systems

Broadly speaking, a queueing system occurs any time ‘customers’ demand ‘service’ from some facility; usually both the arrival of the customers and the service times are assumed to be random. If all of the ‘servers’ are busy when new customers arrive, these will generally wait in line for the next available server. In some examples, the terms ‘customer,’ ‘service’ and ‘server’ have the usual, everyday meaning. For instance, queueing systems occur when customers check out in a grocery store, or require the service of a teller in a bank; here, the queueing term ‘customer’ refers to the actual customers at the store or the bank, the required service is to be checked out or to resolve the bank inquiry they have, and if the server (the check-out person or the teller) is busy when a customer require his/her service, then the customer has to wait in line, that is, queue up for service. In general, the terms ‘customers,’ ‘service,’ and ‘servers’ are very broad and can refer to almost anything; for instance, telephone calls (‘customers’) arriving at a switchboard (the service time being the time each call needs to be completed), machine failures (the ‘customer’ is the machine, and the server the repair person), demands of CPU time (server is the CPU, and the service the completion of the task), etc. Sometimes, a ‘waiting line’ (real or conceptual) never occurs. For instance, buses following their route can be considered a queueing system in which the customers are the buses, and the service is the completion of the route; here, customers are immediately ‘served’ and no waiting is necessary (technically, infinite servers, or as many servers as the number of buses, are assumed). In many interesting applications, customers require more than one service from different servers, and upon completion of service in one node, they have to proceed to another node. If the new server is busy, the customer has to queue up again for service. This is a typical situation modeled by the so called networks of queues, which are not treated in this article. An example occurs when patients enter an emergency department in a hospital: they might have to ‘queue up’ for primary attention, x-rays, lab service, surgery, and so on.

Queues (and queueing networks) have become very useful tools for evaluating (at least approximately) the performance of complex interacting stochastic systems in which congestion occurs. Obvious applications occur in airport terminals, health-care centers, and check-out lines at different counters. They have also been traditionally applied to biology (migration, population models), electrical engineering (flow models) and chemistry (polymerization, clustering) among others. The most prevalent applications of queueing systems and networks occur in the fields of manufacturing, computer networking, and telecommunications and broadcasting. But there are also many applications in the social sciences:

(a) Several types of airport queues: aircrafts waiting to take off or to land, queues of passengers at terminals (they have to go through ticket counters, check-in counters, security and passport controls, baggage carousels, customs, etc.).

(b) Police, fire, and emergency medical systems can all be regarded as queueing systems. Here the main concern is with responding to the calls for assistance as quickly as possible, important questions being to decide the number of units and which unit or units to dispatch to a specific call.

(c) Health-care systems provide many examples of analyses well suited for queueing systems, as modeling the movement of coronary patients in a hospital, determining the staffing of a department, modeling waiting queues for transplants, etc.

(d) In justice scenarios, cases queue up for trial (and the length of the trial depends on the actions of both the ‘customer’ (that is, the lawyers), and the judge.

(e) Analyzing and evaluating the delays in the mail, studying queues at voting polls to optimize the number (and type) of voting machines, and so on.

(f) Latent phase of diseases (such as Aids) in which the times of infection are arrivals to the queueing system, the incubation is the ‘service,’ and the onset (or diagnosis) of the disease is the departure from the queueing system. Questions of interest are the number of people in the system and the time that ‘customers’ stay in the system (that is, from infection to onset or diagnosis).

Since the economical and social impact of congestion can be considerable, the importance of analyzing queueing systems has been clear ever since Erlang’s pioneering work on telecommunications at the beginning of the twentieth century. For mathematicians, queues offer an added bonus, namely that the mathematics involved can be complex and intriguing; they also have an enormous potential for varying the conditions and the assumptions of the system. It does not come as a surprise that queues developed quickly into the huge area of study that it is today. Thousands of papers, and many journals, meetings, and books are entirely devoted to the subject. It is impossible to list here even the key references, and only a small selection will be given, from which other references can be obtained. Among the numerous books, it is worth mentioning the general books of Cox and Smith (1961), Takács (1962), Cooper (1981), Gross and Harris (1985), Medhi (1991), and Nelson (1995); Kleinrock (1975, 1976) and Newell (1982) are good sources of applications; Cooper (1990) is a nice survey with an extensive bibliography. Very useful reviews of many different aspects of queueing theory (including history, statistical analysis, simulation methods, applications, etc.) can be found in Dshalalow (1995, 1997).

Simple queueing systems are defined by specifying the following:

(a) The arrival pattern, which among other things can be deterministic or stochastic, individual or in batches (like travelers arriving at an airport passport control), etc. Also customers can abandon the line before being served, or can interact in some other ways with the rest of the customers.

(b) The service mechanism, which describes the number of servers, how many customers at the time the server can handle (usually one, but bulk servers such as buses, elevators, etc. can serve more than one), and the distribution of service times (which can be independent among servers, time-dependent, dependent on queue length, etc.).

(c) Queue discipline, usually FIFO (first-in-first-out), but others are possible, such as last-in-first-out (LIFO) (as the subroutines in a computer program), priority customers (as express check-out lines, giving priority to shorter service times), customers switching lines, etc. Besides these, other aspects can also be relevant, such as the capacity of the waiting room, or the size of the population of customers.

In the early 1950s, Kendall introduced a useful shorthand notation for simple queueing systems. It consists on a series of symbols separated by slashes, as $A/B/c$. ‘A’ refers to the distribution of the inter-arrival times between customers; thus Er stands for Erlang, G for General, M for Exponential (Markovian), etc. ‘B’ characterizes the service distribution for each server, with the same symbols as before, and ‘c’ refers to the number of servers, who are usually assumed to be equally efficient. More symbols are added when needed, to impose restrictions on the system capacity, and/or on the size of the population that feeds the system, and/or to specify the queue discipline if other than FIFO. One of the simplest and most studied queues is the $M/M/c$ queue, especially the $M/M/1$ and $M/M/\infty$; the latter are particularly useful for modeling self-service facilities or as approximations to systems with a very large number of servers (such as emergency services).

2. Equilibrium: Measures of Performance

From the probabilistic point of view, properties of queues are usually derived from the properties of stochastic processes associated with them. Let $N(t)$ denote the number of customers in the system at time $t \geq 0$. The state probabilities are defined as $P_j(t|\theta) = \Pr(N(t) = j|\theta)$, for $j = 0, 1, 2, \dots$, where θ denotes all parameters governing the arrival and service processes. The derivation of $P_j(t|\theta)$ is crucial in the probabilistic analysis of queueing systems. For many simple systems, the stochastic process $\{N(t), t \geq 0\}$ is a birth–death process (a ‘birth’ occurring with every arrival to the system, and a ‘death’ with every departure), greatly simplifying their study. (A brief introduction to birth–death, and other, stochastic processes with their connections to queues can be found, for example, in Ross (1993), as well as in the general references for queues given in Sect. 1). More complex systems sometimes resort to studying other embedded stochastic (hopefully Markovian) processes by contemplating the system as it would be seen by an arriving customer or by a departing customer.

In all but the simplest queues, determination of these probabilities is, unfortunately, extremely difficult. Often, however, it is possible to determine their large time limit, the so-called equilibrium or steady-state distribution

$$P_j(\theta) = \lim_{t \rightarrow \infty} P_j(t|\theta)$$

without actually having to compute $P_j(t|\theta)$. The equilibrium distribution does not depend on the initial conditions of the system and it is stationary (does not depend on t once the statistical equilibrium is reached). The ergodic conditions give the restrictions on θ under which the system will eventually reach the equilibrium (with probability one). Thus, for instance, in an $M/M/1$ queue, the ergodic condition establishes that the arrival rate (λ) should be smaller than the service rate (μ) (that is, the average number of customers arriving in a unit time is smaller than the average number that the server can handle, a most intuitive condition).

For the most part, queueing theory deals with computations of the steady-state probabilities $P_j(\theta)$, and their use in computing other (steady-state) measures of performance of the queue, such as the expected number of customers in the system and/or in the waiting line, the distribution of the time spent queueing or in the system or their expected values, or the mean (or distribution) of the time the servers are busy (or idle). These steady-state distributions are also often very difficult to compute, and many require solving systems of differential equations, inversion of transforms (generating probability functions, Laplace transforms,...), etc. When only the expected values are required, an extremely useful formula for systems in equilibrium is Little's law which establishes that the expected number of customers in the system (L) is equal to the average time that a customer spends in the system (W) times the rate (λ) at which customers enter the system.

3. Statistical Analysis: A Bayesian Approach

Most of the vast effort in queueing theory has been devoted to the probabilistic development of queueing models and to the study of its mathematical properties; that is, the parameters governing the models are, for the most part, assumed given. Statistical analyses, in which uncertainty is introduced, are comparatively very scarce. A good review is Bhat et al. (1996). It could be argued that the general results of the (well developed) area of inference for stochastic processes (see for instance, Basawa and Prakasa Rao 1980, Lehoczky 1990) could be applied to queues. These general results do not take advantage of the special structure of queueing systems, however, nor do they address its specific questions.

Inference in queueing systems is not easy: From a frequentist perspective, development of the needed sampling distributions can be very involved and often the analysis is restricted to asymptotic results. Also, estimates can be different, for example, if the observational process differ, if the initial queue length is or is not included in the analysis. The statistical analysis is simpler if approached from the Bayesian perspective, and we take this approach below (see Bayesian Statistics). More arguments in favor of Bayesian analyses of queueing systems are given in Armero and Bayarri (1999), where a comprehensive list of references with Bayesian analyses of queues is also given. As an illustration of the main issues, the analysis of the much studied $M/M/1$ queue is outlined here.

According to the assumptions of the $M/M/1$ queue, the interarrival times, Y , are i.i.d. exponential with arrival rate λ , that is

$$f(y|\lambda) = \lambda e^{-\lambda y}, \quad y > 0. \quad (1)$$

Similarly, the service times X are also i.i.d., $X \sim \text{Ex}(\mu)$, independently of Y , where μ is the service rate. That is

$$f(x|\mu) = \mu e^{-\mu x}, \quad x > 0. \quad (2)$$

Steady-state distributions exist if and only if the ergodic condition

$$\rho = \lambda/\mu < 1 \quad (3)$$

holds, where ρ is the called traffic intensity and plays an important role in the study of $M/M/1$ queues.

A queue can be observed in a variety of ways and different quantities can be recorded. The most traditional experiments (providing complete information) in queues observe the system over a continuous period of time $(0, T]$. T can either be a value fixed in advance, or be determined by a suitable stopping rule. For instance, the system can be observed until the busy time reaches some preassigned fixed value, until a fixed number of customers have departed from the system, until a fixed number of transitions have been recorded, and so on (references can be found in Armero and Bayarri, 1997). Different quantities can be recorded (instants of arrivals, of departures, of commencing of service, number of arrivals and/or departures, interarrival times, service times, number of transitions, busy times, etc). If the queue is assumed to be in equilibrium, the observation of the number of customers at time 0 can also be added, providing more informative but rather cumbersome likelihood functions.

Suppose that an experiment providing n_a interarrival times, $Y_1, \dots, Y_{n_a}$ and n_s service completions, $X_1, \dots, X_{n_s}$ has been performed. Then, from (1) and (2), a likelihood function for (λ, μ) based on the observed $\mathbf{x} = (x_1, x_2, \dots, x_{n_s})$ and $\mathbf{y} = (y_1, y_2, \dots, y_{n_a})$ is where $t_a = \sum_{i=1}^{n_a} y_i$, $t_s = \sum_{j=1}^{n_s} x_j$ are the totals of observed interarrival times and service times, respectively. Notice that this likelihood is valid whether n_a and/or n_s are fixed or random (as long as the likelihood function is proportional to (4)). Also, the observation of the arrival and the service processes does not need to be simultaneous and the X 's and Y 's does not need to correspond to successive customers. (Of course, many of the observational procedures mentioned above result in likelihood functions proportional to (4).) Notice also that (4) applies whether or not the system is in equilibrium and whether or not equilibrium can eventually be reached.

$$\ell(\lambda, \mu) \propto f(\mathbf{x}, \mathbf{y} | \lambda, \mu) \propto \lambda^{n_a} e^{-\lambda t_a} \mu^{n_s} e^{-\mu t_s} \quad (4)$$

Maximum likelihood estimators are immediate from (4), and given by

$$\hat{\lambda} = \frac{n_a}{t_a}, \quad \hat{\mu} = \frac{n_s}{t_s}, \quad \hat{\rho} = \frac{\hat{\lambda}}{\hat{\mu}} \quad (5)$$

However, standard errors of confidence intervals do require careful consideration of the specific stopping rule used, and different experimental designs will in general produce different sampling distributions for these estimators, and hence different standard errors and confidence intervals.

Bayesian analyses are insensitive to (noninformative) stopping rules, and all that is required from the data is the likelihood function (4). A prior distribution has also to be assessed quantifying whatever is known about the system before the data is collected. Usually, there is plenty of information a priori about the queue, especially if it is assumed to be in equilibrium (which implies, at the very least, that the system has been working for an extended period of time). A prior distribution incorporating all this information should then be assessed. However, to keep the parallelism with the likelihood analysis and also to avoid the extra work of quantifying subjective beliefs, we use a Bayesian analysis usually called ‘objective’ because the prior distribution used is of the ‘non-informative’ or ‘objective’ type. Since both λ and μ are scale parameters, the invariant measures for each will be used, and they will be assumed independent a priori, that is

$$\pi(\lambda, \mu) \propto \frac{1}{\lambda} \frac{1}{\mu}. \quad (6)$$

Note that no assumptions about the stationarity of the queue are made in (6). In fact, they are not needed to produce posterior distributions, although they could be incorporated if desired (see (9) below). If it is wished to incorporate prior information about the values of λ and μ , a very simple prior distribution to use is the conjugate $\pi(\lambda, \mu) \propto Ga(\lambda|a, b) Ga(\mu|c, d)$, a product of two independent gamma distributions, with the hyperparameters a, b, c, d chosen to reflect the prior information. (Again, this prior makes no assumptions about stationarity). In fact, the prior (6) can be seen as a limiting case of this conjugate prior when all hyperparameters tend to 0 (‘vague’ prior information).

Combining (4) with (6) with Bayes theorem, we get the joint posterior distribution

$$\begin{aligned} \pi(\lambda, \mu | \mathbf{x}, \mathbf{y}) &\propto \pi(\lambda, \mu) f(\mathbf{x}, \mathbf{y} | \lambda, \mu) \\ &\propto Ga(\lambda | n_a, t_a) Ga(\mu | n_s, t_s) \end{aligned} \quad (7)$$ so that λ and μ are independent a posteriori with scaled chi-squared distributions $2t_a\lambda \sim \chi^2_{(2n_a)}$, $2t_s\mu \sim \chi^2_{(2n_s)}$, and since they are independent, $(t_a/t_s)\rho \sim F_{2n_a, 2n_s}$, an F distribution. These distributions will be exactly valid for all experiments producing the likelihood function (4), irrespective of the stopping rule. Usual estimates of λ , μ and ρ are the means (or the modes) of their (marginal) posterior distributions, and ‘standard errors’ associated to these estimates are most naturally given by the standard deviations of those distributions. Intervals with a given probability content can similarly be given. All these will numerically reproduce their non-Bayesian counterparts when the design has n_a and n_s fixed in advance.

An important issue when studying queues is how likely it is that steady-state can be reached. From the marginal distribution of ρ , this and other questions of direct interest can be answered. In particular, the probability that the ergodic condition holds is computed from the F distribution above as where $\Psi_{(2n_a, 2n_s)}$ is the distribution function of an $F_{2n_a, 2n_s}$ distribution.

$$\begin{aligned} \pi_e &= Pr(\rho < 1 | \mathbf{x}, \mathbf{y}) = \int_0^1 \pi(\rho | \mathbf{x}, \mathbf{y}) d\rho \\ &= \Psi_{(2n_a, 2n_s)}(t_a/t_s) \end{aligned} \quad (8)$$

Most often, queues are assumed to be in equilibrium. Under this assumption, the restriction $\rho < 1$ imposed by the ergodic conditions should be incorporated into the analysis. This is easily done, and in fact amounts to truncating the unrestricted posterior distribution for ρ giving and $\pi(\rho | \mathbf{x}, \mathbf{y}, \rho < 1) = 0$ for $\rho \geq 1$. From (9), estimates, standard errors, credible intervals, etc. that take into account the restriction can be produced. (In this simple case, the probability π_e in (8), the proportionality constant in (9) and the moments of the truncated posterior can be given close form expressions in terms of Gauss’ hypergeometric functions.) In Armero and Bayarri (1999), an explicit expression for a factor that can be used for adjusting the usual MLE $\hat{\rho}$ is given, as well as (adjusted) ‘standard errors.’ It can there be seen that incorporating the restriction $\rho < 1$ has the effect of ‘shrinking’ the usual MLE, the shrinkage being larger the larger $\hat{\rho}$ and the smaller the sample sizes, a most intuitive result.

$$\pi(\rho | \mathbf{x}, \mathbf{y}, \rho < 1) = \frac{\pi(\rho | \mathbf{x}, \mathbf{y})}{\pi_e} \quad \text{for } \rho < 1, \quad (9)$$

When statistically analyzing queueing systems, inference about the parameters is rarely (if ever) of direct interest. Usually the main goal is prediction of observable quantities that describe the utilization and degree of congestion of the system. From the Bayesian perspective, it is also very easy to produce predictive distributions incorporating the uncertainty in the estimation of the unknown parameters. The predictive distribution of the steady-state number, N , of customers in the system is computed as

$$\begin{aligned} p(N = n | \mathbf{x}, \mathbf{y}, \rho < 1) \\ = \int_0^1 Pr(N = n | \rho) \pi(\rho | \mathbf{x}, \mathbf{y}, \rho < 1) d\rho \end{aligned} \quad (10)$$

where $Pr(N = n | \rho)$ is given by the Geometric $Ge(1$

– p) distribution and $\pi(\rho | \mathbf{x}, \mathbf{y}, \rho < 1)$ is given in (9). In this case, again, (10) can be given a close form expression (see Armero and Bayarri 1994, for details).

Similar arguments apply for prediction of the number of the (steady-state) number of customers in the waiting line, time spent by a customer in the system (or waiting in line), length of busy (idle) periods, etc. All these predictive distributions are a most natural tool for deciding future interventions in the queue (see Armero and Bayarri 1997).

4. Conclusion

Queues systems are useful to stochastically model systems in which subjects interact and congestion occurs. They can describe a wide variety of such situations, in virtually all areas of application. In probabilistic terms, queues have been extensively studied under the assumption that the governing parameters are known. Inferences about these parameters can be very challenging when approached from a frequentist perspective, and the common approach of simply replacing the unknown parameters by some estimates when predicting measures of performance of the queues can produce deceiving results. Bayesian methods appear to be ideally suited to handle inferential aims in queuing systems, as incorporating restrictions in the parameter space (imposed by the ergodic conditions), predicting measures of performance, designing the system, etc. Moreover, its independence of the stopping rule makes the inferential task much simpler.

Bibliography

- Armero C, Bayarri M J 1994 Bayesian prediction in $M/M/1$ queues. Queueing Systems 15: 401–17
- Armero C, Bayarri M J 1997 Bayesian questions and answers in queues. In: Bernardo J M, Berger J O, Dawid A P, Smith A F M (eds.) Bayesian Statistics 5. Oxford University Press, Oxford, UK, pp. 3–23
- Armero C, Bayarri M J 1999 Dealing with uncertainties in queues and networks of queues: a Bayesian approach. In: Ghosh S (ed.) Multivariate Analysis, Design of Experiments and Survey Sampling. Marcel Dekker, New York, pp. 579–608
- Basawa I V, Prakasa Rao B L S 1980 Statistical Inference for Stochastic Processes. Academic Press, New York
- Bhat U N, Miller G K, Rao S S 1996 Statistical analysis of queueing systems. In: Dshalalow J H (ed.) Frontiers in Queueing: Models and Applications in Science and Engineering. CRC Press, Boca Raton, FL, pp. 351–94
- Cooper R B 1981 Introduction to Queueing Theory. 2nd edn. North-Holland, New York
- Cooper R B 1990 Queueing Theory. In: Heyman D P, Sobel M J (eds.) Hand-books in OR and MS, Vol 2. Elsevier, Amsterdam, pp. 469–518
- Cox D R, Smith W L 1961 Queues. Wiley, London
- Dshalalow J H (ed.) 1995 Advances in Queueing: Theory, Methods, and Open Problems. CRC Press, Boca Raton, FL
- Dshalalow J H (ed.) 1997 Frontiers in Queueing. Models and Applications in Science and Engineering. CRC Press, Boca Raton, FL
- Gross D, Harris C M 1985 Fundamentals of Queueing Theory. 2nd edn. Wiley, New York
- Kleinrock L 1975 Queueing Systems, Vol. 1: Theory. Wiley, New York
- Kleinrock L 1976 Queueing Systems, Vol. 2: Computer Applications. Wiley, New York
- Lehoczky J 1990 Statistical Methods. In: Heyman D P, Sobel M J (eds.) Handbooks in OR and MS, Vol 2. Elsevier, Amsterdam, pp. 469–518
- Medhi J 1991 Stochastic Models in Queueing Theory. Academic Press, Boston
- Nelson R 1995 Probability, Stochastic Processes and Queueing Theory. Springer Verlag, New York
- Newell G F 1982 Applications of Queueing Theory. 2nd edn. Chapman and Hall, London
- Ross S M 1993 Introduction to Probability Models. 5th edn. Academic Press, New York
- Takács L 1962 Introduction to the Theory of Queues. Oxford University Press, New York

C. Armero and M. J. Bayarri

Copyright © 2001 Elsevier Science Ltd.

All rights reserved.

R

Race and Gender Intersections

In the 1980s and 1990s there has been a proliferation of scholarship by and about women of color that challenges heretofore accepted theories of society. Yet, this writing is even more marginalized than thinking that centers on white women. While a great deal of feminist work has been written to challenge existing sociological theory, there has been only limited impact on new theory formation. Currently, in most social theory texts, gender generally is segregated into a section on feminist theory, or ignored completely. Moreover, few articles in the American Journal of Sociology and the American Sociological Review contain discussions of feminist theory.

Thus, while 'feminist theory' remains marginalized, or ignored, the theorizing by and about women of color remains marginalized within the margins. Lest we think that this is simply a byproduct of white male hegemony, this marginalization is also present in feminist theorizing. To be sure, most edited volumes now include articles by and about women of color, the question remains to what extent have these writings influenced mainstream feminist theory?

Theorizing by and about women of color has had a bifurcated influence on the development of feminist theory. As Hooks (2000) notes, there is a 'high' and 'low' theory, and the former still continues to exclude much of the experientially based theorizing of women of color. Caraway (1991) notes that 'in academic practice, some white feminists have exhibited a tendency to ghettoize the creative and expressive writings of Black women as "empirical" supplements to the "formal" theory texts of white feminists.' For example, in a brief overview of some of the main feminist theory texts, women of color generally are segregated into a section on difference, multiculturalism, or women of color. Or, the text is peppered with reprints of 1980s writings by prominent women of color such as Bell Hooks, Pat Hill Collins, Adrienne Rich, Patricia Williams, Audre Lorde, Gloria Anzaldua, and Angela Davis. But often more recent scholarship on women of color is absent. In an overview of the literature, Glenn (1999) concludes that, '... despite increased recognition of the interconnectedness of gender and race, race remained undertheorized even in the writings of women of color. In the absence of a "theory" of race comparable to a "theory" of gender, building a comprehensive theory has proven elusive.' Following the work of Liu (1991), Higginbotham (1992), Kaminsky (1994), and Stoler (1996), Glenn calls for a synthesis through social constructionism, arguing that race and gender are 'relational concepts whose construction involves both representation and social structural processes in which power is a constitutive element' (1999).

1. Intersectionality Theory

Theorizing about women of color has had a major impact on postmodernist feminist theory. Postmodernism is committed to the deconstruction of absolute truths and views knowledge as socially constructed. Women of color have developed 'Intersectionality Theory' that subscribes to many postmodern tenets, and is committed to what McLaren (1994) calls resistance postmodernism. As Cordova (1998) states, 'Along with the critiques of modernism comes the notion that social "facts" are social constructions; social reality is mediated by one's positionality; that identity is tied to location (subjectivity); and that meaning is unstable and connected to the advanced capitalist construction of consumerism.'

'Intersectionality Theory' objects to the notion that all truths are equal and to the notion that individual narratives should not become a basis for shared resistance to oppressive power relations. So, while postmodernism emphasizes deconstructionism, 'Intersectionality Theory' insists upon an equal attention to constructionism. Equally important is that 'Intersectionality Theory' is written in a language more readily accessible to the general public than is that of French Postmodernism. It is often written in the language of experience.

Many women of color have contributed to the development of 'Intersectionality Theory,' which is interdisciplinary (Hooks 1984, Anzaldua 1987, 1990, Collins 1990, 1998, Crenshaw 1989, 1991, 1997, de la Torre and Pesquera 1993, Glenn 1985, Lorde 1984, Williams 1991, Zinn and Dill 1993, Brewer 1990, King 1988, Espiritu 1997). Collins (1990) argued for a more complex conceptualization of gender relations; one that included an understanding of the 'matrix of domination,' that is the intersection of gender, class, race, sexual preference, and other relevant systems of oppression. For Collins and other feminists of color, these intersections are not simply separate cumulative variables by which we can assess one's experience of oppression. Rather it is the way these positions interlock in interactive or unique ways at their intersections that provides the experience of oppression. She writes: 'replacing additive models of oppression with interlocking ones creates possibilities for new paradigms. The significance of seeing race, class, and gender as interlocking systems of oppression is that such an approach fosters a paradigmatic shift of thinking inclusively about other oppressions, such as age, sexual orientation, religion and ethnicity.'

Hooks (1989) offers a similar analysis with her notion of a 'politic of domination,' arguing that, all of these axes are imbued with 'notions of superior and inferior ... component.' 'Intersectionality Theory' simultaneously challenges multiple levels of oppression, while viewing race and gender as something more than the sum of their parts (King 1988). This theoretical approach arose in parallel with mainstream feminist theory as evidenced by the statement of the Combahee River Collective (1983), which was formed in the mid-1970s by a group of Black lesbian feminists. They wrote: 'The most general statement of our politics at the present time would be that we are actively committed to struggling against racial, sexual, heterosexual, and class oppression, and see as our particular task the development of integrated analysis and practice based upon the fact that the major systems of oppression are interlocking. The synthesis of these oppressions creates the conditions of our lives. As Black women we see Black feminism as the logical political movement to combat the manifold and simultaneous oppressions that all women of color face.'

'Intersectionality Theory' is more than the notion that the whole does not equal the sum of its parts. It also encompasses some creative, novel, methodological approaches to the study of social phenomena. For example, Sandoval (1998) writes about the extent to which Anzaldúa's (1987) book influences feminists of color: 'This "borderlands" feminism, many argue, calls up a syncretic form of consciousness made up of transversions and crossings; its recognition makes possible another kind of critical apparatus and political operation in which mestiza feminism comes to function as a working chiasmus (a mobile crossing) between races, genders, sexes, culture, languages, and nations. Thus conceived, La conciencia de la mestiza makes visible the operation of another meta-form of consciousness that insists upon polymodal forms of poetics, ethics, identities, and politics not only for Chicanas/os but for any constituency resisting the old and new hierarchies of the coming millennium.'

In this view, the study of any social problem entails a holistic approach, one that includes analyses of race, class, gender, sexuality, language, culture, and nation.

2. Intersectionality Theory and Mainstream Sociology

'Intersectionality Theory' encompasses a methodological approach critical to the study of social phenomena, and it has been employed by many women of color social scientists in such areas as the study of family, social movements, race and ethnicity, social stratification, legal institutions and crime, organizations, work and welfare, and politics. The following discussion provides examples of ways in which analysis of the intersectionality of race and gender enrich our theoretical understanding in several areas of study.

Let us begin with family studies. Wilson's (1987) work on the American Black underclass, and its implications for the Black family, has gained national attention. By contrast, the research conducted by Black women scholars, many of whom contextualize his findings, has received less attention. Dickerson (1995) examines predominant approaches to the study of African-American families that often judge them by their similarity to white families. She finds these approaches less useful than a form of 'centrism,' an Afrocentric paradigm that 'centers' groups in terms of their own cultural meanings, attitudes, and values, and gathers data from the standpoint of the group being studied. This approach is very much in keeping with 'Intersectionality Theory.'

Using this approach, Sudarkasa (1993) and Jewell (1988) both argue against the claim that 'female-headed households are the root cause of the deplorable conditions in which many Blacks find themselves in urban ghettos' (Sudarkasa 1993). Rather, they argue that the most critical factors for family survival and success are economic resources and proximity to kin. Harriet McAdoo's research indicates that kin systems are critical for the survival of black single mothers and the elderly. Wilson (1987) seems to drop the importance of kin and translates the need for economic resources into a need for a marriageable pool of Black males. Black male unemployment, he argues, is a critical intervention in the fight to uplift the underclass. While this is certainly of central importance, Black women's employment is equally important. After all, many upper-class white women are choosing to bear children out of wedlock, but there has not been the corresponding outcry, because they are economically capable of sustaining themselves and their offspring. But it is most difficult for Black women to support their children. Black women are disadvantaged by both racial and gender differences in earnings, which persist even after levels of educational attainment are held constant (Herring 1999).

A perspective that emphasizes the intersectionality of race, class, and gender are absent in most mainstream theories of racial/ethnic families, and this omission leaves such theories inadequate.

This pattern of omission is also visible in social movement theory. While feminists such as Verta

Taylor, Myra Marx Ferree, Pam Oliver, Nancy Whittier, and several others have made significant contributions to social movement theory, scholarly contributions by and/or about women of color are largely absent from major theoretical texts in this area, ignoring the contributions of the few women of color who are writing in this area, such as Patricia Zavella, Belinda Robnett, and Bernice McNair Barnett. Zavella's (1987) work on union organizing has shown that recruitment strategies must specifically address issues of race/class/gender as they affect the reality of potential recruits. Both Barnett (1993) and Robnett (1996, 1997) have shown the importance of Black women's contributions to the civil rights movement. Robnett (1997) argues that the intersectionality of race/class/gender shaped the organization of social movement organizations and leadership in social movements. Robnett (1997) shows that the experiences and contributions of women in the civil rights movement are varied by race and class. African-American women were critical bridge leaders in the civil rights movement, forging ties between movement organizations and the grass roots participants. Without their participation, the movement would not have succeeded. Her intersectionality approach lends insight into the decline of that movement, as the clash between white politicians, Black male elites, and rural Black women led to the disillusionment and disengagement of grass roots leadership. Scholars such as Dill (1988), Gilkes (1988), and Sacks (1988), have written about the redefinition of what we define as 'political,' suggesting that the boundaries are much too narrow, which has important implications for social movement theory, including what counts as a political identity or political activity.

Indeed, the theorizing by and about women of color has been excluded in a number of areas including work, the state, and the sociology of knowledge. For example, while feminist scholars have analyzed social reproduction, that is, childbearing and childcare, its racialization has been noted less. Glenn (1999) points out that while scholars theorize about how gender leads women to be assigned to child care in the context of a sex division of labor, they often ignore the fact that women of color are the ones who end up in the situation of leaving their own children at home or with kin, while they take care of other women's children to make the money to support their own children. Class, race, and gender affect the life chances of women of color, making them the group often concentrated in low paid childcare because of a lack of better employment options.

Glenn notes a similar omission in studies of citizenship. Whereas many feminists such as Pateman (1988), Young (1989), and Okin (1979) have challenged conceptualizations of the 'universal citizen,' short shrift has been paid to race/gender. Glenn (1999) asserts, 'The problem with looking at citizenship as only gendered or only raced is the familiar one:

women of color fall through the cracks.'

Collins's (1999) critique of feminist analyses of science is equally instructive. She suggests that, 'feminist analyses of gender and scientific knowledge might benefit from closer association with emerging scholarship on intersectionality.' Collins convincingly illustrates the ways in which 'selecting a specific social location, social practice, group history, or topic, and subjecting it to an intersectionality analysis,' challenges the notion that Western science is an objective, apolitical, ahistorical endeavor.

In short, the social location (in the margin in the margin) of the scholarship by and about women of color, impedes the development of our understanding of social phenomena.

See also: Altruism and Prosocial Behavior, Sociology of; Civil Rights Movement, The; Conflict Sociology; Critical Race Theory; Feminist Theory and Women of Color; Gender and Feminist Studies; Gender and Feminist Studies in Sociology; Gender, Class, Race, and Ethnicity, Social Construction of; Gender History; Multicultural Feminism: Cultural Concerns; Multiculturalism: Sociological Aspects; Poverty and Gender in Affluent Nations; Race: History of the Concept; Race Identity; Racial Relations; Racism, History of; Racism, Sociology of

Bibliography

- Anzaldúa G 1987 Borderlands/La Frontera: The New Mestiza. Aunt Lute Press, San Francisco
- Anzaldúa G (ed.) 1990 Making Face, Making Soul: Haciendo Caras: Creative and Critical Perspectives by Women of Color. Aunt Lute Press, San Francisco
- Barnett B 1993 Invisible southern black women leaders in the civil rights movement: The triple constraints of gender, race, and class. Gender and Society 7(2): 162-82
- Brewer R 1990 In: Albrecht L, Brewer R M (eds.) Bridges of Power: Women's Multicultural Alliances. New Society Publishers, Philadelphia, PA
- Brewer R 1993 Theorizing race, class and gender: The new scholarship of Black feminist intellectuals and Black women's labor. In: James S M, Busia A P A (eds.) Theorizing Black Feminisms: The Visionary Pragmatism of Black Women. Routledge, New York, pp. 13-30
- Caraway N 1991 Segregated Sisterhood: Racism and the Politics of American Feminism. University of Tennessee Press, Knoxville, TN
- Collins P H 1990 Black Feminist Thought: Knowledge, Consciousness, and Empowerment. Unwin Hyman, Boston
- Collins P H 1998 Fighting Words: Black Women and the Search for Justice. University of Minnesota Press, Minneapolis, MN
- Collins P H 1999 Moving beyond gender: Intersectionality and scientific knowledge. In: Ferree M M, Lorber J, Hess B (eds.) Revisioning Gender. Sage, Thousand Oaks, CA, pp. 261-84
- Combahee River Collective 1983 Combahee river collective statement. In: Smith B (ed.) Home Girls: A Black Feminist Anthology. Kitchen Table—Women of Color Press, New York, pp. 272-82

- Cordova T 1998 Power and knowledge: Colonialism in the academy. In: Trujillo C (ed.) Living Chicana Theory. Third Woman Press, Berkeley, CA, pp. 17–45
- Crenshaw K 1989 Demarginalizing the intersection of race and sex: A black feminist critique of antidiscrimination doctrine, feminist theory, and antiracist politics. University of Chicago Legal Forum 7: 139–67
- Crenshaw K 1991 Mapping the margins: Intersectionality, identity politics, and violence against women of color. Stanford Law Review 43: 6
- Crenshaw K 1997 Intersectionality and identity politics: Learning from violence against women of color. In: Shanley M, Narayan U (eds.) Reconstructing Political Theory: Feminists Perspectives. Pennsylvania State University Press, University Park, PA
- De la Torre A, Pesquera B (eds.) 1993 Building with Our Hands: New Directions in Chicana Studies. University of California Press, Berkeley, CA
- Dickerson B 1995 (ed.) African American Single Mothers: Understanding their Lives and Families. Sage, Thousand Oaks, CA
- Dill B T 1988 Making your job good yourself: Domestic service and the construction of personal dignity. In: Bookman A, Morgen S (eds.) Women and the Politics of Empowerment. Temple University Press, Philadelphia, PA, pp. 33–52
- Espiritu Y L 1997 Asian American Women and Men. Sage, Thousand Oaks, CA
- Gilkes C T 1988 Building in many places: Multiple commitments and ideologies in black women's community work. In: Bookman A, Morgen S (eds.) Women and the Politics of Empowerment. Temple University Press, Philadelphia, PA, pp. 53–76
- Glenn E N 1985 Racial ethnic women's labor: The intersection of race, gender, and class oppression. Review of Radical Political Economics 17: 86–108
- Glenn E N 1999 The social construction and institutionalization of gender and race: An integrative framework. In: Ferree M M, Lorber J, Hess B B (eds.) Revisioning Gender. Sage, Thousand Oaks, CA, pp. 3–41
- Herring C 1999 African Americans in contemporary America: Progress and retrenchment. In: Dworkin A G, Dworkin R J (eds.) The Minority Report. Harcourt Brace, Orlando, FL, pp. 181–208
- Higginbotham E 1992 African American women's history and the metalanguage of race. Signs 17: 251–74
- Hooks B 1984 Feminist Theory from Margin to Center. South End Press, Boston
- Hooks B 1989 Talking Back: Thinking Feminist, Thinking Black. South End Press, Boston
- Hooks B 2000 Theory as liberatory practice (from Teaching to Transgress (1994)). In: Kolmar W, Bartkowski F (eds.) Feminist Theory: A Reader. Mayfield Publishing, Mountain View, CA, pp. 28–33
- Jewell K S 1988 From Mammy to Miss America and Beyond: Cultural Images and the Shaping of US Social Policy. Routledge, New York
- Kaminsky A 1994 Gender, race, raza. Feminist Studies 20: 3–32
- King D K 1988 Multiple jeopardy, multiple consciousness: The context of a black feminist ideology. Signs 14(1): 42–72
- Liu T 1991 Teaching differences among women from a historical perspective: Rethinking race and gender as social categories. Women's Studies International Forum 14(4): 265–76
- Lorde A 1984 Sister Outsider: Essays and Speeches. Crossings Press, Trumansburg, NY
- McLaren P 1994 Critical Pedagogy and Predatory Culture: Oppositional Politics in a Postmodern Era. Routledge, New York
- Okin S 1979 Women in Western Political Thought. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Pateman C 1988 The Sexual Contract. Polity, Cambridge, MA
- Robnett B 1996 African American women in the civil rights movement: Gender, leadership, and micromobilization. American Journal of Sociology 101(6): 1661–93
- Robnett B 1997 How Long? How Long? African American Women in the Struggle for Civil Rights. Oxford University Press, New York
- Sacks K 1988 Caring by the Hour. University of Illinois Press, Chicago
- Sandoval C 1998 Mestizaje as method: Feminists-of-color challenge the canon. In: Trujillo C (ed.) Living Chicana Theory. Third Woman Press, Berkeley, CA, pp. 352–70
- Stoler A 1996 Carnal knowledge and imperial power: Gender, race and morality in colonial Asia. In: Scott J W (ed.) Feminism and History. Oxford University Press, New York, pp. 209–66
- Sudarkasa N 1993 Female-headed African American households: Some neglected dimensions. In: McAdoo H P (ed.) Family Ethnicity: Strength in Diversity. Sage, Newbury Park, CA, pp. 81–9
- Williams P 1991 The Alchemy of Race and Rights: Diary of a Law Professor. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Wilson W J 1987 The Truly Disadvantaged: The Inner City, the Underclass, and Public Policy. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
- Young I 1989 Polity and group difference: A critique of the ideal of universal citizenship. Ethics 99: 250–74
- Zavella P 1987 Women's Work and Chicana Families: Cannery Workers of the Santa Clara Valley. Cornell University Press, Ithaca, NY
- Zinn M B, Dill B T (eds.) 1993 Women of Color in United States Society. Temple University Press, Philadelphia, PA

B. Robnett

Race and the Law

1. Definition of the Field

The study of race and the law is most comprehensively developed and best defined as a genre of scholarship in the US. There the field is primarily, but far from exclusively, occupied by scholars trained in law and working in law schools. Significant contributions to the field have also been made in Canada and Europe, where the field is more evenly divided among lawyers and social scientists trained in anthropology, sociology, and cultural studies.

1.1 Mainstream vs. Critical Scholarship

Scholarship addressing race and the law is split between mainstream approaches and critical approaches. Mainstream approaches generally conceive of racial discrimination as a minor and isolated exception to the otherwise liberal and enlightened societies of the industrialized West. They understand racial injustice as largely unconnected to other institutions in the societies in which it operates and are therefore optimistic that racism can be eliminated 'surgically,' without requiring significant or widespread changes in those societies. Critical scholarship by contrast understands racism as deeply implicated in the institutions and traditions of societies and is therefore accordingly both more radical in its prescriptions and more circumspect in its predictions of success (Bell 1989, Crenshaw 1995, Williams 1991).

Because the definition of race is malleable, fluctuating, and contested, the study of race and the law encompasses not only 'race' as it is colloquially understood but also issues of ethnicity, national origin, caste, and religious and cultural difference. The field could therefore be understood to include the study of ethnic and nationalist divisions in Asian countries, caste hierarchy in Hindu societies, tribal conflict in central Africa, and religious conflict worldwide. It implicates the study of nationalism and pan-nationalist movements, communities of diaspora and indigenous peoples. Moreover, the field is deeply concerned with the intersection of race with issues of gender, sexual orientation, and class (Crenshaw 1995, A Harris 1990, Thomas 1995, Williams 1991).

Generally speaking, the study of race and the law encompasses two major projects. The first is a critique that demonstrates how legal institutions and formal laws produce and perpetuate racism and racial hierarchy. The second is the analysis of legal reform that might eliminate or minimize the effects of racial hierarchy. This article will address each in turn.

1.2 The Critique of Law as a Cause of Racism

Legal scholarship addresses the various ways in which law has produced and continues to produce racial hierarchy. Law contributes to racism and racial hierarchy in at least three distinct ways. First, law codifies racial categories, which are then employed by both public and private actors to erect and maintain racial hierarchies. Second, law institutionalizes racial hierarchy by creating formal rules requiring or encouraging racial hierarchy: by segregating the races, by excluding the members of certain races from participation in social, economic, and political activities and institutions, or by legally codifying the subordinate status of one or more races. These first two types of legal action are commonly known as de jure racial discrimination because they explicitly employ or create racial categories by force of law. Third, law allows, encourages, and requires the maintenance of institutional practices and social customs that perpetuate racial subordination by entrenching the racial hierarchies of the past, even when no formal legal rule requires or promotes racial subordination on its face. This latter type of legal action is known as de facto racial discrimination because it in fact produces and enforces racial subordination, although it does not do so explicitly.

2. Racial Categorization

Many scholars have studied the development and use of racial classificatory schemes (Davis 1991, Haney-Lopez 1994, Omi and Wynant 1994). Virtually all scholars agree that, historically, schemes of racial classification were not based on sound scientific theories and therefore do not reflect any 'real' biological differences between the races. Given the dubious scientific basis for any racial classification of human beings, it is not an exaggeration to assert that law not only enforced racial hierarchy, it also (along with other social institutions and practices) in fact produced a specific type of racial difference.

2.1 The Ontological Status of Racial Categories

There is disagreement about the ontological status of racial categories and the centrality of law in producing racial categories. Some scholars believe that racial categories have a substance that predates or transcends legally enforced and encoded racial categorization. While few scholars would argue that races are well understood in terms of biological or genetic difference, many argue for or assume that cultural differences distinguish the races (Gotanda 1995, Peller 1995). The belief that racial categories describe an essence or positive (in the sense of 'positive science' not necessarily in the sense of 'good') attribute of human beings—whether biological or cultural—is known as racial essentialism.

Other scholars argue that social practices, including legal codification, produced racial differences where there were no such differences before. These scholars contend race is not an attribute of individuals or groups but instead the effect of a social discourse that ascribes difference to individuals and groups (Appiah 1996, Ford 1999). They insist that without the discourse of race, there would be no races. The belief that race is not an attribute or essence of individuals or groups but is instead the effect of the social discourses that describe it and the social practices that make it relevant is known as anti-essentialism or social constructivism.

2.2 The Legal Codification of Racial Categories

Legal historians have examined the development and transformation of racial categories and definitions. A vast literature details the variety of racial classificatory schemes employed in the USA, Europe, and South Africa. The contemporary literature is overwhelmingly critical of most racial categorization, both because of its opportunistic use of scientific data (or its use of questionable science to justify racial categories) and because of the oppressive use to which racial categories have been put.

There is, however, some dissension on the question of remedial or so-called benign racial classification. A widespread understanding of constitutional law and a pervasive popular attitude holds that the legal codification of any racial classification is socially deleterious and morally indefensible (Thernstrom and Thernstrom 1999). This view asserts that the law should be race blind. Many scholars who may not insist on strict color blindness nevertheless have serious misgivings about the use of racial classifications, even for remedial purposes (Carter 1992). Others believe that racial classification is not per se undesirable and argue that remedial racial classification is the necessary antidote to centuries of oppressive racial classification. They assert that the law should be affirmatively race conscious (Crenshaw 1995, Gotanda 1995, Matsuda and Lawrence 1997, Peller 1995).

2.3 The Legal Enforcement of Racial Hierarchy

Along with the study of racial categorization, a core concern of the study of race and the law is the legal enforcement of racial hierarchy. Of course the two are closely related: racial categories developed hand in glove with policies of racial exclusion, segregation, disenfranchisement, and involuntary servitude. The study of racial hierarchy has traditionally distinguished between formally enforced racial distinctions, hierarchies, and exclusions—de jure racial practices—and the formal requirement and enforcement of practices that have the effect of establishing or perpetuating racial hierarchy—de facto racial practices.

2.3.1 De jure racial subordination. Legal historians have detailed the legal mechanisms that historically have enforced and perpetuated racial hierarchy. Historians of the USA study the institution of racial hierarchy through chattel slavery (Tushnet 1981) and the post-emancipation development of 'Jim Crow' laws, which required racial segregation in public institutions and accommodations such as school rest rooms, drinking fountains, eating facilities, railroad coaches, and theater or stadium seating (Woodward 1989). Scholars of South Africa study the emergence, transformation, and eventual dismantling of racial apartheid, a policy that codified a belief in black inferiority as explicit policy and required segregation of the races in virtually every aspect of political and social life (Goldberg 1994, McClintock and Nixon 1991). Comparative scholars analyze the difference and similarities of South African apartheid and American Jim Crow laws (Ford 1999, Goldberg 1994).

Much of the historical study of European racial policy takes place as part of the study of European colonialism (Appiah 1993, Bhabha 1994, Gilroy 1991). Explicit colonial racial policy and the treatment of non-whites in Europe are understood to implicate the ideology and political economy of European colonial rule.

2.3.2 De facto racial subordination. Formal racial exclusion, segregation, and hierarchical classification are rare in the post-industrial mass democracies of today. They have been rejected by mass opinion, eliminated by legislation, and struck down by courts applying constitutional law. Nevertheless, racial hierarchy persists as a significant feature of every society with a history of racial differentiation. Accordingly, the study of race and the law focuses a significant amount of attention on informal or implicit practices that effectively perpetuate racial hierarchy.

The focus on de facto racial subordination almost certainly began as a response to racial practices in the post civil war USA. Federal constitutional guarantees of emancipation from slavery, equal protection and the right to vote prohibited certain explicit racial barriers (see Civil Rights; Fundamental Rights and Constitutional Guarantees). But many states, especially those of the former confederacy, found mechanisms to effectively re-establish these racial barriers without explicit reference to race. For instance, although blacks had a formal right to vote, many states effectively eliminated the black franchise through poll taxes and literacy requirements that were informally waived or ignored for whites but strictly enforced against blacks. And despite the formal emancipation of black slaves, many blacks were effectively forced into perpetual indentured servitude through the notorious sharecropping system of Southern agriculture.

Informal and de facto forms of racial subordination emerged again as the response to more comprehensive civil rights reforms of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Significantly, the Civil Rights Act prohibited racial discrimination in employment and accommodation in private institutions such as hotels, restaurants, and theaters, and in the sale and rental of housing (see Civil Rights; Fundamental Rights and Constitutional Guarantees). Many of the private institutions covered by the Act sought effectively to reproduce racial exclusion or discrimination through less explicit means. Lawyers, activists, and scholars, armed with a knowledge of post civil war history, were able to identify and critique these practices. The attack on de facto racial subordination and discrimination became a staple of civil rights litigation as scholars and lawyers worked to expose the variety of practices that effectively perpetuated racial subordination. Antiracist scholarship and legal practice has attacked a host of formally colorblind practices as effectively racially discriminatory, including electoral gerrymandering (Guinier 1995), standardized tests (Matsuda and Lawrence 1997), neighborhood schools in a context of racially segregated neighborhoods (Ford 1995), restrictive land use regulations (Ford 1995, C Harris 1995), informal racial steering in real estate sales (Ford 1995), and informal racial discrimination in hiring and promotions (Crenshaw 1995, Williams 1991).

3. Antiracist Legal Reform

Scholarship that examines, analyzes, and advocates the development of antiracist legal reform encompasses a vast range of proposals and is based on a number of methodologies and ideological commitments. Many approaches to antiracist reform build on civil rights reforms of the 1960s in the USA, advocating the expansion of such reforms and/or the adaptation of such reforms in other national contexts (see Civil Rights).

A significant split has emerged between mainstream and critical approaches. Critical approaches question the efficacy and the underlying ideologies of mainstream civil rights and liberal antiracism (see Critical Race Theory). Beginning from an analysis that sees the problems of racism as deeply imbedded in the structure of social practices and institutions—including law itself—critical approaches are skeptical of reform proposals that attempt ‘surgically’ to correct or ameliorate racial bias while leaving most institutions and social practices more or less unchanged (Bell 1989, Crenshaw 1995). Nevertheless, many critical approaches often build on mainstream reforms, arguing for their radical expansion (Matsuda and Lawrence 1997, Williams 1991). Others suggest that mainstream reforms do more harm than good and should be abandoned altogether in favor of more comprehensive changes (Tushnet 1982).

3.1 Integrationism vs. Separatism

Crudely put, antiracist legal reform is characterized by a split between two strategies and/or normative commitments, one which favors the integration of the races and one which favors the development of distinct, autonomous and separate communities (see Ford 1995, Peller 1995).

Historically, racial hierarchy has been legally enforced through spatial quarantine: American Jim Crow laws enforced the physical separation of the races in public accommodations and state institutions; racial zoning and restrictive covenants have divided the metropolitan landscape into racial neighborhoods; South African apartheid enforced racial segregation on a comprehensive regional scale and imposed racially specific curfews in white-only jurisdictions. Spatial segregation not only had potent symbolic consequences but also facilitated the inequitable distribution of resources: white-only institutions were consistently better situated, better funded, and socially and politically privileged compared to those assigned to racial minorities.

Given this history, a significant approach to remediation has been to encourage the integration of the races in public and private institutions and residential environments. Many American civil rights reformers believed that antiracist legal reform should embody a positive preference for integration qua integration. Others believed that integration was desirable only because it would undo or stymie the inequitable distribution of resources in a society. These two rationales for integration produced a powerful consensus that has dominated American civil rights discourse since the 1960s and which has been influential in many other national contexts.

At the same time, however, a competing view has held that the development of distinctive and empowered minority communities is essential to racial justice and equality (Peller 1995). This view focuses on the need for political solidarity, social support, and cultural autonomy. Racial ‘separatism’ has grown in popularity as many racial minorities have become disillusioned with the limitations of mainstream civil rights and the difficulties and compromises entailed in integration.

3.2 Anti-discrimination

A dominant conceptual and practical approach to antiracist legal reform has been that of anti-discrimination. The anti-discrimination concept presupposes that racial hierarchy is the result of irrational prejudice or bigotry based on race that results in racial discrimination. Therefore, legal reform prohibits intentional racial discrimination and practices and some policies that disparately impact members of racial minority groups. The anti-discrimination approach to antiracism focuses on specific wrongful actions by identifiable decision makers: if no wrongful act can be identified, this approach recognizes no legally cognizable or remediable harm (see Freeman 1995; Discrimination; Equality and Inequality: Legal Aspects).

3.3 Anti-subordination

An alternative approach to antiracist legal reform is that of anti-subordination. The anti-subordination approach views racism as a set of practices that have the effect of systematically reproducing racial hierarchy, even if no identifiable decision maker can be said to be racially biased. Anti-subordination approaches therefore find it uncontroversial that practices that adversely effect racial minorities should come under legal scrutiny, even in the absence of evidence of intent or bias. More importantly anti-subordination approaches look for patterns and systems in which several distinct practices combine to produce regular, predictable, and systematic racial subordination even when each individual practice, viewed in isolation, might seem unproblematic (Crenshaw 1995).

3.4 Identity Politics and Multiculturalism

One significant strand of antiracist politics seeks to advance a project of racial recognition or multiculturalism, emphasizing the distinctiveness of racial minority communities in terms of culture. This strand seeks legal reform prohibiting discrimination against the cultural practices of racial minority groups as well discrimination on the basis of race qua status (Gotanda 1995, Peller 1995, Kymlicka 2000, Taylor 1994).

This approach can be understood as a logical extension of the anti-subordination approach to antiracist legal reform: discrimination against cultural practices effectively harms members of racial minority groups and can be seen as a component of systematic racial subordination.

One necessary consequence of racial multiculturalism is that it requires a definition or widely shared understanding of the content of racial identity or a racial culture. Such understandings or definitions are often controversial, both in society at large and within the given racial group itself. Moreover, the idea that racial identity or culture exists in a static or stable form is itself controversial. Some scholars would reject the very idea of a static or widely shared understanding of racial identity or culture as mistakenly essentialist (see Sect. 2.1.1).

3.5 Anti-essentialist and Cosmopolitan Conceptions of Racial Identity

An emerging strand of antiracist scholarship first articulated within postcolonial African, Caribbean, and Indian communities approaches racial identity as fluid and supple, yet also the source of rich political, social, and cultural affiliations. These approaches define racial identity not in terms of a biological or cultural essence, but instead in terms of identification (Appiah 1996, Bhabha 1994, Gilroy 1991). According to one strand of this scholarship, members of racial minority groups share common 'passions' based on shared or analogous experiences of racial subordination (Gilroy 1991). This approach dispenses altogether with any remnant of biological or inheritance notions of racial identity: members of what might traditionally have been several different 'races' can and do share a cosmopolitan racial identity which can transcend national boundaries, cultural traditions, skin color, and phenotype. This scholarship adopts an explicitly anti-subordination approach to antiracism, but rejects the multiculturalist focus on cultural traditions within distinctive racial or ethnic communities as traditionally defined. Instead it embraces a cosmopolitan or diasporic culture that joins racial minorities of various ethnicities and cultural backgrounds.

See also: Affirmative Action: Comparative Policies and Controversies; Affirmative Action: Empirical Work on its Effectiveness; Affirmative Action Programs (India): Cultural Concerns; Affirmative Action Programs (United States): Cultural Concerns; Affirmative Action, Sociology of; Civil Liberties and Human Rights; Conflict Sociology; Critical Race Theory; Discrimination; Gender, Class, Race, and Ethnicity, Social Construction of; Race: Genetic Aspects; Race: History of the Concept; Race Relations in the United States, Politics of; Racism, History of; Racism, Sociology of; Segregation Indices

Bibliography

- Appiah K A 1993 In My Father's House, Africa in the Philosophy of Culture. Oxford University Press, New York
- Appiah K A 1996 Race, culture, identity. In: Appiah K A, Gutman A (eds.) Color Conscious. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Bell D 1987 And We Are Not Saved: The Illusive Quest for Racial Justice. Basic Books, New York
- Bell D 1992 Race, Racism and American Law. Little Brown, Boston
- Bhabha H K 1994 The Location of Culture. Routledge, New York
- Carter S L 1991 Reflections of an Affirmative Action Baby. Basic Books, New York
- Crenshaw K 1995 Race, reform and retrenchment: Transformation and legitimation in anti-discrimination law. In: Crenshaw K, Gotanda N, Peller G, Thomas K (eds.) 1995 Critical Race Theory: The Key Writings that Formed the Movement. New Press, New York, pp. 103–26
- Crenshaw K, Gotanda N, Peller G, Thomas K (eds.) 1995 Critical Race Theory: The Key Writings that Formed the Movement. New Press, New York
- Davis F J 1991 Who is Black? One Nation's Definition. Penn St. Press, PA
- Delgado R, Stephanic J (eds.) 1999 Critical Race Theory: The Cutting Edge, 2nd edn. Temple University Press, PA
- Denton N A, Massey D S 1993 American Apartheid: Segregation and the Making of the Underclass. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Ford R T 1995 The boundaries of race. In: Crenshaw K, Gotanda N, Peller G, Thomas K (eds.) 1995 Critical Race Theory: The Key Writings that Formed the Movement. New Press, New York, pp. 449–64
- Ford R T 1999 Law's territory (a history of jurisdiction). Michigan Law Review 97: 843–930
- Freeman A D 1995 Legitimizing racial discrimination through anti-discrimination law: A critical review of supreme court doctrine. In: Crenshaw K, Gotanda N, Peller G, Thomas K (eds.) Critical Race Theory: The Key Writings that Formed the Movement. New Press, New York, pp. 29–45
- Gates H L Jr. (ed.) 1986 Race, Writing and Difference. University of Chicago Press, Chicago

- Gilroy P 1991 There Ain't No Black in the Union Jack: The Cultural Politics of Race and Nation. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
- Goldberg D 1994 Racist Culture. Blackwell, London
- Gotanda N 1995 Our constitution is colorblind. In: Crenshaw K, Gotanda N, Peller G, Thomas K (eds.) Critical Race Theory: The Key Writings that Formed the Movement. New Press, New York, pp. 257–75
- Guinier L 1994 The Tyranny of the Majority: Fundamental Fairness in Representative Democracy. Free Press, New York
- Haney-Lopez I F 1994 White by Law. New York University Press, New York
- Harris A P 1990 Race and essentialism in feminist legal theory. Stanford Law Review 42: 581–616
- Harris C 1995 Whiteness as property. In: Crenshaw K, Gotanda N, Peller G, Thomas K (eds.) Critical Race Theory: The Key Writings that Formed the Movement. The New Press, New York, pp. 276–91
- Kennedy R 1998 Race, Crime and the Law. Vintage Books, New York
- Kymlicka W 2001 Politics in the Vernacular: Nationalism, Multiculturalism, and Citizenship. Oxford University Press, Oxford, UK
- Matsuda M J, Lawrence C R III 1997 We Won't Go Back: Making the Case for Affirmative Action. Houghton Mifflin, Boston
- McClintock A, Nixon R 1991 No names apart: The separation of word and history in Derrida's 'Le dernier mot du racisme.' In: Gates H (ed.) 1986. Race, Writing and Difference. University of Chicago Press, Chicago, pp. 339–53
- Omi M, Wynant H 1994 Racial Formation in the United States: From the 1960s to the 1990s, 2nd edn. Routledge, New York
- Peller G 1995 Race consciousness. In: Crenshaw K, Gotanda N, Peller G, Thomas K (eds.) Critical Race Theory: The Key Writings that Formed the Movement. The New Press, New York, pp. 127–58
- Taylor C 1994 The politics of recognition. In: Gutman A, Taylor C (eds.) Multiculturalism: Examining the Politics of Recognition. Princeton University Press, Princeton
- Thernstrom S, Thernstrom A 1999 America in Black and White: One Nation, Indivisible. Touchstone Books, New York
- Thomas K 1995 Rouge et Noir reread. In: Crenshaw K, Gotanda N, Peller G, Thomas K (eds.) 1995 Critical Race Theory: The Key Writings that Formed the Movement. The New Press, New York, pp. 465–94
- Tushnet M V 1981 The American Law of Slavery, 1810–1860: Considerations of Humanity and Interest. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Tushnet M 1984 An essay on rights. Texas Law Review 62: 1363–403
- Williams P J 1991 The Alchemy of Race and Rights. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Woodward C V 1989 The Strange Career of Jim Crow, 3rd edn. Oxford University Press, New York

R. T. Ford

Race and Urban Planning

In general, the term 'race and urban planning' refers to those aspects of urban planning which affect or are affected by the racial variety of the human condition, as this is expressed in multiracial societies. 'Urban planning,' also known as urban and regional planning, or as town and country planning, depending on the country of practice, helps to develop and enhance various aspects of life in human settlements. These include the location and arrangement of housing, community services, and commercial facilities, or the broader management of land use. The word 'race' typically refers to one of a few broad categories of humanity, such as Caucasian, Asian, or African. Although urban planning should ideally be race-neutral, in fact the racial characteristics of various populations have often affected their receipt of services, their spatial location or lack of spatial mobility, and their interaction with or participation in planning decisions. The lessons learned about how multiracial contexts affect urban planning can often be applied to contexts diversified by some other dimension, such as ethnicity, tribe, religion, or nationality.

1. Background of the Issue

The linkage between urban planning and race arose in several modern multiracial societies because of the obvious ways in which decision makers were using urban planning as a tool for racial oppression. The context in these early cases was one of at least one dominant and one subordinate racial group. For example, in the USA during the early part of the twentieth century, some of the first tools which professional urban planners used to regulate land use helped enforce the segregation of African American households from white households (Silver 1997). In societies characterized by colonialism, professional designers of new cities controlled by European powers made sure that the spatial arrangement of urban settlements sent at least two clear signals. The first, symbolized by grand approaches to isolated government buildings, was that the European colonial government was to be respected and feared. The second was that those sections of the city which housed Europeans were favored with higher standards of municipal services and housing than other sections set aside for 'natives' (Hall 1996).

As multiracial urban societies evolved during the twentieth century, many governments abandoned the purposeful isolation of supposedly subordinate racial groups through such means. Other manifestations of the problem arose, however. In the USA during the 1930s through the 1960s, some localities used programs allied with urban planning and redevelopment to isolate racial minorities, either through constructing racially segregated public housing or through selectively moving people out of and bulldozing minority neighborhoods by using federal 'urban renewal' funds. These activities brought mixed reactions: in only a few cases during the World War II era did civil rights organizations protest the blatantly segregationist public housing decisions, for example, which were some of the first manifestations of racism in modern public policy. Outrage over the abuses of the federal 'urban renewal' program, on the other hand, brought spirited protests. The public outcry over 'urban renewal,' which became nicknamed 'Negro removal,' led to significant reforms in federal policy and in local urban planning activities after the 1960s. Yet racial segregation was so entrenched in US society that it proved difficult to eliminate its many manifestations simply by changing federal and local policy making. Similarly, as colonialism withered and died, former colonies arose to govern and plan their own cities and to eliminate the most pervasive abuses of colonial urban planning. Yet in urban places they found themselves dealing with significant social divisions nonetheless, because of caste, class, ethnicity, and any number of other dimensions. Once set in place, city structure proved hard to change.

Although in most cases the purposeful use of urban planning tools to enforce racial subordination, isolation, and segregation has waned as time has passed, the problem is by no means irrelevant to the present. As we will see in the sections below, subtle exclusion still characterizes seemingly innocuous urban planning decisions in modern countries. One society that has continued, until very recently, to use overt techniques of racial oppression through urban planning is South Africa. Other examples of cities with continuing conflict over related issues include Jerusalem, Israel, and Belfast, Northern Ireland. Yet the nature of the issues has changed markedly as broader societal conditions have changed. In Johannesburg, South Africa, for example, the end of apartheid has brought the end of legally enforced spatial segregation by race, but not the end of racial segregation and uneven development. In such a case, it may be harder to address present conditions and problems with meaningful solutions than it was to operate under the pernicious but forthright apartheid.

2. Areas of Scholarly Inquiry

Contemporary scholars of urban planning have focused on several general areas of connection between race and urban planning. Some scholarly works are connected with other more traditional social science endeavors in that they emphasize the empirical analysis of such phenomena as racial segregation. Other scholars, sometimes using qualitative or holistic methodologies such as history or case studies, document the existence of problems of racial estrangement or oppression in the context of private or public decisions concerning planning and development. Particularly valuable are those discussions which deal with the distribution of power and decision making, when urban planning is being practiced in a context of racial or other inequality.

In addition, several authors focus on specific dimensions of the problems. Certain findings which relate to land use, zoning, housing, and neighborhoods, as well as those related to services such as transportation, or to general urban conditions such as the environment, are now briefly summarized.

2.1 General Connections Between Race and Urban Planning

Several general works about urban history or urban planning history have addressed the use of planning for racial purposes through case studies or 'stories' about injustice or oppression. Such works have found that poor race relations have strongly influenced local development and planning policy as well as federal policies. A typical story in this tradition, for example, might trace the deleterious effects of racial conflict upon local efforts to improve one city, perhaps covering all or part of a period extending from the early twentieth century until the 1990s. Topics covered for a US scholar might include decisions about public housing and urban renewal, effects of civil rebellion or racial disorder upon inner-city redevelopment, housing discrimination, or failed attempts to stabilize neighborhoods in the context of racial change. In more recent years, issues covered might include how racial conflict bars attempts to bridge the gap between cities and suburbs in metropolitan areas, or weakens coalitions which might otherwise unify in order to revitalize neighborhoods or central business districts (Thomas 1997, Catlin 1993).

Other books in this general category document the continued existence of racial segregation, or suggest policy actions designed to lessen the effects of such segregation. More connected with the disciplinary areas of the social sciences than with urban planning, these works have nonetheless continued to have a major influence on thinking about the problems of racial separation and isolation. In some cases, recent works documenting conditions of racial and income segregation and of metropolitan fragmentation have helped heighten the dialogue about how to undertake fundamental society reforms, many of which could profoundly affect the work of urban planners. Examples include possibilities of merging racially segregated municipalities or heightening their cooperation, sharing tax bases, dispersing low-income housing, or in other ways halting or minimizing the effects of society's tendency to disperse and separate in racially exclusionary ways (Rusk 1995, Orfield 1998).

Within this same category of 'general' scholarship concerning urban planning and race also belong those writings connecting issues of race and empowerment, particularly as this concerns participation in making decisions that affect the communities in which racial minorities live. In addition to the extensive literature on urban renewal which deals with this issue, a few additional works have addressed directly the problem of how racial minority communities have tried to wrestle control of their destinies from the hands of city officials. In some cases in the USA, it turns out, such minority communities have had outstanding success in doing so; one case study documents this evolution in Birmingham, Alabama, for example (Connerly and Wilson 1997). In other cases, it was federal programs from the 1960s and 1970s such as the Office of Economic Opportunity or Model Cities that led to increases in power and influence, since these programs required extensive citizen participation by low-income populations in the areas they served.

Sometimes planners in strongly segregated societies have made valiant attempts to overcome historic misuse of planning activities for purposes of subjugation, but have discovered that the issues are not so easily resolved. As apartheid has ended in South Africa, for example, attempts have been made to develop a more egalitarian approach to municipal decision making concerning planning. As a few observers have begun to document, however, the lingering effects of unequal power and unequal resources continue. The 'deracialization' of urban space in Cape Town led to laudable efforts to promote racial mixture in previously segregated neighborhoods. In addition, local planners sponsored public forums which tried to develop an inclusionary model for guiding decisions which would affect the future layout of residential and commercial areas. Yet the 'forum' approach to egalitarian decision making wrongfully assumed that all stakeholders would be included, would participate, and would have equal voice. In a society beset by profound disadvantages for people of color, such assumptions have sometimes proved premature (Watson 1998).

Where the history of racial segregation and oppression is less debilitating than in South Africa, planners in multiracial and multicultural contexts are beginning to make creative strides. Urban planners in several Canadian cities, for example, are being forced to examine the cultural and political biases inherent in a wide range of their activities. They are becoming more attentive to the need to invite participation in decision making by a wide range of racial, ethnic, and national groups, and to listen to these communities when they protest that various regulations hamper their free cultural expression. As a simple example, Chinese communities expect that their 'shopping centers' will meet different functions and have a different scale than would the mainstream population, which has set regulations according to European standards. As another example, many regulations concerning religious facilities assume that the building to be sited will be a church. An immigrant-rich context in which Middle Eastern Muslims are increasing in numbers has required creative flexibility concerning the need for progressive congregational growth. Small Muslim communities often start with meetings in houses which cannot therefore be strictly limited to residential use. These groups may then move to rented stores or other buildings, and then construct mosques with unique architectural features not allowed by regulations designed only for Christian churches (Qadeer 1997).

2.2 Land Use and Zoning

Relevant research in this area documents the fact that land use and zoning decision making in cities, towns, and suburban areas routinely excludes people on the basis of socioeconomic status or race. While in decades past exclusion specifically focused on race, more modern and subtle versions keep people out through informal means, or through socioeconomic exclusion. An example would be zoning ordinances which exclude low-income or multifamily housing from well-to-do suburbs. The general term for such discriminatory action is exclusionary zoning. In metropolitan areas in which low-income racial minorities are isolated and segregated, such action may have much the same effect as would zoning exclusions based on racial characteristics, which are now, in most places, illegal.

A related phenomenon is expulsive zoning. This refers to the practice of using minority neighborhoods as dumping grounds for Locally Unwanted Land Use (known in planning circles by the acronym LULU, or as a NIMBY, which stands for 'Not In My Back Yard'). Examples of such uses are landfills, transfer stations, and inappropriately large concentrations of group homes for people with chemical dependencies. Localities often accomplish unfair concentrations of LULUs by granting inappropriate variances, conditional use permits, or spot zonings in residentially zoned low-income minority neighborhoods. These actions effectively 'expel' residential use and residents from an area and lower the property values of the remaining residences (Rabin 1989).

In many cities, residential minority neighborhoods (often stable living environments for most of their history) are also externally controlled by the fact that, years ago, they were zoned for commercial or industrial use. When in order to maintain stability they attempt to seek a less intense, residential classification, which is known as downzoning, such neighborhoods may be rebuffed because of their history, minority status, or lack of power within the political arena. Zoning also controls aspects of the accessibility and availability of childcare, elder care, and other services needed to maintain neighborhood livability.

In the USA, one drawback to effective action is that the federal Supreme Court, in a long series of cases, has made it clear that socioeconomic exclusion through zoning will not be substantively challenged from the courts. Yet seemingly innocuous opposition to subsidized or low- or moderate-income housing in towns or suburban communities may indeed have enormous racial implications. The failure to grant standing (the ability to be heard as a substantive party in court cases) to several low-income plaintiffs who wished to press for approval of affordable housing in suburban communities has effectively shut off an important route to access to suburban housing for inner-city minorities. Extensive surveys of zoning ordinances show that many local communities discriminate, through seemingly innocuous means, against 'nontraditional' families, such as single female-headed families or extended families which choose to live together to reduce expenses. Such means may include strict zoning definitions of family, barring nonrelated family groupings or extended families from residential areas zoned for single-family housing, or placing limitations on home-based occupations, meaning that low-income residents cannot legally support themselves or supplement their incomes by opening up home businesses (Ritzdorf 1997).

2.3 Housing, Neighborhoods, Mortgage Lending

Yet another area of concern focuses on the effects of continued racial segregation in residential markets, and of discrimination among lending institutions, both of which can have a marked effect on the nature, stability, and viability of urban neighborhoods. To some extent it has been necessary to document the problem, since it has not always been accepted that discrimination among lenders existed, or that segregation in housing was anything but good business practice. The problem of segregation itself is largely the purview of sociologists and geographers, and three particularly influential urban scholars in the contemporary USA are Douglas Massey, Nancy Denton, and William Julius Wilson. They have clearly documented the fact that racial segregation has continued to be a problem in the last half of the twentieth century, and has had profound effects in reducing opportunity, shaping city growth, and crippling several generations of black youth (Wilson 1996, Massey and Denton 1993). Several good works have also documented continuing problems over equitable treatment for racial minorities in obtaining money for buying, rehabilitating, or insuring their homes and their other property (Squires 1997, Yinger 1995).

These issues are particularly important to planners because, with racially skewed housing markets, it becomes very difficult for planners or other local decision makers to trust private housing markets to supplement public investments. Yet no country has sufficient public investment money to reshape urban areas without significant support by the private sector. Neither can planners undertake lasting reforms via neighborhood revitalization if the population is in constant turmoil because of racial change. This is particularly a problem in the USA, which is characterized by extensive decentralization of middle-class populations to racially homogeneous suburbs. When neighborhoods in multiracial societies become identified exclusively with the subordinate class, it becomes very difficult to market them as viable places to live for a wide variety of people. Only in a few cases have US scholars been able to discover means of stabilizing such communities, such as using fair housing initiatives—that is, initiatives designed to promote residential decisions based on the principles of free access for racial minorities—and purposeful efforts to convince home buyers of one race to move to residential neighborhoods populated by another race. Cleveland, Ohio, is one US metropolitan area that has attempted to promote a proactive agenda of this nature. Observers have found, however, that the private housing market will resist policies designed to remedy racial imbalances unless these are supported by home buyers, renters, politicians, realtors, financial institutions, and insurers. Only in a few metropolitan areas have prointegrative efforts by several local organizations and governments resulted in neighborhoods characterized by long-term racial diversity, however (Keating 1994).

The other side of coin is that in some national communities, diversity of neighborhoods is a sign of healthy diversity of cultural choice, rather than of a history of exclusionary discrimination. Again, the example of Canadian cities offers some insight into the implications of such variety for the activities which urban planners undertake (Qadeer 1997). In such cases, the challenges are to remove the last vestiges of policies based on the unconscious assumption that dominant cultural values rule the world, and to begin to allow for a multitude of life-styles and cultural expressions.

A related concept concerns community development, which refers to the purposeful improvement of residential communities using, in part, the participatory involvement of community residents. Given the previous discussions on segregation and on empowerment, it is fitting to note that in some cases isolated minority communities have been able to use tools of urban development and of urban planning to improve their own conditions. Several observers have offered inspiring case studies of successful attempts by African American communities to overcome the handicaps of race and class in order to create viable living spaces (Leavitt and Saegert 1989, McDougall 1993).

2.4 Transportation and Environment

Several other aspects of urban life can also relate to issues of race. Two are briefly mentioned here: transportation and the environment. Examples related to transportation, would be the negative effects of highway construction policies upon the viability of minority neighborhoods, or the problem of lack of accessibility to means of transportation by racial minorities (Bullard and Johnson 1997). This problem is also evident in several historical case studies of African American community life, since federal highway legislation functioned much as redevelopment legislation did in the physical clearance of African American neighborhoods.

A major race-related issue of concern to planners is the disproportionately negative impact that environmental pollutants have upon racial minorities. Reference was made earlier to expulsionary zoning (see Sect. 2.2), indicating some of the problems that can arise. Examples of such problem areas include the siting of regular and hazardous waste landfills in minority neighborhoods, the prevalence of lead poisoning in minority housing, and the consumption by indigenous hunters and fishers of fish and wildlife contaminated by harmful substances. Social scientists have helped to document the extent of the problem, and have joined with civil rights and other groups to examine the racial implications of such cases (Bullard 1994). One of the claims among activists in the USA is that environmental pollution disproportionately affects people of color, and negatively impacts their health and well-being. Another key concern is that the mainstream environmental movement has largely ignored these racial issues. Recent environmental justice initiatives, however, have forced the environmental movement to become more inclusive. Environmental racism is an important phenomenon for urban planners because of their role in helping to determine land uses, including the location of landfills and heavy industry, and the reclamation of environmentally contaminated land for urban redevelopment projects.

3. Responses to Racial Inequality and Injustice

Urban planners and urban planning scholars have reacted in several ways to the continued problems related to the connections between racial injustice and urban planning. Scott Bollens has offered a typology of responses that is useful as a framework for discussion (Bollens 1988).

The first possible response by an urban planner is to side with the status quo in the name of objectivity, even in the face of blatant inequities. The urban planner or urban planning policy is supposedly 'neutral,' but in fact reinforces the dominant race's position. Such a 'neutral' planner may refuse to acknowledge or address issues of segregation, estrangement, or polarization. This approach is sometimes associated with so-called 'technical' planners, who prefer to focus on the technical, non-social aspects of their work without dealing with social problems. The shield, under such circumstances, is that urban planning is a professional exercise not involved with politics or with issues of social justice. This particular attitude is not uncommon among professionals, and may indeed be relatively harmless. It is not so harmless when exemplified by planners in racially conflicted situations, particularly when those planners are members of the dominant race or ethnic group, or support that dominant group to the exclusion of their own.

The claim that the planner is 'color-blind,' in such cases, may be only a poor excuse for collaboration with systematic injustice.

A second set of responses might be called 'partisan.' Under such a situation, racial inequality and injustice are obvious, but the planner rejects the concerns of the powerless group and sides with the powerful one. The city's government leaders view neighborhoods and policies through a lens colored by race, and the interests of the dominant group—to exclude, isolate, and perhaps even oppress the subordinate group—become the norm for professional urban planners. As the political leaders set the policies, the urban planners carry them out, even in the face of blatant favoritism or discrimination. Bollens offers several examples from South Africa, but also notes the same syndrome in Jerusalem, where the systematic and purposeful isolation of Arab neighborhoods has gained the force of righteousness, even though it is, in many cases, patently unjust. As Bollens notes, somehow many local urban planners have been able to function without any noticeable discomfort about the obvious partisanship of their actions.

A third category attempts to reduce inequalities between groups, sometimes through remedial action for the oppressed group. Many US urban planners consider the equity planning movement to be one of their most important responses to the racial crisis in America's cities. According to its advocates, equity planning offers a reasoned and practical response to the crisis of local policy caused by racial segregation and poverty in America's cities. That is, urban planners (and by implication other urban professionals) are not bound by the confines of their municipal jobs to an endless cycle of repression or inattention toward the disadvantaged. Instead, urban planners can and do arise above the limitations of government bureaucracy, and pursue redevelopment and other local policies to channel direct benefits to people hindered by race or socioeconomic status. Several key authors explicitly address the important role of race in helping to create the unjust conditions to which equity planners must respond (Krumholz and Forester 1990).

Finally, Bollens refers to 'a resolver strategy,' which he indicates extends beyond equity planning. A resolver approach attempts to address the root causes of power imbalances, competition among racial and ethnic groups, and disempowerment. It then aims to confront the status quo and profoundly transform the system. Although this approach is in some ways simply a more impassioned form of equity planning, it also has broader implications in countries such as South Africa. There, for example, 'resolvers' have come forward who have begun to carry out development planning that differs markedly from traditional urban planning activities, which favored white areas and white concepts even after apartheid. Development planning, in contrast, more fully integrates spatial planning with social and economic planning than did traditional urban planning; it restructures policy directions by cutting across traditional departments and governments; and, perhaps most importantly, it includes 'a participatory process aimed at empowering the poor and marginalized.' It also happens to involve more members of the victim class as professional planners than was previously the case.

That the urban planning profession maintains an ongoing dialogue about this and other approaches to resolving racial injustice is a healthy sign. Although many societies remain severely fragmented and alienated by race, the situation is open to proactive efforts to improve existing conditions. As larger societies become more comfortable with multi-racialism and with multiculturalism, urban planning as a field can and will adjust.

See also: Community Economic Development; Income Distribution: Demographic Aspects; Neighborhood: General; Neighborhood Revitalization and Community Development; Poverty: Measurement and Analysis; Poverty, Sociology of; Racism, Sociology of; Social Inequality in History (Stratification and Classes); Social Stratification; Urban Geography; Urban Growth Models; Urban Poverty in Neighborhoods; Urban Sociology

Bibliography

- Bollens S 1988 Urban planning amidst ethnic conflict: Jerusalem and Johannesburg. Urban Studies 35: 729–50
- Bullard R (ed.) 1994 Unequal Protection: Environmental Justice and Communities of Color. Sierra Club, San Francisco, CA
- Bullard R, Johnson G (eds.) 1997 Just Transportation: Dismantling Race and Class Barriers to Mobility. New Society Press, Branford, CT
- Catlin R 1993 Racial Politics and Urban Planning: Gary, Indiana 1980–1989. University Press of Kentucky, Lexington, KY
- Connerly C, Wilson B 1997 The roots and origins of African American planning in Birmingham, Alabama. In: Thomas J M, Ritzdorf M (eds.) Urban Planning and the African American Community: In the Shadows. Sage, Thousand Oaks, CA
- Hall P 1996 Cities of Tomorrow: An Intellectual History of Urban Planning and Design in the Twentieth Century, 2nd edn. Blackwell, Oxford, UK
- Keating W D 1994 The Suburban Racial Dilemma: Housing and Neighborhoods. Temple University Press, Philadelphia, PA
- Krumholz N, Forester J 1990 Making Equity Planning Work: Leadership in the Public Sector. Temple University Press, Philadelphia, PA
- Leavitt J, Saegert S 1989 From Abandonment to Hope: Community Households in Harlem. Columbia University Press, New York
- Massey D, Denton N 1993 American Apartheid. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- McDougall H 1993 Black Baltimore: A New Theory of Community. Temple University Press, Philadelphia, PA
- Orfield M 1998 Metropolitics: A Regional Agenda for Community and Stability. Brookings Institution Press, Washington, DC

- Qadeer M A 1997 Pluralistic planning for multicultural cities. Journal of the American Planning Association 63: 481–94
- Rabin Y 1989 Expulsive zoning: the inequitable legacy of Euclid. In: Harr C, Kayden J (eds.) Zoning and the American Dream: Promises Still to Keep. American Planning Association Press, Washington, DC, pp. 101–20
- Ritzdorf M 1977 Locked out of paradise: Contemporary exclusionary zoning, the Supreme Court, and African Americans, 1970 to the present. In: Thomas J M, Ritzdorf M (eds.) Urban Planning and the African American Community: In the Shadows. Sage, Thousand Oaks, CA, pp. 43–57
- Rusk D 1995 Cities Without Suburbs. Woodrow Wilson Press, Washington, DC
- Silver C 1997 The racial origins of zoning in American cities. In: Thomas J M, Ritzdorf M (eds.) Urban Planning and the African American Community: In the Shadows. Sage, Thousand Oaks, CA, pp. 23–42
- Squires G D (ed.) 1997 Insurance Redlining: Disinvestment, Reinvestment, and the Evolving Role of Financial Institutions. Urban Institute Press, Washington, DC
- Thomas J M 1997 Redevelopment and Race: Planning a Finer City in Postwar Detroit. Johns Hopkins University Press, Baltimore, MD
- Thomas J M, Ritzdorf M (eds.) 1997 Urban Planning and the African American Community: In the Shadows. Sage, Thousand Oaks, CA
- Watson V 1998 Planning under political transition—lessons from Cape Town's metropolitan planning forum. International Planning Studies 3: 335–50
- Wilson W J 1996 When Work Disappears. Knopf, New York
- Yinger J 1995 Closed Doors, Opportunities Lost: The Continuing Costs of Housing Discrimination. Russell Sage Foundation, New York

J. M. Thomas

Race: Genetic Aspects

Natural species are genetically polymorphic, in two related, but distinct ways. Different individuals may carry different alleles of the same gene (polymorphism within populations), and different populations may be characterized by different alleles, or by different frequencies of the same alleles (polymorphism among populations). Differences among populations depend on various evolutionary factors, but populations that exchange migrants tend to resemble each other, whereas mutually isolated groups and communities tend to diverge genetically.

The relative importance of polymorphism within and among populations varies across species. In many plant and animal species, the largest share of genetic diversity occurs among populations or groups thereof. When that is the case, most individuals of unknown origin can be assigned to one group on the basis of their genetic characteristics, with a high degree of statistical confidence. If distinct groups occupy different geographical areas, it is customary to define them as subspecies or races. The question is how faithfully this concept also describes the levels and patterns of genetic diversity observed among humans.

One of the latest definitions of race is as follows: 'A large population of individuals who have a significant fraction of their genes in common, and can be distinguished from another race by their common gene pool' (Vogel and Motulsky 1986). But the concept of race is older than genetics. Long before Mendel the term referred to people sharing the same 'blood,' that is, to groups of genealogically-related individuals, especially those of noble families (Furetière 1690, cited in Cohen 1991). In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the term race came to designate constant human types, and came to be used not only to describe, but also to explain, human diversity. People who look different belong to different races, and they are different because they belong to different races. That view is still widespread; it seems based on an empirical observation, and on an assumption. The observation is that biologically related people look alike, and the assumption is that our species is naturally subdivided in clusters of individuals who look alike because they are genealogically related, or races.

Is that assumption based on solid scientific grounds? Or are human races arbitrary groups of populations, which do not share a common evolutionary history more than other populations classified into different races? Only in the second half of the twentieth century has it become possible to address this question using genetic data. For the purposes of this article, the hypothesis being tested is whether the observed patterns of genetic diversity suggest that humankind is subdivided in nearly discrete, and internally homogeneous, groups. The results of those tests, and their evolutionary implications, will be summarized in this article.

1. Listing Human Races

Prior to measuring genetic differences within and among human groups, one has to define these groups. The many lists of races which have appeared in the course of history may be regarded as successive attempts to identify the set of physical traits which leads to the best discrimination of groups, that is, traits for which the among-group component of variation is maximum. Ideally, once such 'best' physical traits are identified, most individuals and populations should be classified unambiguously into the appropriate group, except perhaps for a minority of them, traditionally regarded as derived from interracial crosses.

Table 1 summarizes some lists of human races proposed in the last three centuries. Although this selection is necessarily incomplete (the interested reader is referred to Cohen 1991 and Molnar 1998) a problem, and a trend, are evident. The problem is, any group defined on the basis of morphological traits harbors some degree of internal variation, and different criteria, say skin color and skull shape, lead to different classifications. This is clearly shown by the fact that, although the existence of human races has been challenged only recently (Livingstone 1964), little agreement has evidently been reached on how many races exist, and which. The trend is a consequence of the problem. As more and more groups came in contact with the European scientists who were developing these classifications, the number of proposed races increased steadily.

There is an exception to that trend. In 1963, Coon proposed that there are only five subspecies among humans. In that context, subspecies was synonymous to race, and it was defined as a regional population 'which meets two tests: (1) it occupies a distinct geographical territory; (2) it differs from other subspecies of the same species in measurable characteristics to a considerable degree' (1962, p. 19). Coon's definition overlaps with the one given by Vogel and Motulsky (1986), and both can be tested using genetic data.

2. Apportioning Human Diversity

Because there is no agreement on the best system of human racial classification, the groups or putative races being compared in the studies here reviewed were seldom the same. In general, when the groups con-

Table 1
Some lists of proposed human races

Author	No. of races	Races proposed
Linnaeus (1735)	6	Europaeus, Asiaticus, Afer, Americanus, Ferus, Monstruosus
Buffon (1749)	6	Laplander, Tartar, South Asiatic, European, Ethiopian, American
Blumenbach (1795)	5	Caucasian, Mongolian, Ethiopian, American, Malay
Cuvier (1828)	3	Caucasoid, Negroid, Mongoloid
Deniker (1900)	29
Weinert (1935)	17
Von Eickstedt (1937)	38
Biasutti (1959)	53
Coon (1962)	5	Congoid, Capoid, Caucasoid, Mongoloid, Australoid

Source: Coon 1962, Cohen 1991, and Molnar 1998

Table 2

Percentages of the overall genetic variance at three levels of population subdivision, as estimated from protein (P), RFLP (R), microsatellite (M), or single-nucleotide (S) polymorphisms; G are multilocus genotypes, that is, sets of loci jointly analyzed which, (for mitochondrial DNA and the Y chromosome) are also jointly inherited, as a single locus. Genome location refers to the fact that the loci of interest are autosomal (A), mitochondrial (M), or Y-linked (Y)

Authors	N Loci	Type	Genome location	Within populations	Between populations within groups	Between groups
Lewontin (1972)	17	P	A	85.4	8.3	6.3
Latter (1980)	18	P	A	83.8–87.0	5.5–6.6	7.5–10.4
Ryman et al. (1983)	25	P	A	86.0	2.8	11.2
Barbujani et al. (1997)	79	R	A	84.5	3.9	11.7
Barbujani et al. (1997)	30	M	A	84.5	5.5	10.0
Barbujani et al. (1997)	16	G	A	83.6	8.4	8.0
Barbujani et al. (1997)	109	M + R	A	84.4	4.7	10.8
Seielstad et al. (1998)	n.a.	S	M	81.4	6.1	12.5
Seielstad et al. (1998)	n.a.	S	Y	35.5	11.8	52.7
Santos et al. (1999)	30	S	Y	59.0	25.0	16.0
Poloni et al. (1997)	9	R	Y	70.1	6.9	23.0
Barbujani and Excoffier (1999)	100	R	M	65.5	7.1	27.5
Barbujani and Excoffier (1999)	5	G	M	77.4	7.3	15.3

Note: Latter 1980 gave three sets of values, based on three different statistical approaches. n.a.: not available

sidered are many, the variance among them is inflated. At the same time, on the other hand, as the number of groups increases, the boundaries between them tend to be ill-defined, which may lead to overestimating variation within groups.

The statistical methods used to apportion human diversity vary too, when one considers different studies. Nevertheless, the conceptual framework is the same, and is as follows. Several groups are defined on the basis of independent evidence. Each individual is compared to all other individuals studied, and a number representing the amount of genetic differentiation between them is calculated. Three components of genetic variance are then estimated from those numbers, namely: (a) between individuals of the same population; (b) among populations of the same group; (c) among major groups (see Lewontin 1972, Latter 1980, Barbujani et al. 1997). In this way, the overall genetic diversity is broken down in three hierarchical components.

2.1 Genetic Diversity at the Protein Level

In 1972, Lewontin first quantified the amount of genetic variation within and among major human groups. He chose a seven-race system, comprising Caucasians, Black Africans, Mongoloids, Amerinds, Oceanians (the five groups of Blumenbach's classification; see Table 1), plus South Asian and Australian aborigines. Analysis of 17 independent genetic loci, for which information on all available populations was collected, gave somewhat different results, but the average proportion of the overall variance that fell within populations was 85.4 percent (with a maximum of 99.7 percent for the Xm locus and a minimum of 63.6 percent for the Duffy locus). Additional differences between populations of the same race represented, on average, 8.3 percent of the total, and differences between races accounted for the remaining 6.3 percent of the total. At the protein level, therefore, variation among seven races seems to represent less than one tenth of the overall genetic diversity of our species.

Lewontin's conclusion that the human racial classification has virtually no genetic or taxonomic significance was variously criticised, not always on scientific grounds. One serious objection was that only a fraction of the total DNA is actually translated into proteins. As a consequence, protein polymorphism may not fully reflect the underlying DNA diversity. Although successive studies of proteins confirmed that more than four fifths of the overall genetic diversity of our species is accounted for by differences among members of the same community (Table 2), skepticism remained widespread.

2.2 Genetic Diversity at the DNA Level

The first global study of DNA diversity, based on 109 genetic loci in 16 populations, appeared only 25 years later (Barbujani et al. 1997). The samples were chosen so as to form well-separated groups over the map of the world, whereas geographically intermediate populations were not considered. Therefore, if sampling affected the genetic variances estimated, it did so by increasing the weight of the between-continent components. In addition, this made the samples of each continent fall within one of the racial groups of Blumenbach's classification, without ambiguity. The loci chosen were 30 short-tandem repeats (STR or microsatellite loci, whose alleles differ in length, that is, in the number of nucleotides they comprise), and 79 biallelic DNA polymorphisms (restriction-fragment length polymorphisms, or RFLP). For 16 RFLPs, compound genotypes referring to subsamples of individuals were available, and variance components were also estimated from them. By jointly analyzing many loci in this way, one may hope to identify significant differences better than by separately considering each gene.

The within-population variance component was significantly greater than 0 at all loci, representing between 54.4 percent and 94.6 percent of the total. Approximately one-third of the loci studied showed significant variance also between populations or between continents. Very similar results were obtained in the analysis of single RFLP polymorphisms, of the multilocus RFLP genotypes, and of the STR loci (Table 2).

Three recent papers provided additional data (Table 2) about genes inherited only from one parent. Every couple possesses four potentially transmissible copies of most chromosomes, two maternal and two paternal. But there is only one (paternal) copy of the Y chromosome; and there are several, presumably identical, copies of the mitochondrial DNA, which are only transmitted by the mother. Population genetics theory predicts that genes on these chromosomes should diverge four times as fast as the biparentally-transmitted (or autosomal) genes considered in the previous studies, all other demographic and evolutionary factors being equal. There is no simple model quantifying the effect of such a fast divergence on components of variance, but the differences among populations and continents (jointly estimated around 15 percent for autosomic genes) are expected to represent a substantially larger fraction of the genetic variance estimated from Y-chromosome and mitochondrial data.

Contrary to those expectations, mitochondrial variation appeared distributed much like autosomic variation. Such a lower-than-expected population diversity raises evolutionary problems that will not be discussed here, related with possible effects of natural selection on mitochondrial DNA, or with a high prehistoric female mobility. On the other hand, two analyses of the Y chromosome did show an increased differentiation among continents and populations, but confirmed that the largest component of human diversity is within populations (Poloni et al. 1997, Santos et al. 1999). However, in a third study of the Y chromosome, Seielstad et al. (1998) estimated even higher among-continent variances, exceeding 50 percent of the total. Note that the values estimated by Santos et al. (1999), which are closer to the other figures listed in Table 2, derive from the analysis of a different set of the same genetic markers, single-nucleotide polymorphisms, that is, variable sites in the Y-chromosome sequence. The fact that such large differences have only been found in the male-transmitted portion of the genome, and only for one set of data, is not easy to interpret.

In synthesis, it seems that the within-population component of the overall genetic diversity of our species is close to 85 percent, regardless of the genetic markers and of the populations studied. Despite the limited polymorphism of the protein markers considered, and despite the choice of different sets of populations, Lewontin's results essentially are confirmed at the DNA level, for more than 300 genes analyzed so far. Greater among-continent diversities are estimated, as predicted by theory, on the basis of uniparentally-transmitted genes, and the allelic variants of the Y chromosome are more restricted geographically than the alleles of autosomal and mitochondrial loci. Among the plausible explanations of such a high Y-chromosome diversity are, again, selection differences in the males' and females' pre-historical migration rates, and a high variability of the males' reproductive success (discussed in Hammer et al. 1997). The conclusions of the other studies seem rather coherent, and they can be summarized as follows: if we arbitrarily set to 100 the average genetic difference between two very distant members of our species, the expected difference between members of the same community (who are not relatives, of course) seems to be approximately 85, and not 10 or 40, as previously illustrated definitions of race appear to imply.

3. Are We All Equal, Then?

The fact that genetic differences among major human groups are relatively small does not mean that all humans are genetically identical. In fact, the among-population and among-group components of variance are significantly greater than zero, not only for the Y chromosome, but also at several autosomic loci (Barbujani et al. 1997). That fraction of diversity, albeit small in relative terms, contains all the information that population geneticists use to reconstruct human evolutionary past. From its study, we know that both allele frequencies and DNA sequences vary nonrandomly in space, often forming gradients over entire continents (reviewed by Cavalli-Sforza et al. 1994). We also know that zones of sharp genetic change, or genetic boundaries, exist, and often overlap with various kinds of migrational barriers, both physical (mountain ranges, arms of sea) and cultural (especially language boundaries) (Sokal et al. 1990). However, very seldom do genetic boundaries form complete rings around single populations, or groups thereof. Over much of the planet, continuous variation is the rule, with the genetic characteristics of the various regions changing more or less smoothly in the geographical space. Locating on the map the place at which one racial group ends and another one begins proved, so far, an impossible task. But nearly all populations studied are somewhat different from their neighbors.

4. Comparisons with Other Species

The subspecies concept is widely used in zoology and botany, and the suspicion may be raised that moral and political, rather than scientific, considerations may influence our willingness to use the same concept for humans. Although only a few authors have addressed this problem so far, their results suggest that humans are actually a comparatively uniform species. To cite just one example, the fruit fly Drosophila pseudoobscura shows a 10-fold greater nucleotide diversity than our species (Li and Sadler 1991).

Templeton (1999) compared Barbuji et al.'s (1997) estimates of genetic variances with those referring to 12 large-bodied, highly mobile mammals. Two such species (East African Buffalo and Kenyan Waterbuck) show smaller between-population diversity than humans. However, these are not cosmopolitan species like ours, but dwell in restricted geographical zones. All other species compared, including Elephant, Gazelle, and gray Wolf, show higher, or much higher, differentiation among populations and groups, with values of those variance components reaching 80 percent of the total.

On a smaller taxonomic scale, Ruvolo et al. (1994) compared mitochondrial diversity in the five genera of hominoids, that is, humans and apes. Variation appeared minimal within humans and pygmy Chimpanzees; the latter, once again, occupy a much smaller territory than humans. On the other hand, common Chimpanzee, Orangutan, and especially Gorilla, show much higher genetic differentiation. In particular, the most mitochondrially diverse humans studied appear to be less different than random pairs of lowland gorillas from West Africa.

5. Evolution of Human Genetic Diversity

Understanding human diversity also means to understand how that diversity came about. The low genetic variation among humans, as compared to other species, points to two, not incompatible, evolutionary processes, namely a high dispersal ability leading to limited isolation among populations, and/or a recent origin, too recent indeed for extensive genetic variation to have accumulated ever since.

Various evolutionary scenarios have been proposed to explain the available fossil, archaeological, and genetic evidence on human origins. In Coon's (1962) view, some 700,000 years ago, the population of our ancestor, Homo erectus, was subdivided geographically in five groups. Coon's five subspecies of Homo sapiens would differ because they are descended from those groups, with very little interbreeding, if any. This is no longer considered a valid scientific hypothesis, but the idea that the differences among contemporary humans started accumulating before the appearance of anatomically modern humans is still part of the so-called multiregional theory of human evolution (Wolpoff and Caspari 1997). This theory differs from Coon's in that the major human lineages are here regarded as only partly isolated, with extensive genetic exchange even between distant populations.

The basis of the multiregional theory of human evolution is the observation that certain traits persist in some regions of the earth from H. erectus times through H. sapiens times, and are unique to those regions. However, the statistical significance of that observation has been called into question (Lahr 1996), and it also seems that implausibly high levels of gene flow would be required, for hundreds of millennia, to maintain the unity of our species under a multiregional model (Rouhani 1989). The alternative hypothesis, the so-called out-of-Africa model (Stringer and Andrews 1988), regards the contemporary population as derived from ancestors who lived in Africa until recently. When those people expanded into Eurasia and Australia, perhaps 100,000 years ago, they replaced without admixture previous local populations of Homo erectus and (in Europe) Homo sapiens neanderthalensis.

The multiregional and the out-of-Africa models have several implications. If the main human groups separated before the appearance of anatomically modern Homo sapiens, deep differences are to be expected among them, and quite distinct evolutionary lineages should exist, in agreement with Vogel and Motulsky's (1986) definition of race. On the contrary, if all continental populations derived recently from the same ancestors, even distant human groups should share many alleles, and the differences among groups should be relatively small. The studies reviewed in this article seem to clearly support the latter model, although Templeton (1998) argued that high levels of migration could lead to low variances between continents, even under a multiregional model. Be that as it may, most investigators, including Templeton, agree that the available genetic evidence does not suggest the existence of distinct clusters of humans.

Support to this view also comes from studies which, although not explicitly addressing the issue of racial subdivision, are in evident agreement with a recent African origin of humankind. First, genetic diversity is greater in Africa than in any other continent (Armour et al. 1996, Hammer et al. 1997, Jorde et al. 1997), an observation that a multiregional model can hardly explain. Second, genetic diversity within populations decreases as one moves away from Africa, with near populations showing subsets of African genes, and more distant populations showing smaller subsets of those genes (Tishkoff et al. 1996). Third, Neandertal man is considered a direct ancestor of the Europeans, and only of them, under the multiregional model; but the only Neandertalian DNA sequences obtained so far fall out of the range of current human variation, and bear no special resemblance to the European sequences (Krings et al. 1997). All these findings, and other paleontological data, emphasize the crucial role of Africa in human evolution (Foley 1998), and suggest that, during their dispersal in Eurasia, Australia, and the Americas, human groups spent too little time in isolation to significantly diverge genetically and form separate races.

6. Future Prospects

Several problems remain open. The first one has to do with the exact amount of genetic diversity that can be attributed to the various levels of population subdivision. Figures around 10 percent of the total diversity occurring among continents have been estimated by analyzing samples that were well separated in space, so that no ambiguity existed as for the continent each of them belonged to. However, in nature, populations are not so discretely distributed. May that sampling structure have led to overestimating the among-group component of genetic variance? And may the choice of the DNA markers studied (most of them falling in noncoding regions of the DNA) have affected the variance estimates too, perhaps in the opposite direction?

A second question is whether the apparently continuous distribution of genetic variation also implies that recognizable geographical groups do not exist, as has been argued by Templeton (1998). In fact, as previously mentioned, genetic variances among groups, although quantitatively small, are significantly greater than zero at many loci; this may have a meaning.

Some DNA alleles occur only in one specific population or continent. Individuals of unknown origin who carry those alleles can be assigned with high statistical confidence to the continent they belong to. However, it is not clear yet, and this is a third question, whether also broad human groups can be defined based on the presence of those alleles (rather than on the basis of most loci of the genome, as implied by traditional definitions of race); and it is unclear whether such groups, if any, could be called races. Most studies reviewed in this article do not support the idea that the majority of the members of our species can be put into a specific continental or racial group, on the basis of their genotype. This is a statistically tractable problem, and investigation on it is currently in progress. Good candidate genes for discriminating among groups could be the Y-chromosome single-nucleotide polymorphisms which, as mentioned, vary substantially across continents (Seielstad et al. 1998). However, population groups defined on the basis of Y-chromosome diversity only could hardly be called races. A statement such as 'Human races exist, but only among males' would sound puzzling.

The genes determining morphological traits such as skull and eye shape, hair texture, or skin color, have not been identified yet, and some have argued that, once they will be known, a clearer identification of human groups will be possible. There are three reasons to doubt it, though. First, as shown in Table 1, centuries of studies of the phenotypes determined by those genes have not led to a consensus on the existing human races; whether and how a better knowledge of the underlying genes may clarify this picture is not obvious. Second, groups sharing traits typically used for racial classification, such as Melanesians and Africans, have been shown to be very distant genetically, both at the protein and at the DNA level (Cavalli-Sforza et al. 1994). Third, morphological traits are determined by the interaction between several genes and environmental factors. Theory shows that this polygenic and multifactorial inheritance results in a continuous distributions of traits, that is, the distributions which are less likely to show the sharp discontinuities necessary to discriminate among groups. Probably, morphological variation reflects differential selection by climate (Owens and King 1999), or the effects of sexual selection, both sometimes leading genetically distant groups to resemble each other.

Grouping individuals in rough categories based on morphology may still be useful for some practical purposes. In countries with extensive recent immigration, different groups may have different disease risks. Despite the low among-continent genetic variances discussed so far, associating a different risk to different, sometimes ill defined, groups (e.g., 'Hispanics') may simplify the clinicians' work. Similar problems also exist in forensic science, for DNA-based personal identification; and similar solutions, based on the definition of somewhat arbitrary racial or ethnic groups, have been put forward to reduce the risk of a wrong decision against a suspect (Nichols and Balding 1991). Despite these examples, genetic studies have shown that humans do not neatly fall within few well-distinct racial groups. Any population differs from its neighbors for several genetic features and, with appropriate sample sizes, these differences may achieve statistical significance. But if the existence of at least one significant genetic difference were the criterion for defining races, every village would be occupied by a different race.

In conclusion, newly discovered polymorphisms, especially those of the Y chromosome, and larger sampling efforts, may modify our ideas on the levels and patterns of human genetic diversity. But at present, clear discontinuities among major groups have not been detected, and there is no clear evidence of largely independent evolution of distinct human lineages. In addition, nobody has yet identified sets of genes whose variation is correlated, so that a classification based on one of them will not be contradicted by the classification based on any other of them. Judging from the available genetic information, therefore, Vogel and Motulsky's (1986) definition of race does not seem to plausibly describe the structure of the human population. New definitions may be proposed, and, if so, they will have to stand the comparison with the data. At present, the burden of the proof seems on those who maintain that our species is subdivided into races that can be objectively recognized by studying their genes.

See also: Ethical Issues in the 'New' Genetics; Eugenics as the Basis of Population Policy; Gender, Class, Race, and Ethnicity, Social Construction of; Human Evolutionary Genetics; Human Genome Diversity and its Value; Population Policy: International; Y-chromosomes and Evolution

Bibliography

- Armour J A L, Anttinen T, May C A, Vega E E, Sajantila A, Kidd J R, Kidd K K, Bertranpetit J, Pääbo S, Jeffreys A 1996 Minisatellite diversity supports a recent African origin for modern humans. Nature Genetics 13: 154–60
- Barbujani G, Excoffier L 1999 The history and geography of human genetic diversity. In: Stearns S (ed.) Evolution in Health and Disease. Oxford University Press, Oxford, UK, pp. 27–40
- Barbujani G, Magagni A, Minch E, Cavalli-Sforza L L 1997 An apportionment of human DNA diversity. Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences USA 94: 4516–9
- Cavalli-Sforza L L, Menozzi P, Piazza A 1994 The History and Geography of Human Genes. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Cohen C 1991 Les races humaines en histoire des sciences. In: Hublin J J, Tillier A M (eds.) Aux Origines d'Homo sapiens. Presses Universitaires de France, Paris, pp. 9–47
- Coon C 1962 The Origin of Races. Knopf, New York
- Foley R 1998 The context of human genetic evolution. Genome Research 8: 339–47
- Hammer M F, Spurdle A B, Karafet T, Bonner M R, Wood E T, Novelletto A, Malaspina P, Mitchell R J, Horai S, Jenkins T, Zegura S L 1997 The geographic distribution of human Y chromosome variation. Genetics 145: 787–805
- Krings M, Stone A, Schmitz R W, Krainitzki H, Stoneking M, Pääbo S 1997 Neandertal DNA sequences and the origin of modern humans. Cell 90: 19–30
- Jorde L B, Rogers A R, Bamshad M, Watkins W S, Krakowiak P, Sung S, Kere J, Harpending H 1997 Microsatellite diversity and the demographic history of modern humans. Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences USA 94: 3100–3
- Lahr M M 1996 The Evolution of Human Diversity. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Latter B D H 1980 Genetic differences within and between populations of the major human subgroups. American Naturalist 116: 220–37
- Lewontin C 1972 The apportionment of human diversity. Evolutionary Biology 6: 381–98
- Li W H, Sadler A 1991 Low nucleotide diversity in man. Genetics 129: 513–23

- Livingstone F B 1964 On the nonexistence of human races. In: Montagu A (ed.) The Concept of Race. Free Press, Glencoe, NY, pp. 46–60
- Molnar S 1998 Human Variation. Races, Types, and Ethnic Groups. Prentice Hall, Upper Saddle River, NJ, p. 19
- Nichols R A, Balding D J 1991 Effects of population structure on DNA fingerprint analysis in forensic science. Heredity 66: 297–302
- Owens K, King M C 1999 Genomic views of human history. Science 286: 451–3
- Poloni E S, Semino O, Passarino G, Santachiara-Benerecetti A S, Dupanloup I, Langaney A, Excoffier L 1997 Human genetic affinities for Y-chromosome P49a,f/TaqI haplotypes show strong correspondence with linguistics. American Journal of Human Genetics 61: 1015–35
- Rouhani S 1989 Molecular genetics and the pattern of human evolution: Plausible and implausible models. In: Mellars P, Stringer C B (eds.) The Human Revolution: Behavioural and Biological perspectives on the Origins of Modern Humans. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ, pp. 47–61
- Ruvolo M, Pan D, Zehr S, Goldberg T, Disotell T R, von Dornum M 1994 Gene trees and hominoid phylogeny. Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences USA 91: 8900–4
- Ryman N, Chakraborty R, Nei M 1983 Differences in the relative distribution of human gene diversity between electrophoretic and red and white cell antigen loci. Human Heredity 33: 93–102
- Santos F R, Pandya A, Tyler-Smith C, Pena S D J, Schanfield M, Leonard W R, Osipova L, Crawford M H, Mitchell R J 1999 The Central Siberian origin for native American Y chromosomes. American Journal of Human Genetics 64: 619–28
- Seielstad M T, Minch E, Cavalli-Sforza L L 1998 Genetic evidence for a higher female migration rate in humans. Nature Genetics 20: 278–80
- Sokal R R, Oden N L, Legendre P, Fortin M J, Kim J Y, Thomson B A, Vaudor A, Harding R M, Barbujani G 1990 Genetics and language in European populations. American Naturalist 135: 157–75
- Stringer C B, Andrews P 1988 Genetic and fossil evidence for the origin of modern humans. Science 239: 1263–8
- Templeton A R 1998 Human races: A genetic and evolutionary perspective. American Anthropologist 100: 632–50
- Tishkoff S A, Dietzsch E, Speed W, Pakstis A J, Kidd J R, Cheung K, Bonné-Tamir B, Santachiara-Benerecetti A S, Moral P, Krings M, Pääbo S, Watson E, Risch N, Jenkins T, Kidd K K 1996 Global patterns of linkage disequilibrium at the CD4 locus and modern human origins. Science 271: 1380–7
- Vogel F, Motulsky A G 1986 Human Genetics: Problems and Approaches, 2nd edn. Springer-Verlag, Berlin, p. 534
- Wolpoff M H, Caspari R 1997 Race and Human Evolution. Simon & Schuster, New York

G. Barbujani

Race: History of the Concept

All societies resort to the use of genealogy. The genealogical myth is the first form of historical thought and metaphysical enquiry. The concept of race dominated modes of thought when research into the origins of man developed in scientific terms. From this point of view, the classification of all living beings by the Swedish scientist Karl Linné (1707–78) was a significant event. Man, or homo sapiens, was classified according to species, gender, and class, as were other living beings. From this point onwards, interpretation of the history of humanity was considered in terms of race until the 1930s.

Since the 1930s, most biologists have criticized the notion of race, arguing that, even if phenotypic variations are genetically determined, there is no general classification of human beings according to the category of race. 'The concept of race has lost all its value' (Jacob 1981).

Biologists and social scientists employ the term in different ways. Biologists inquire whether humans are divided into racial categories and whether belonging to a particular race has effects on behavior. Social scientists are less interested in whether the idea of race is well founded or not and instead focus on the social consequences of the fact that man believes that racial groups exist. The main themes of their research are as follows: social relationships which are thought of in terms of race; the consequences of the belief that races exist on social relations and even on political organization as a whole. Although today race no longer has any meaning for biologists, the belief that there is a white race and a black race has had and still continues to have social consequences. Sociologists argue, according to Thomas' theorem, that if men refer to a situation or phenomenon as real, its consequences become real.

1. The Notion of Race Before the Science of the Races

The term race predates the emergence of racial theories claiming to be scientific. From the sixteenth century onwards, the British interpreted their history in these terms. They claimed that their political genius was due to their Saxon blood ties and the superiority of the Germanic race. So, according to them, William the Conqueror was seen to have imposed the Norman yoke upon free Anglo-Saxon peoples. If the parliament had asserted its rights against the Stuart Monarchy during the Glorious Revolution in 1688, then this was because the British were Germanic, in the way that Tacite had described them: free, asserting their liberty by limiting sovereign power (Banton 1977).

Thought in terms of race took up old representations and themes, in the name of science. The stigmatization of blacks already was current during the Antiquity period. According to a sixth-century statement attributed to Jesus: 'the children of Israel are among those people on the same level as Negroes....' The 'Purity of Blood-ties Statutes,' introduced in Spain after the Reconquista and the expulsion of Jews and Muslims in 1492, established social categories based on 'blood' by distinguishing between pure-blooded Old Christians and the New Christians: Jews and Muslims who had converted to Catholicism, yet whose blood still remained 'impure.' A biological defect, unerasable even by baptism, was therefore passed on from generation to generation. This system of stigmatization did not, however, make any claims to scientific truth, which would become the case from the end of the eighteenth century onwards.

Racist thought developed more in English and German-speaking countries in particular. However, although thought in terms of race had less effect in France, the quarrel between two races, or in other words, the myth of two French peoples developed from the sixteenth century onwards. The noble classes claimed that the fact that they were of Germanic blood justified the freedom and privilege they enjoyed, the masses, being made up of descendants of the Gauls who had been defeated by the German invaders. Even Montesquieu, subscribing to this explanation, referred to the 'former Germans' as our fathers, and praised their admirable simplicity and traditions of liberty and independence.

2. The Century of Racial Ideas

Genealogical myth took on a new meaning during the modern period which saw the development of scientific ambition in fields such as physical anthropology and biology (Guillaumin 1972). Feelings and attitudes which had always been expressed towards certain stigmatized groups in the past were now reinterpreted and stamped with the scientifically legitimate trademark. Classic racist thought became fully established from the end of the eighteenth century onwards, as was the classification of living beings, which culminated in erasing the philosophical or religious distinctions between man, gifted with reason, responsibility, and thus liberty and other living beings.

This approach was revived with the development of social Darwinism. For the Darwin theorists, the decisive influence was biological and biology was defined by race. They believed that hostility between different races was natural and that the mixing of races led to the decline of the species concerned. They were obsessed by the need to preserve racial purity, fearing the dangers of intermarriage and its consequences, namely decline (Gobineau 1853). In order to define races, it became common to take measurements of the cranium and the angle of the nose, etc. It was scientifically claimed that blond dolichocephalic races were superior to brown-haired brachycephalic peoples.

Race gradually appeared to be the factor that explained all historical phenomena. According to Robert Knox (1791–1862), 'Human character, individual and national, is traceable solely to the nature of that race to which the individual or nation belongs' (Banton 1977). In France, Gustave Le Bon (1841–1931) wrote in 1894 that 'different races are unable to feel, think and act in the same manner, and subsequently are also unable to understand one another.' The revolutions of 1848, which can be seen as political events, par excellence, were explained by Gobineau in terms of race. The Aryan myth was used by the British in order to legitimise the colonisation of India. Walter Scott explained the conflict between the Scottish and the English by their different 'blood.' The concept of race was also used as an argument for all nationalist demands. These interpretations conformed to the scientism of the times and satisfied the human need for one sole explanation of the diversity and complexity encountered in the social world.

The word racism was first used at the end of the 1930s to refer to the doctrine which claimed that race determined culture. However, the theory predated the emergence of the term itself. This theory can be summarized by the two following claims: first, that human races exist; they are biologically different and therefore will always be unequal, and second, that there is a necessary link between biological characteristics and social behavior. In other words, the biological determines the social. There is an analytical distinction between race and racism. It is possible to argue that different races exist, without recourse to the biological determinism and essentializing ideas which characterize racist thought. Central to racist thought is the notion that races exist but above all that history and human behavior are determined by race. Some thinkers who believed that races did exist still criticized racist ideas. On the other hand, those with anti-Semitic views did not necessarily refer to the 'Jewish race' in justification of their hostility towards Jews. There are also those who do not believe in the existence of races but still conceive of social relations in a deterministic manner by explaining relations between people in terms of their culture, their class, or their gender. Nevertheless, it is equally true that thinking in terms of race has, more often than not, led to racist ideas.

The interpretation of historical events in terms of race has often been linked to the need to justify European domination over the rest of the world (Park and Burgess 1924). This is the case of Marxist thinkers in particular. Cox, for example, claims that race relations first emerged in 1493 when the borders showing the limits of Spanish and Portuguese control in the Americas were first marked out (Cox 1948). Yet the negative representations of black-skinned peoples in relation to whites by far predated the age of European expansionism. The development of racist thought cannot be linked to one sole cause but must be seen as the result of a number of converging factors. What is remarkable is the capacity of deterministic racist thought to renew and reinvent itself throughout the different periods of history.

3. Development of the Social Science Critique

Although the first American sociologists justified slavery, social scientists have, at different stages, criticized the concept of racial determinism. Max Weber clearly denounced racial explanations of historical events. 'That there exists today, only one precise and concrete factor, relevant to Sociology, which clearly and permanently reduces any given sociological category down to innate or hereditary characteristics, whilst claiming that another category cannot ever not possess those same qualities, I categorically deny, and I will continue to deny this until it is proven right before my eyes' (Weber 1974, p. 120).

The work of the Chicago school sociologists (such as Charles S. Johnson, John Dollard, Allison Davies, E. Franklin, and even Gunnar Myrdal whose work was based on the Chicago school's research) marked another stage in the social science critique. Through study of the 'assimilation' of various populations in American society, they replaced the notion of race with that of relations between races or race relations. Race, in the biological sense of the term, was replaced by a social definition: race became a social category which contributed to defining an individual's position in society, according to his origins which were inferred by certain biological characteristics. However, it is clear that this category is only acknowledged if society accepts that 'race' is meaningful. In this way, it was henceforth taken as given by all sociologists that it is racism that creates race, not vice versa.

The rediscovery of the weight of ethnicity by American sociologists in the 1960s led to a redefinition of different groups in terms of 'ethnic groups': an historical definition thus replaced a biological definition. However, these sociologists did not all unanimously agree that Afro-Americans or the native-Americans constituted a group like any other. It was argued that the term 'ethnic group' was perhaps no more than just a euphemism or hypocrisy as it tended to obscure the stigmatization, segregation, and discrimination which Afro-Americans and native-Americans had suffered as a result of their race. Wasn't 'ethnic' anything else than 'racial'? Shouldn't race relations be distinguished from ethnic relations, as individuals could abandon their ethnic group but could not escape their racial group?

The sociologists of race relations continue, however, to use the concept of race as though races do actually exist, and the sociologists of ethnicity as though ethnic groups are static, fixed entities. When, from the 1960s onwards, the term ethnic group took over from race, it continued to imply a certain hereditary link. Furthermore, both terms are closely linked to the American experience, a society made up of immigrants (ethnic groups), autochthonous peoples, and those brought over as slaves (racial groups). Should we not take into account the consequences of the critique of the sociology of race relations and stop claiming that the term race is meaningless, only to then use it continuously, even in the titles of scholarly journals? Is it not possible to reach a new stage by adopting the concept of historical collectivity? If, as Weber had already observed, those who we refer to as Afro-Americans in the United States make up a particular group, this is not due to the color of their skin, but rather because they consider themselves and are considered by others to be the descendants of Africans who were subjected to a certain historical experience, which makes them a particular historical collectivity (Schnapper 1998).

Societies use natural differences and relations as a way to organize relationships between people. This is the case for gender and relationships between parents and children. In the same way, human beings use the physical differences, thought of in terms of race, in order to establish and identify social roles. Sociological thought has progressively criticized the notion of race. The relations between the 'races' are now analyzed as part of the processes of inclusion and exclusion of the different social groups in a more general analysis of social structures and political legitimacy.

See also: Critical Race Theory; Genetics and Mate Choice; Race and the Law; Race Identity

Bibliography

- Banton M P 1977 The Idea of Race. Tavistock, London
 Cox O C 1948 Caste, Class & Race. A Study in social Dynamics. Doubleday, New York
 Gobineau J A 1853 Essai sur l'inégalité des races. Gallimard, La Pléiade, Paris
 Guillaumin C 1972 L'idéologie raciste. Genèse et langage actuel. Mouton, Paris and La Haye
 Jacob A 1981 La science face au racisme. In: Olender M (eds.) Le racisme, Mythes et sciences. Complexe, Brussels
 Park R E, Burgess E W 1924 Introduction to the Science of Sociology. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
 Schnapper D 1998 La Relation à l'autre. Au coeur de la pensée sociologique. Gallimard, Paris
 Weber M 1974 Max Weber et les théories bioraciales du XXème siècle. Cahiers Internationaux de Sociologie 1: 115–26

D. Schnapper

Race Identity

The concept of 'racial identity' has generated many and different bodies of literature that bear directly upon its multiple deployments in the social and behavioral sciences. Given that every individual is universally and simultaneously also part of a larger group, from family to community to language group to (for most of the last three centuries) nation–state, the salient question for the social sciences is: under what conditions do individuals come to think of themselves as 'racial'? The corollary, but by no means symmetrical question is: under what conditions do larger social units, from nation–states to communities, come to see, classify, and identify the individual as 'racial'?

1. Racial Identity and Individual Identity

There is a vast literature on the psychology of personal identity that provides a particular angle for approach to the topic. Identity formation as a developmental process through adolescence is one significant track, and a subset of this work is early-stage racial identity formation. This research can be traced back more than a half-century to the studies of the preferences of preschool children for white or black dolls (Clark and Clark 1947). A parallel track of scholarship emphasizes the power of 'group identity' to shape behavior through the imposition of cultural and national identities (Burman and Harrell Bond 1979, Shibutani and Kwan 1969). From political mobilization to choice of a marital partner, each of these renderings of racial identity has substantially penetrated the disciplines of sociology, political science, anthropology, and social psychology. In the USA, the courts became the site of the connection between the vastly different worlds of research on racial identity formation and social and political institutions. The Supreme Court's 1954 decision on school desegregation was based partly upon research claiming that lowered self esteem of the subordinated group was 'inherently a function of racial segregation' (Brown vs. Board of Education), and explicitly referred to the doll studies noted above. This generated a research trajectory involving studies on individual responses to racial identification that would extend through the remainder of the twentieth century (Montalvo 1999).

While the concept of individual identity has no clearly locatable beginning, it has been traced, in the West, to 'the discovery of the individual' (Morris 1972, Doi 1985). Individuals typically identified with their families, then perhaps with the local village or community (Linton 1955). As communities grew and members became mobile, region, language group, religion, and the nation-state would each claim some measure of allegiance via identity. Multiplicity of identities for a single individual can also be understood in terms of the simultaneity of those identities. That is, a single individual can sense and affirm a complex set of identities, being simultaneously a grandfather and being Jewish, being French and being working-class, being an alcoholic and a chess player. No single identity need claim any essentialist primacy nor be privileged as 'fundamental' across time, space, and culture. The social context frames which identity will be called up and acted upon, or be the reference point of further action for the individual.

The mobilization of constituencies around a perceived collective interest is the essence of political and social movements, and in this sense all political mobilization is 'identity politics.' In a work that would set the frame for later research on racial identity and political consciousness, E. P. Thompson's (1963) monumental social history of the 'making of the English working class' detailed how class identity is forged from a particular set of economic and social circumstances. In a different and parallel kind of scholarship, other researchers have sought to explain the emergence of a racial identity. For example, the US civil rights movement (1956–72) produced a number of scholarly analyses that demonstrated how different sets of circumstances explain the emergence and sustenance of racial identity (Hampton and Fayer 1990, Bloom 1987, Morris 1984). However, the most direct descendant of Thompson's (1963) demonstration of the historical specificity of political mobilization around identity, relevant to race, is David Roediger's The Wages of Whiteness: Race and the Making of the American Working Class (1991). Roediger mines the archives of the US labor movement of the nineteenth century to provide rich historical material showing how the racial identity of whites in general, and the Irish in particular, were formed in relationship to the enslavement of blacks.

2. Politics and Identity Politics

Thus racial identity was generated by massive historical, economic, and political forces that far transcend the level of individual choice (Banton 1977, Miles 1989). Indeed, there is a substantial body of research indicating that in the nineteenth century European and US academics expended much energy trying to demonstrate the intellectual and moral superiority of whites (Gould 1981, Bernal 1987). The biological and medical sciences of the late nineteenth century assumed a Darwinian model of racial hierarchy of adaptation to civilization (Frazer 1900). Thus, in order to counter the assertion of white superiority, from Europe to South Africa to the North American continent to Australia, groups that wished to mobilize to change their position in a racial hierarchy often found that racial identity was a useful and powerful basis for achieving group solidarity (Kelley 1997, Fredrickson 1995, Crenshaw et al. 1995). Obviously, these groups would encounter competing group identities, such as tribal, regional, ethnic, linguistic, and class. This list would permit the white colonialists the advantage of playing one off against the other, and the strategic use of ethnic identity to trump 'race' could be deployed. For an elaboration of the distinction between race and ethnicity, see Fenton (1999).

If we take even a casual excursion through the last few centuries of racial classification, there is overwhelming evidence on the side of those who have argued that race is arbitrary, shifting, and often biologically and sociologically inconsistent and contradictory. A consortium of leading scientists across the disciplines from biology to physical anthropology issued a 'Revised UNESCO Statement on Race' in 1995—a definitive declaration that summarizes 11 central issues, and concludes that in terms of 'scientific' discourse, there is no such thing as a 'race' that has any scientific utility: '... the same scientific groups that developed the biological concept over the last century have now concluded that its use for characterizing human populations is so flawed that it is no longer a scientifically valid concept. In fact, the statement makes clear that the biological concept of race as applied to humans has no legitimate place in biological science' (Katz 1995, pp. 4, 5).

The rule that one drop of black blood makes one black is the easy mark along a full continuum of contradictory and incoherent taxonomies. 'Passing' and 'miscegenation laws' and slaveowner/slave offspring do more than simply dot the landscape of this topic (Harris 1995, Haney-López 1996). This continuum extends well into the present period where we find more and more people asserting a mixed-race identity. Since the classification of race is arbitrary and often whimsical (e.g., one drop of blood), accepting the idea that race is something identifiable with fixed borders that could be crossed and thus 'mixed' is just another indication of the power of social forces shaping racial identity. At the biochemical level of blood types and hematology, at the neurological level of neurotransmission patterns, at the level of cell function—at all these levels, we are all 'mixed' by any taxonomy or measure of allele frequencies in large population groups (Molnar 1992).

Yet a number of scholars of race have noted the increasing use of the category of 'mixed race' as the self-identity of a younger generation, mainly of relatively privileged and middle-class persons. Paul Spickard (1989) and Werner Sollers (1997) have each produced important studies of 'mixed race' identities that cross boundaries of Europe and the Americas. Maria Root (1996) has culled a collection of essays that deal with identity construction along ethnic and racial lines, and further explores these issues well beyond the black and white focus that has riveted much of this literature. The difference between 'individual choice' of a racial identity as opposed to having a racial identity 'imposed' by the state and/or the obdurate empirical reality of a group consensus (based primarily upon phenotype-stereotype) is profound, yet variable over time and place. There are concrete economic, political, social, and sometimes psychological benefits to choosing certain identities. That is why scores of thousands of light-skinned 'blacks' under slavery in Brazil, Jamaica, and the USA chose to 'pass' as white (Small 1994). For parallel reasons, thousands of persons in the USA have attempted to reclassify themselves as Native American or Latino or African American to benefit from affirmative action laws.

For an extensive theoretical treatment of the way in which racial taxonomies shift over time, see Omi and Winant (1986). In addition, for specific cases of this phenomenon, see Harris (1995), Haney-López (1996) and Takaki (1998). From the other side, namely, individuals who come to collectively redefine their own situation, and thereby reveal how 'race' is sometimes in flux due as much to agency, interpretation, and circumstance, see Blumer (1958), Lal (1990), and Perry (1998). For an 'interest-driven' version of the collective will to create, sustain, or maintain a particular racial identity, see Lipsitz (1998) and Wellman (1993).

3. White Identity

In recent years, the concept of white racial identity has come under increasing focus as a basis for a research agenda. Blumer's (1958) classic article reframed race as a structural relationship between competing group interests. This position was adopted and developed by an early entry into this field, David Wellman's Portraits of White Racism (1993). Roediger (1991, 1994), Frankenberg (1993), Allen (1994), Jacobson (1998), Lipsitz (1998), and Perry (1998) have each examined the ways in which white privilege is embedded in a faceless and taken-for-granted normalness of white identity. Twine and Warren (2000) have assembled an anthology in which they bring to greater consciousness the ways in which researchers in racially stratified societies ignore at their peril the subject world of race as an integral feature of methodology, largely through the racial identity of subjects and researchers.

4. Which Identity Gets Triggered?

Given that there are multiple and simultaneous identities, the task for the social analyst is to try to understand the social circumstances in which a particular set of identities gets 'triggered' or brought to the fore. That is, rather than arguing for the primacy or 'essentialist' character of an identity, the analytic task is to understand why identity A, B, or C emerges as primary. War between nation-states is an especially propitious time for a 'national identity' to be forged, or come to the fore. Thus, it may be heuristically useful to think of a series of latent multiple identities that get turned on or off based upon social and political circumstances—and determine 'which button gets pushed.' In wartime, the national identity button gets pushed frequently, and lights up. In courtship, the gender button is pushed, and so forth. In these terms, the empirical question of when and why the 'racial identity' is triggered is no less compelling when posed as a theoretical question.

We can expect the next period to generate many more investigations of racial identities deployed as one among multiple identities—moving away from static conceptions of fixed boundaries of racial identity, with richer explorations of its contingent and sometimes fluid character. An example of this kind of work at the vanguard would be Gloria Anzaldúa's (1987) Borderlands/La Frontera: The New Mestiza and George Lipsitz' (1991) Collective Memory and American Popular Culture. These authors identify 'border identities,' which are emergent identities crafted and recrafted continually by movements across different borders. As the new millennium witnesses the increasing thousands and even millions of border crossings (and recrossings) with the movement of capital and labor, studies of 'borderland identities' around issues of race and ethnicity will come to play a significant role in this field of inquiry.

See also: Civil Rights Movement, The; Identity: Social; Integration: Social; Racial Relations; Residential Segregation: Sociological Aspects

Bibliography

- Allen T 1994 The Invention of the White Race. Verso, New York
- Anzaldúa G 1987 Borderlands/La Frontera: The New Mestiza. Spinsters/Aunte Lute Press, San Francisco
- Banton M 1977 The Idea of Race. Tavistock, London
- Bernal M 1987 Black Athena: The Afroasiatic Roots of Classical Civilization. Rutgers University Press, New Brunswick, NJ
- Bloom J M 1987 Class, Race, and the Civil Rights Movement. Indiana University Press, Bloomington, IN
- Blumer H 1958 Race prejudice as a sense of group position. Pacific Sociological Review 1(Spring): 3–6
- Burman S B, Harrell-Bond B E 1979 The Imposition of Law. Academic Press, New York
- Clark K B, Clark M P 1947 Racial identification and preference in Negro children. In: Newcomb T M, Hartley E (eds.) Readings in Social Psychology. Henry Holt, New York, 602–11
- Crenshaw K, Gotanda N, Peller G, Thomas K 1995 Critical Race Theory. The Free Press, New York. pp. 609–611
- Doi T 1985 The Anatomy of Self: The Individual versus Society. Kodansha International, Tokyo
- Fenton S 1999 Ethnicity: Racism, Class and Culture. Rowman & Littlefield, London
- Frankenberg R 1993 White Women, Race Matters: The Social Construction of Whiteness. University of Minnesota Press, Minneapolis, MN
- Frazer J 1900 The Golden Bough: A Study in Magic and Religion, 2nd edn. Macmillan, New York
- Fredrickson G M 1995 Black Liberation: A Comparative History of Black Ideologies in the United States and South Africa. Oxford University Press, New York
- Gould S J 1981 The Mismeasure of Man. W. W. Norton, New York

- Hall S 1991 Ethnicity: Identity and difference. Radical America 23(4): 9–19
- Hampton H, Fayer S (eds.) 1990 Voices of Freedom: An Oral History of the Civil Rights Movement from the 1950s Through the 1980s. Bantam Books, New York
- Haney-López I 1996 White By Law: The Legal Construction of Race. New York University Press, New York
- Harris C I 1995 Whiteness as property. In: Crenshaw K, Gotanda N, Peller G, Thomas K 1995 (eds.) Critical Race Theory. The Free Press, New York, pp. 276–91
- Ifekwunigwe J O 1999 Scattered Belongings. Cultural Paradoxes of 'Race,' Nation and Gender. Routledge, New York
- Jacobson M F 1998 Whiteness of a Different Color: European Immigrants and the Alchemy of Race. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Jordan W D 1968 White Over Black, White Over Black: American Attitudes Toward the Negro, 1550–1912. University of North Carolina Press, Chapel Hill, NC
- Katz S H 1995 Is race a legitimate concept for science? The AAPA Revised Statement on Race: A Brief Analysis and Commentary. University of Pennsylvania, February
- Kelley R D G 1997 Identity politics and class struggle. New Politics VI(2): 84–97
- Lal B B 1990 The Romance of Culture in an Urban Civilization: Robert E. Park on Race and Ethnic Relations in Cities. Routledge, New York
- Linton R 1955 The Tree of Culture. Alfred A. Knopf, New York
- Lipsitz G 1991 Time Passages: Collective Memory and American Popular Culture. University of Minnesota Press, Minneapolis, MN
- Lipsitz G 1998 The Possessive Investment in Whiteness: How White People Profit from Identity Politics. Temple University Press, Philadelphia, PA
- Miles R 1989 Racism. Routledge, London
- Molnar S 1992 Human Variation: Races, Types, and Ethnic Groups, 3rd edn. Prentice Hall, Englewood Cliffs, NJ
- Montalvo F F 1999 The critical incident interview and ethno-racial identity. Journal of Multicultural Social Work 7: 1–43
- Morris A D 1984 The Origins of The Civil Rights Movement: Black Communities Organizing for Change. Free Press, Collier Macmillan, New York
- Morris C 1972 The Discovery of the Individual, 1050–1200. Harper & Row, New York
- Omi M, Winant H 1986 Racial Formation in the United States: From the 1960s to the 1980s. Routledge & Kegan Paul, New York
- Perry P 1998 Beginning to see the white. Unpublished PhD thesis, University of California, Berkeley
- Roediger D R 1991 The Wages of Whiteness, Race and the Making of the American Working Class. Verso, New York
- Roediger D R 1994 Towards the Abolition of Whiteness: Essays on Race, Politics, and Working Class. Verso, New York
- Root M P P 1996 The Multiracial Experience: Racial Borders as the New Frontier. Sage, Thousand Oaks, CA
- Shibutani T, Kwan K W 1969 Ethnic Stratification: A Comparative Approach. Macmillan, London
- Small S 1994 Racialised Barriers: The Black Experience in England and the United States in the 1980s. Routledge, New York
- Smedley A 1993 Race in North America: Origin and Evolution of a Worldview. Westview Press, Boulder, CO
- Sollers W 1997 Neither Black Nor White, Yet Both: Thematic Explorations of Interracial Literature. Oxford University Press, New York

- Spickard P 1989 Mixed Blood: Intermarriage and Ethnic Identity in Twentieth-century America. University of Wisconsin Press, Madison, WI
- Takaki R T 1998 Strangers From a Different Shore: A History of Asian Americans. Little Brown, Boston
- Thompson E P 1963 The Making of the English Working Class. Vintage Books, New York
- Twine F W, Warren J (eds.) 2000 Racing Research, Researching Race. New York University Press, New York
- Wellman D T 1993 Portraits of White Racism, 2nd edn. Cambridge University Press, New York

T. Duster

Race Relations in the United States, Politics of

The problem of race has been very badly handled in political science. Except for Marxists who see racism and capitalism as intertwined, postmodern skeptics, and those like V. O. Key Jr., who studied the South, democratic theorists have not systematically addressed the racial factor in American politics (McClain and Garcia 1993, Dawson and Wilson 1991). Yet although the problems of racism, racial discrimination, and inequality have scarcely been resolved, many scholars of this current post-civil rights period have continued to ignore the profound and dynamic relationship between race and American politics. A large part of their failure to address the problem of race in America stems from the pervasiveness of a 'gradualist' liberal bias that views the race problem as ultimately resolving itself through integration and assimilation of racial minorities as well as through the disappearance of White racism. From Myrdal (1944) to Thernstrom and Thernstrom (1997), widely disseminated and important treatments of race relations in the USA remain rooted in this gradualist bias. Some scholars, however, recognize that race and ethnicity remain central features of a rational and modernizing society, and have begun to explore the political foundations of racial conflict and racism. The latest research is expanding the question of race to include a focus on groups other than the politics of American Blacks and Whites.

1. Black Politics

The dominant theories put forth by leading American democratic theorists following World War II obviously excluded African-Americans in broadly characterizing the American political process as one at its core, where no one group is excluded and all, although hardly equals, can be heard. Even after such theories were later revised to portray the inclusion of Blacks as an inevitability, because as Robert Dahl explained, 'democratic cultures have considerable capacity for correcting their own failures' (1989, p. 180), what politics would look like after their inclusion was poorly foreshadowed and misunderstood by such scholars. Democratic theorists like Dahl (1961) and David Truman (1971) generally assumed that the political incorporation of Blacks would 'normalize' American politics, with all the various groups and subgroupings able to engage in pressure politics. Browning et al. (1984) in an important book, would argue that eventually minorities were integrated and empowered in the American pluralist system (Eisenger 1982, Sigelman and Welch 1982, Sonenshein 1993). These same authors and others, would later critically re-evaluate their claim of 'empowerment' for American minorities (Hero 1992, Browning et al. 1991). But others scholars, including Adolph Reed Jr. (1988) would seriously question whether the pluralist model could ever be refashioned to fit American Blacks, since to do so would be to ignore the 'racial element' in American politics (see also Holden 1973, Jones 1972, McLemore 1972, Morris 1975, Pinderhughes 1987).

Given its exclusion in the discipline, research on the politics of Blacks would constitute a separate inquiry, apart from the mainstream (McClain and Garcia 1993). Research on Black politics would not only establish the continuing significance of race in American politics (Carmichael and Hamilton 1967, Jones 1972), but also the fact that politics as practiced, encompasses many more activities than recognized by mainstream scholars. Social movement scholars established how protest is not unlike electoral politics (McAdam 1982, Morris 1984) and the continuity between the two in the postcivil rights era (Holden 1973, Smith 1981, Tate 1993, Walton 1973). Jesse Jackson's 1984 and 1988 presidential bids clearly reflected the continuity (Marable 1985, 1990). Religion and social context, important to the emergence of the civil right movement, remain central to Black electoral politics (Cohen and Dawson 1993, Harris 1994). The racial identities of Blacks, a factor in the movement, continues to play a critical role in their political participation and attitudes today (Dawson 1994, Miller et al. 1981, Tate 1993, Shingles 1981, Verba and Nie 1972).

Nevertheless, William J. Wilson's (1981) controversial thesis that race is receding in importance relative to class in the Black community, lay the seeds for a new controversy in Black politics over the degree to which race matters. Carol M. Swain's (1993) award-winning book would question the relevance of race in the political representation of Blacks; others would contest it (Cannon 1999, Whitby 1997) or offer qualifications of it (Lublin 1996). While this debate continues, the study of the politics of Blacks which was generally the only way political scientists addressed the question of race has actually reshaped the contours and direction of mainstream work in political science. New attention is now paid to the nonelectoral antecedents of politics (e.g., Verba et al. 1995) and on the relationship between the institution and political behavior (e.g., Rosenstone and Hansen 1993) as others insisted was critical in the study of Black politics (e.g., Barker et al. 1998, Walton 1985).

2. The Debate over Racial Prejudice

Although the bulk of political science has ignored race, there exists nevertheless a voluminous literature devoted to the empirical study of how racial attitudes influence the policy attitudes of Americans. Nearly all of this empirical work has focused on Whites, although some scholars have addressed the racial and policy attitudes of Blacks (Hochschild 1995, Sigelman and Welch 1991). Broadly, two lines of argument have emerged in the study of White racial attitudes. Those on one side of the debate argue that racial prejudice remains the fundamental factor behind Whites' opposition to racial policies such as busing school children to achieve racially balanced public schools, and affirmative action. White racism has not disappeared, as Whites' responses to the general principle of racial equality items imply. For some scholars, education has merely given more White Americans the ability to appear more racially tolerant than they really are (Jackman and Muha 1984). Rather, racial intolerance along with fundamental American values about the work ethic and individualism blended together, explains the negative attitudes that Whites have toward government efforts to eradicate racial inequality (Kinder 1986, Kinder and Sanders 1996, Kinder and Sears 1981, McConahay 1986, McConahay and Hough 1976, Sears 1988, Sears et al. 2000). Using their defense of traditional values as a cover for their resentment and fears of Blacks, Whites strongly object to policies that would change the racial status quo.

Those on the other side of the debate have sought to account for White opposition to racial policies differently, choosing to focus on factors other than racial prejudice, and not only because they provide a more flattering portrayal of White Americans. For those seeking alternative explanations, ideology and moralistic values and beliefs are posited to be the major reasons underlying White opposition to racial implementation policies. Politically conservative Whites object to such policies because of their dislike of 'big government.' Kuklinski and Parent 1981, Margolis and Hague 1981, Sniderman et al. 1984, 1991). In addition, these scholars point to the 'natural contradiction' between the White majority's commitment to individual rights and freedoms, its preference for a limited government, and support for new government programs that would favor Blacks (Carmines and Merriman 1993, Sniderman and Hagen 1985). Programs that are designed to promote racially equal results at once contradict the very values, including color-blindness, that most Whites now espouse (Sniderman and Piazza 1993).

Along these lines, other scholars have sought to link White racial attitudes to their beliefs about the causes of racial inequality and racial stratification. Several scholars have shown that Whites will not support programs that assist Blacks if they believe the system to be fair and that Blacks themselves are not working hard enough to get ahead (Kluegel and Smith 1986, 1986, Sniderman and Hagen 1985). While civil rights organizations have asserted that Blacks are denied equal opportunities to Whites to get ahead, most White Americans express full faith in the abundance of opportunity in American society. Their faith contrasts greatly with that of Blacks (Kluegel and Bobo 1993, Kluegel and Smith 1986, pp. 67–68, Sigelman and Welch 1991). In the 1990 General Social Survey, 72 percent of Blacks, but only 37 percent of Whites, thought that racial discrimination was a main factor in the unequal outcomes for Blacks in jobs, income, and housing. Given that most Whites believe that Blacks currently have equal opportunities to Whites and that the economic system works well, most oppose programs that demand equality of outcomes.

As one of the more radical theoretical shifts, the meaning of racial prejudice has changed (see Sniderman et al. 1993, for a similar discussion). Once considered to be an archaic, irrational need located deep in a person's heart to scapegoat others, research has consistently favored another view, that racial bias is ubiquitous, forming naturally in a person's mind through social group interactions (Nisbett and Ross 1980). The new definition of prejudice as an instinctive and widespread phenomenon can be interpreted in two ways. On the one hand, the very ubiquitousness of racial stereotypes undermines their relevance in the study of White racial attitudes. Because stereotypes are so widespread, Whites' opposition to racial policies must more critically depend on other factors, such as politics, ideologies, and the framing of the issue. On the other hand, the ubiquitous nature of racial stereotypes exposes its foundation in the social stratification system or a racial hierarchy and in history. Scholars working in sociology and social psychology argue that racism, new or old, persists because it justifies and extends one group's domination over another (Sidanius and Pratto 1993, Sidanius et al. 1996).

3. The New Institutionalism in Racial Politics

There is a new and different approach to the study of race and politics that I classify under the heading of the 'new institutionalism in racial politics.' The core thesis is that politics is as much an underlying cause of America's racial cleavages as it gives expression to such cleavages. Although consistent with a growing branch of political science that argues that institutions structure political behavior, not only political outcomes (March and Olsen 1984), to argue that politics is structurally implicated in America's racial divisions still represents an important break from the intellectual tradition in political science.

American federalism was a pragmatic response to the contentious issue of slavery, but greatly prolonged the institution of slavery and the subjugation of American Blacks. States would use their constitutional powers to deny citizenship to Mexicans and Asian immigrants, as well as deny Blacks their new right to vote under the Fourteenth Amendment. An entire subfield exists that examines the ways that electoral arrangements and practices negate the Black vote (e.g., Davidson and Grofman 1994, Grofman et al., 1992, Kousser, 1999).

New research on racial politics and voting has continued to identify factors other than the racial attitudes of Whites in their rejection of Black candidates and their defection from the Democratic party (see Giles and Buckner 1993, Giles and Evans 1986, Giles and Hertz 1994, Glaser 1994, Huckfeldt and Kohfeldt 1989, Reeves 1997). Racial prejudice is not deemed unimportant or irrelevant in these new studies, but the racial behavior of Whites is conceptualized as more situational-based than attitudinally-based. Candidates, political parties, and the media can make race the focal point of the election generally, but not always, to the detriment of the Black candidate (Lublin and Tate 1995, Metz and Tate 1995, Reeves 1997).

Finally, while sociologists and social psychologists contend that racial categories are socially constructed, some political scientists (Smith 1997) have begun to show how in the USA racial identities have been politically constructed through US laws covering immigration, state laws that defined race, the US census, and affirmative action guidelines along with legal and political discourse. Comparative race studies have emerged, underscoring the role that state policies play in defining race (Gilroy 1991, Marx 1998).

4. Beyond Black and White

Finally, most of the research on racial prejudice and racial politics has been conceptualized and tested on Whites and Blacks. Researchers have begun to recognize that even race relations defined as narrowly as Black–White relations is critically related to status and politics of other American minorities as well, notably America's fastest-growing groups, Asian-Americans and Latinos (Bedolla 2000, Cain et al. 1991, De la Garza et al. 1992, DeSipio 1996, Espiritu 1992, Garcia 1997, Hardy-Fanta 1993, Hero 1992, Jennings 1994, Jennings and Rivera 1984, Saito 1998, Uhlaner et al. 1989, Wrinkle et al. 1996). Whether these groups suffer discrimination on the basis of their nationality, and the degree to which national origin affects their politics is often the unstated subtext of in these body in work (but see Kim, 2000). In response to recent highly publicized conflicts between Blacks, Latinos, and Koreans in cities such as Los Angeles and New York, much of this work addresses interminority conflict (Abelmann and Lie 1995, Kim, in press, McClain 1993, McClain and Karnig 1990) Finally, new work has explored not just interracial or interethnic politics, but intraminority group politics. The limits of treating African American and Latino politics in 'gender-and-sex neutral' terms, for example, have been exposed in Cathy Cohen's (1999) study of politics of AIDS in the Black community and Carol Hardy-Fanta's (1993) work on community organizing among Latinos. Moving beyond the Black-White dichotomy is critical for reaching a better understanding of not only the politics of the neglected 'other' minorities, but for Black politics and US politics more broadly.

While research on race exists and grows, it still remains a neglected focus in political science. The 1990s scholarship I have presented clearly establishes that race does not lie on a progressive-regressive continuum as the gradualist assumption posits. This idea that we are headed in the direction of a color-blind society remains extremely popular to scientists and nonscientists alike. Nevertheless, ample social science research in social and cognitive psychology shows that people routinely discriminate, that racial stereotypes persist (Nisbett and Ross 1980). Race therefore remains a dynamic feature of American politics, whose complexities we have only just begun to understand and appreciate. At best, one can talk about minimizing its significance. It is vital that we understand how politics is implicated in the persistence of racial divisions if we are to have a true democracy organized in a way that is truly inclusive, working for the common good of us all, not just for those at the top of the racial order. To do this, political scientists must pay greater and careful attention to the problem of race than they have in the past.

See also: Civil Rights Movement, The; Ethnic and Racial Social Movements; Ethnic Conflict, Geography of; Ethnic Conflicts; Ethnic Conflicts and Ancient Hatreds: Cultural Concerns; Political Protest and Civil Disobedience; Race Identity; Racial Relations; Racism, History of; Racism, Sociology of; Residential Segregation: Geographic Aspects; Residential Segregation: Sociological Aspects; Urban Politics: United States; Urban Poverty in Neighborhoods

Bibliography

Abelmann N, Lie J 1955 Blue Dreams: Korean Americans and the Los Angeles Riots. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA

- Barker L J, Jones M H, Tate K 1998 African Americans and the American Political System, 4th edn. Prentice Hall, Englewood Cliffs, NJ
- Bedolla L G 2000 They and we: Identity, gender, and politics among Latino youth in Los Angeles. Social Science Quarterly 81: 106-22
- Bobo L 1983 Whites' opposition to busing: Symbolic racism or realistic group conflict? Journal of Personality and Social Psychology 45: 1196-210
- Bobo L 1986 Group conflict, prejudice, and the paradox of contemporary racial attitudes. In: Katz P A, Taylor D A (eds.) Eliminating Racism: Means and Controversies. Plenum Press, New York
- Browning R P, Marshall D R, Tabb D H 1984 Protest is Not Enough. University of California Press, Los Angeles and Berkeley
- Browning R P, Marshall D R, Tabb D H (eds.) 1991 Racial Politics in American Cities, 2nd edn. Longman, New York
- Cain B E, Kiewiet D R, Uhlaner C J 1991 The acquisition of partisanship by Latinos and Asian Americans. American Journal of Political Science 35: 390-442
- Cannon D T 1999 Race, Redistricting, and Representation. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
- Carmichael S, Hamilton C V 1967 Black Power. Vintage Press, New York
- Carmines E G, Merriman W R Jr. 1993 The changing American dilemma: Liberal values and racial policies. In: Sniderman P M, Tetlock P E, Carmines G E (eds.) Prejudice, Politics, and the American Dilemma. Stanford University Press, Stanford, CA, pp. 237-55
- Cohen C J 1999 The Boundaries of Blackness: AIDS and the Breakdown of Black Politics. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
- Cohen C J, Dawson M C 1993 Neighborhood poverty and African-American politics. American Political Science Review 87: 286-302
- Dahl R 1961 Who Governs? Democracy and Power in an American City. Yale University Press, New Haven, CT
- Dahl R 1989 Democracy and Its Critics. Yale University Press, New Haven, CT
- Davidson C, Grofman B (eds.) 1994 Quiet Revolution in the South: The Impact of the Voting Rights Act of 1965-1990. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Dawson M C 1994 Behind the Mule: Race and Class in African-American Politics. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Dawson M C, Wilson E J III 1991 Paradigms and paradoxes: Political science and African American politics. In: Crotty W (ed.) Theory and Practice of Political Science. Northwestern University Press, Evanston, IL
- De la Garza R O, DeSipio L, Garcia F C, Garcia J A, Falcon A 1992 Latino Voices: Mexican, Puerto Rican, and Cuban Perspectives on American Politics. Westview Press, Boulder, CO
- DeSipio L 1996 Counting on the Latino Vote. University of Virginia Press, Charlottesville, VA
- Espiritu Y L 1992 Asian American Panethnicity: Bridging Institutions and Identities. Temple University Press, Philadelphia
- Eisenger P 1982 Black empowerment in municipal jobs: the impact of Black political power. American Political Science Review 76: 380-92
- Fanta-Hardy C 1993 Latina Politics, Latino Politics. Temple University Press, Philadelphia
- Garcia F C 1997 Pursuing Power: Latinos and the Political System. University of Notre Dame Press, Notre Dame, IN

- Giles M W 1977 Percent black and racial hostility: An old assumption reexamined. Social Science Quarterly 58: 412–17
- Giles M W, Buckner M 1993 David Duke and black threat: An old hypothesis revisited. Journal of Politics 55: 702–13
- Giles M W, Evans A 1986 The power approach to intergroup hostility. Journal of Conflict Resolution 30: 469–85
- Giles M W, Hertz K 1994 Racial threat and partisan identification. American Political Science Review 88: 317–26
- Gilroy P 1991 There Ain't No Black in the Union Jack. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
- Glaser J M 1994 Back to the black belt: Racial environment and white racial attitudes in the South. Journal of Politics 56: 21–41
- Grofman B, Handley L, Niemi R G 1992 Minority Representation and the Quest for Voting Equality. Cambridge University Press, New York
- Harris F 1994 Something from within: Religion as a mobilizer of African-American political activism. Journal of Politics 56: 42–68
- Hero R 1992 Latinos and the Political System: Two-tiered Pluralism. Temple University Press, Philadelphia
- Hochschild J 1995 Facing Up to the American Dream: Race, Class, and the Soul of the Nation. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Holden M 1973 The Politics of the Black Nation. Chandler Publishing, New York
- Huckfeldt R, Kohfeld C W 1989 Race and the Decline of Class in American Politics. University of Illinois Press, Urbana and Chicago
- Jackman M, Muha M J 1984 Education and inter-group attitudes: Moral enlightenment, superficial democratic commitment, or ideological refinement. American Sociological Review 49: 93–102
- Jennings J (ed.) 1994 Blacks, Latinos, and Asians in Urban America: Status and Prospects for Politics and Activism. Praeger, Westport, CT
- Jennings J, Rivera M (eds.) 1984 Puerto Rican Politics in Urban America. Greenwood Press, Westport, CT
- Jones M H 1972 A frame of reference for Black politics. In: Henderson L J (ed.) Black Political Life in the United States. Chandler Publishing Company, San Francisco
- Kim C J In Press. 1997 Bitter Fruit: The Politics of Black-Korean Conflict in New York City. Yale University Press, New Haven, CT
- Kim C J 1999 The racial triangulation of Asian-Americans. Politics and Society 27: 105–38
- Kinder D R 1986 The continuing American dilemma: White resistance to racial change 40 years after Myrdal. Journal of Social Issues 42: 151–71
- Kinder D R, Sanders L M 1996 Divided by Color: Racial Politics and Democratic Ideals. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
- Kinder D R, Sears D O 1981 Prejudice and politics: Symbolic racism versus racial threats to the good life. Journal of Personality and Social Psychology 40: 414–31
- Kousser J M 1999 Colorblind injustice: Minority voting rights and the undoing of the second reconstruction. University of North Carolina Press, Chapel, NC
- Kluegel J R, Bobo L 1993 Dimensions of whites' beliefs about the black-white socioeconomic gap. In: Sniderman P M, Tetlock P E, Carmines E G (eds.) Prejudice, Politics, and the American Dilemma. Stanford University Press, Stanford, California, pp. 127–47
- Kluegel J R, Smith E R 1986 Beliefs about Inequality. Aldine de Gruyter, Hawthorne, NY
- Kuklinski J H, Parent T W 1981 Race and big government: Contamination in measuring racial attitudes. Political Methodology 7: 131–59
- Lublin D 1997 The Paradox of Representation: Racial Gerrymandering and Minority Interests in Congress. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Lublin D, Tate K 1995 Racial group competition in US mayoral elections. In: Peterson P E (ed.) Classifying by Race. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Marable M 1985 Black American Politics: From the Washington Marches to Jesse Jackson. Thetford Press, London
- Marable M 1990 Race, Reform, and Rebellion, 2nd edn. University Press of Mississippi, Jackson, MS
- March J G, Olsen J P 1984 The new institutionalism: Organizational factors in political life. American Political Science Review 78: 734–49
- Margolis M, Hague K 1981 Applied tolerance or fear of government? An alternative interpretation of Jackman's finding. American Journal of Political Science 25: 241–55
- Marx A W 1998 Making Race and Nation: A Comparison of South Africa, the United States, and Brazil. Cambridge University Press, New York
- McAdam D 1982 Political Process and Development of Black Insurgency, 1930–1970. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
- McClain P D 1993 The changing dynamics of urban politics—Black and Hispanic municipal employment: Is there competition? Journal of Politics 55: 399–414
- McClain P D, Garcia J A 1993 Expanding disciplinary boundaries: Black, Latino, and racial minority group politics in political science. In: Finifter A W (ed.) Political Science: The State of the Discipline II. The American Political Science Association, Washington, DC, pp. 247–79
- McClain P D, Karnig A K 1990 Black and Hispanic socioeconomic and political competition. American Political Science Review 84: 535–45
- McConahay J B 1986 Modern racism, ambivalence, and the modern racism scale. In: Dovidio J, Gaertner S L (eds.) Prejudice, Discrimination, and Racism. Academic Press, Orlando, FL, pp. 91–125
- McConahay J B, Hough J C 1976 Symbolic racism. Journal of Social Issues 32: 23–45
- McLemore L B 1972 Toward a theory of Black politics—The Black and ethnic models revisited. Journal of Black Studies 2: 323–31
- Metz D H, Tate K 1995 The color of the campaign. In: Peterson P (ed.) Classifying by Race. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Miller A, Gurin P, Malunchuk O 1981 Group consciousness and political participation. American Journal of Political Science 25: 494–511
- Morris A 1984 The Origins of the Civil Rights Movement. Free Press, New York
- Morris M D 1975 The Politics of Black America. Harper and Row, New York
- Myrdal G 1944 An American Dilemma: The Negro Problem and Modern Democracy. Harper and Brothers, New York
- Nisbett R, Ross L 1980 Human Inference: Strategies and Shortcomings of Social Judgment. Prentice-Hall, Inc, Englewood Cliffs, NJ
- Pinderhughes D 1987 Race and Ethnicity in Chicago Politics. University of Illinois Press, Urbana and Chicago
- Reed A Jr. 1988 The Black urban regime: Structural origins and constraints. In: Smith M P (ed.) Power, Community, and the City. Transaction Books, New Brunswick, NJ, Vol. 1

- Reeves K 1997 Voting Hopes or Fears? Oxford University Press, New York
- Rosenstone S J, Hansen J M 1993 Mobilization, Participation, and Democracy in America. Macmillan Publishing Co., New York
- Saito L T 1998 Race and Politics: Asian Americans, Latinos, and Whites in a Los Angeles Suburb. University of Illinois Press, Urbana and Chicago
- Sears D O 1988 Symbolic Racism. In: Katz P A, Taylor D A (eds.) Eliminating Racism: Profiles in Controversies. Plenum Press, New York
- Sears D O, Kinder D R 1985 Whites' opposition to busing: On conceptualizing and operationalizing conflict. Journal of Personality and Social Psychology 48: 1141–7
- Sears D O, Sidanius J, Bobo L 2000 Racialized Politics: The Debate About Racism in America. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
- Shingles R 1981 Black consciousness and political participation. American Political Science Review 75: 76–91
- Sidanius J, Pratto F 1993 The inevitability of oppression and the dynamics of social dominance. In: Sniderman P M, Tetlock P E, Carmines E G (eds.) Prejudice, Politics, and the American Dilemma. Stanford University Press, Stanford, CA, pp. 173–211
- Sidanius J 1996 Racism, conservatism, affirmative action and intellectual sophistication: a matter of principled conservatism or group dominance? Journal of Personality and Social Psychology 70: 476–90
- Sigelman L, Welch S 1991 Black Americans' Views of Racial Inequality: The Dream Deferred. Cambridge University Press, New York
- Smith R C 1981 Black power and the transformation from protest to politics. Political Science Quarterly 96: 431–43
- Smith, R M 1997 Civic Ideals: Conflicting Visions of Citizenship in US History. Yale University Press, New Haven, CT
- Sniderman P M, Hagen M G 1985 Race and Inequality: A Study in American Values. Chatham House, Chatham, NJ
- Sniderman P M, Piazza T 1993 The Scar of Race. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Sniderman P M, Tetlock P E 1986 Symbolic racism: Problems of motive attribution in political analysis. Journal of Social Issues 42: 129–50
- Sniderman P M, Brody R A, Kuklinski J 1984 Policy reasoning and political values: The problem of racial equality. American Journal of Political Science 28: 75–94
- Sniderman P M, Piazza T, Tetlock P E, Kendrick A 1991 The new racism. American Journal of Political Science 35: 423–47
- Sniderman P M, Tetlock P E, Carmines E G 1993 Prejudice and politics: An introduction. In: Sniderman P M, Tetlock P E, Carmines E G (eds.) Prejudice, Politics, and the American Dilemma. Stanford University Press, Stanford, CA, pp. 1–31
- Sonenshein R 1993 Politics in Black and White: Race and Power in Los Angeles. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Swain C M 1993 Black Faces, Black Interest: The Representation of African Americans in Congress. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Tate K 1993 From Protest to Politics: The New Black voters in American Elections. Harvard University Press and the Russell Sage Foundation, Cambridge, MA
- Thernstrom S, Thernstrom A 1997 America in Black and White. Simon and Schuster, New York
- Truman D B 1971 The Governmental Process: Political Interests and Public Opinion, 2nd edn. Knopf, New York
- Uhlman C J, Cain B, Kiewiet D R 1989 Political participation of ethnic minorities in the 1980s. Political Behavior 11: 195–231
- Verba S, Nie N H 1972 Participation in America: Political Democracy and Social Equality. Harper and Row, New York
- Verba S, Schlozman K L, Brady H E 1995 Voice and Equality. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Walton H 1973 The Study and Analysis of Black Politics. Scarecrow Press, Metuchen, NJ
- Walton H 1985 Invisible Politics. State University of New York Press, Albany, NY
- Whitby K J 1997 The Color of Representation: Congressional Behavior and Black Interests. University of Michigan Press, Ann Arbor, MI
- Wrinkle R D, Stewart J Jr, Polinard L, Meier K J, Arvizu J R 1996 Ethnicity and nonelectoral political participation. Hispanic Journal of Behavioral Sciences 18: 142–53

K. Tate

Racial Relations

The term racial relations denotes the relationships between groups socially defined as 'races.' In common usage this term is ambiguous and is taken by many popular analysts to mean that racial relations are not primarily matters of power and oppression, but rather mostly involve relationships between groups with relatively equal resources. However, in many cases racial relations are more accurately termed racist relations. For example, in areas of the globe where there was significant European colonization—eventually most areas of the globe—systems of racist oppression were created by European colonists who enriched themselves substantially at the expense of indigenous peoples' land, resources, and labor. This often brutally executed enrichment became part of the economic foundation for Europe's and North America's long-term economic prosperity (Du Bois 1965 [1946]).

1. The Idea of 'Race'

Prior to the late eighteenth century the word 'race' was used for descendants of a common ancestor, emphasizing kinship rather than skin color or other physical characteristics. By the late eighteenth century the word had evolved into its modern sense of a category of human beings with distinctive physical characteristics transmitted by descent. In the 1770s Immanuel Kant was the first prominent scholar to use the term 'races of mankind' (in German) in the sense of physically and biologically distinct categories. Soon thereafter, the German anatomist Johann Blumenbach laid out a ladder of races that became influential (Hannaford 1996, pp. 205–7). At the top were the 'Caucasians,' a term Blumenbach coined for Europeans. Groups lower on the ladder were, in order, the Mongolians (Asians), the Ethiopians (Africans), the Americans (Native Americans), and the Malays (Polynesians).

In the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries Kant, Blumenbach, and other leading European intellectuals increasingly proclaimed the virtues and privileges of whiteness. Educated Europeans and European Americans crystallized the distinction between the superior 'white race' and 'inferior races' and disseminated these views to the general public. This social construction of races (see Conflict Sociology) developed as Europeans expanded their colonial adventures overseas. Colonizers developed racist rationalizations for their destruction of indigenous societies, enslavement of Africans, and other colonial pursuits. This congealed in an ideological racism that legitimated oppression and exploitation, especially as the racist ideas became integrated into the general ideology dominant in Western societies (Balibar and Wallerstein 1991).

2. Racial and Ethnic Groups

Taking into account this history of racial relations and racial oppression, most social scientists define a racial group as a social group that people inside or outside that group have decided is important to single out as inferior or superior, typically on the basis of physical characteristics subjectively selected. For marking off racial groups certain characteristics like skin color are chosen, and others like hair color are rejected, solely for social reasons. Similarly, an ethnic group is a group that is set apart by insiders or outsiders primarily on the basis of cultural or national-origin characteristics subjectively selected (Feagin and Feagin 1999).

Racial and ethnic groups are not fixed groups or essences that endure forever but are temporary inventions shaped in sociopolitical struggles at historical times and places. They have significance only in group interaction. While the two types of groups can be distinguished on theoretical grounds, in the everyday operation of societies, racial and ethnic markers, identities, and oppressions often intertwine.

3. Conceptual Approaches to Racial Relations

Most conceptual approaches to intergroup relations, including racial relations, can be roughly classified as (a) order-assimilation theories or (b) power-conflict theories. Order-assimilation theories tend to accent the gradual incorporation of immigrant groups into a dominant culture and stability over time in intergroup relations. In contrast, power-conflict theories give central attention to the outcomes of racial contacts that result in oppression, labor exploitation, and genocide.

3.1 Assimilation Approaches

In Europe and the United States much theorizing about racial-ethnic relations has placed an emphasis on assimilation, on the more or less orderly adaptation of a migrating group such as Italian immigrants to the ways of an established host group, such as an Anglo-Protestant core culture in the United States. Related theories accent individual or group competition seen as resolving itself in the direction of eventual accommodation (see, for example, Banton 1983). In this order-assimilation theorizing little attention is paid to outcomes of intergroup contact taking the form of long-term oppression. One early theorist, Robert E. Park (1950), argued that intergroup relations move through stages of a race relations cycle—contacts, competition, accommodation, and eventual assimilation—that are more or less progressive and irreversible. Scholars in this tradition argue that there is a long-term trend toward orderly adaptation of immigrant groups in Western societies and that racial-ethnic conflict will diminish with the eventual assimilation of these incoming groups.

Giving primary attention to immigrants to the United States, Milton Gordon (1964) views the typical trend of adaptation to be in the direction of immigrants giving up much of their heritage for the pre-existing Anglo-Protestant core culture. This adaptation takes place in seven different arenas of assimilation: cultural assimilation, structural (primary group) assimilation, marital assimilation, attitude-receptional assimilation (breakdown of prejudices), behavior-receptional assimilation (decline of discrimination), identificational assimilation, and civic assimilation. Classical assimilation theorists have had in mind as their main examples of racial-ethnic adaptation the European groups migrating more or less voluntarily to the United States or European nations. Until relatively recently, theorists who accent assimilation gave less attention to the adaptation and assimilation of non-European groups to the core culture. When they did, they often viewed non-Europeans as assimilating like other groups. One prominent European writer on US racial relations, Gunnar Myrdal (1964 [1944], Vol. 2, p. 929), argued that as a practical matter it is to the advantage of black Americans 'as individuals and as a group to become assimilated into American culture, to acquire the traits held in esteem by the dominant white Americans.' Even today, many assimilation analysts expect the importance of racial-ethnic stratification to decline as the powerful universalistic forces of industrialization and urbanization wipe out the vestiges of earlier particularistic value systems in various societies.

3.2 Power-conflict Approaches

Generally speaking, assimilation theorists are most concerned with cultural (such as language) or primary-group network (such as intermarriage) features of the adaptation of migrating groups to a host society, while power-conflict theorists are most concerned with racial-ethnic oppression, exploitation, and subordination. An early US advocate of this latter perspective, Oliver C. Cox (1948), emphasized the role of the capitalist class in creating racial conflict by exploiting the labor of groups like African Americans and by propagating racist ideologies to divide the working class in Western societies. Racial (white-on-black) stratification grew out of the expansion of profit-oriented capitalism.

Some scholars have adopted the concept of internal colonialism to describe what happens to many non-European groups coming into Western societies. An emphasis on great power inequalities between whites and people of color is at the heart of this model. Thus, people of color, such as Native Americans and African Americans, were brought into the emerging political-economic system of North America by force. Subsequent adaptation was characterized by dominant group coercion and oppression, as well as by subordinate group resistance. Racial stratification has a material base, a firm underpinning rooted in a specific political-economic history. Internal-colonialism theorists are not primarily concerned with white immigrant groups but rather with the persistence of systemic oppression and the control processes that maintain white dominance (Blauner 1972).

Power-conflict analysts look at the immigration of non-European peoples as involving much more than assimilation. John Rex (1973) has analyzed the immigration of such groups from the former European colonies to the metropolitan cities of the colonizing countries. In the latter countries the colonial immigrants get the most inferior and marginal jobs and suffer the highest unemployment—thereby becoming structurally distinct from the native-born, white working class and, thus, an outcast group of alien workers.

The concept of institutional racism accents the importance of patterns of racism built into a society's major institutions and patterns. Racism is much more than whites' racist attitudes, for it encompasses a complex array of inegalitarian relationships developed over generations and imbedded in all institutions. In racist systems most whites become stakeholders in a hierarchical structure of opportunities, wealth, and privileges linked to a long history of racial exploitation and oppression. Joe R. Feagin (2000) has shown that the concept of systemic racism encompasses not only the construction of racist ideologies but also the maintenance of white privilege, wealth, and power. People do not experience racial relations in the abstract but in concrete and recurring social situations. Individuals, whether they are the perpetrators or recipients of discrimination, are caught in a complex web of alienating racist-relations. A racist system categorizes and divides human beings from each other and severely impedes the development of a common consciousness. At the macrolevel, large-scale institutions routinely perpetuate racial subordination and inequalities. These institutions are created and recreated by the routine discriminatory practices of dominant group individuals at the microlevel of everyday interaction. Individual acts of discrimination regularly activate whites' group power position and authority, a point underscored by the European scholar (Philomena Essed 1991).

In much theorizing about contemporary racial conflict, there is an accent on class or on socioeconomic status. Some analysts argue that systemic racism is of declining importance in Western societies like the United States and is more or less consigned to the fringes, while class divisions are now increasing (Wilson 1978). Yet the evidence (see below) suggests that such a conclusion is premature. Critics (for example, Omi and Winant 1994) of this view of the declining significance of racism have shown that, for the United States at least, race cannot be reduced to class or socioeconomic status, but remains an autonomous field of intergroup conflict, political organization, and ideological meaning.

4. Continuing Racial Oppression: The US Case

Today, people of African descent are still the globe's largest racially oppressed group; they are now resident in a number of countries as a result of the overseas slave trade carried out by Europeans. One of the largest groups in this African diaspora is in the United States, where there remains much evidence of continuing white-on-black oppression.

Recent field studies and opinion surveys show that among white Americans racist attitudes remain widespread. In one survey three-quarters of white respondents openly agreed with one of more of the eight antiblack stereotypes presented to them, while just over half agreed with two or more (Anti-Defamation League 1993). Discrimination against African Americans and other Americans of color also remains commonplace. One Los Angeles survey (Bobo and Suh 1995) found that within the past year six in ten black workers had encountered workplace discrimination; that proportion increased with workers' education. This study also found that a majority of highly educated Asian and Latino American workers faced workplace discrimination. More generally, researchers in the United States have found that, after decades of affirmative action programs attempting to address discrimination in employment, at least 95 percent of the top positions in major economic, political, and educational organizations are still held by white men. In the United States housing patterns are still highly segregated, largely as a result of active discrimination by white landlords, homeowners, and real estate agents. In a national survey using 3,800 test audits in 25 metropolitan areas, black renters and homebuyers were found to face discrimination about half the time in seeking housing (Turner et al. 1991).

In the United States, as in other Western nations, whites also direct much racist hostility and discrimination at other groups of color. A number of research studies have shown that many Asian Americans are moving into the mainstream of the US economy and suburban neighborhoods, yet even as they do so they still encounter much racial discrimination. White-collar workers, including administrators and professionals in historically white institutions, report ingrained patterns of anti-Asian discrimination (Cheng 1997). Similarly, Latino Americans also report much continuing discrimination in employment and housing. Political discrimination also targets Latino and Asian Americans. During the 1990s California voters, especially white voters, supported several ballot propositions designed to abolish government services for Latino and Asian immigrants and eliminate affirmative action and bilingual programs. In addition, hostility to Spanish speaking Americans persists in widespread mocking of the Spanish language and Latino cultures.

5. Racism in Europe: The Case of France

The United States is not the only Western nation pervaded by racist relations. The reality of racial oppression can be seen in the outbreak of hate crimes across the European continent since the 1980s, as well as in routine discrimination in housing and employment in many European countries. For example, in France immigrants from Algeria and other African countries often face racist practices much like those in the United States. France imposed colonial rule on Algeria in the nineteenth century; later, beginning in the 1960s, large numbers of Algerians migrated to France. Defining immigrant groups as undesirable, whites there publicly accented the lack of assimilation by African immigrants into French culture as the major issue, playing down or ignoring the way in which such realities as housing segregation result from institutionalized, race-linked discrimination against Africans. In France racist-right political parties have grown in influence in recent years, and the national government has responded periodically with repressive attacks on African immigrants (Batur-VanderLippe 1999).

For numerous European countries, overseas colonialism involved the use of violence to exploit the resources of the colonies and oppress their peoples—practices generally legitimated with racist ideologies. More recently, the descendants of the formerly colonized face racist oppression in the colonizers' home countries. In a number of European countries the legacy of colonialism can be seen graphically in the often violent expressions of racialized hatred for the identity and culture of African, Asian, and West Indian immigrants.

6. Racism in Former Empires: The South African Case

In many ways South Africa is the symbol of racist relations as they developed between European and non-European peoples in the ever spreading European empires. In the South African case, two colonizing powers, England and Holland, invaded the lands of indigenous African peoples, and their descendants became the economically and politically dominant group. In the first decade of the twentieth century a new country, called the Union of South Africa, was formed, combining residents of British and Dutch origin indigenais as the ruling group over a number of African groups. Black Africans were gradually forced into a system of segregation (apartheid) where the relations between the white and black groups, as well as between these groups and middle groups like the 'Asians' and the 'coloreds' (those of mixed racial backgrounds), were determined by an extensive system of segregation laws. Over time the system of apartheid came to encompass every aspect of the relations between whites and non-whites, including relations in the institutional areas of employment, education, and housing (Batur-VanderLippe 1999, Feagin and Feagin 1999).

As in the case of African Americans, this intensive system of racial oppression generated resistance in the form of major organizations like the African National Congress (ANC). In the 1990s the black African majority finally took back political control. The ANC, working with other anti-apartheid groups, eventually forced an end to apartheid and brought new hope for the oppressed majority. Racial relations dramatically changed. A formerly total-racist society, the Union of South Africa moved from white to black political control and began to change the patterns of its social and economic apartheid with relatively little bloodshed. Still this change has so far marked only a beginning, for the political changes have not yet ended economic domination by whites, and racist practices are still found in housing and employment.

Late twentieth century events in South Africa have linked black peoples around the globe in a common struggle against the descendants of European colonists, who long maintained economic or political control in a number of nations where people of color are the numerical majority. Since the early 1900s black American efforts for liberation from racism (such as the recurring civil rights movements) have provided inspiration for the struggle in South Africa and other nations (for example, Brazil), and in a similar fashion the recent political successes by black Africans in South Africa have encouraged African Americans in their struggle against oppression in the United States. Black Americans have long drawn on the history, spirituality, and symbolism of Africa as part of their individual and group strategies for coping with the white-dominated society. This is yet another example of the way in which racial relations in one nation are set within a larger global context.

7. The Future of the Global Racial Order

In many countries across the globe challenges to white domination and racism are arising from population and sociopolitical changes. Europeans and European Americans are a decreasing fifth of the world's population and a decreasing proportion of US population. In the United States, at the beginning of the twenty-first century, whites are a statistical minority in many of the largest cities and in the states of New Mexico and Hawaii. By the early 2000s whites will be a minority in the states of California and Texas, with other major states to follow in the next few decades. Demographic projections indicate that shortly after the year 2050 white Americans will become a minority of the US population.

As whites become the minority in the United States and in many international organizations where they once dominated, the traditional patterns of racial relations will be under even greater pressure to change. For the US case, by the 2050s, the majority of the labor force will no longer be white, and the population and labor force will be older. This will likely give people of color ever more political and economic clout. Tensions will likely increase between a retired population that is mostly white and workers who are mostly not white. In several Western nations, white politicians opposed to legal immigration by non-Europeans and to remedial programs for racial discrimination will not likely be elected when the majority of their political constituencies become citizens of color. As constituencies change, juries and justice systems, educational systems, and government policies will also be likely to change.

Across the globe the relations of colonialism and racism are slowly but dramatically changing. The deep-lying contradictions of the global racial order were set into motion by the colonial adventures of numerous European nations. This colonialism generated sociopolitical structures that have long embedded the practices, ideologies, and institutions of racist subordination in numerous nations. Today, international relations, global markets, the global mass media, and multinational corporations are all racialized, with white European perspectives and executives often in control. Half a millennium of European-dominated national and international institutions is slowly coming to an end. As the twenty-first century develops, racial relations in Europe, the United States, and the rest of the world are likely to change. Many once oppressed groups and societies will move farther out from under the dominance of Europeans and European Americans. Over the last few decades strong antiracism movements have arisen in South Africa, Brazil, and the United States. The possibility of a global democratic order rid of the oppressive relations of racism remains only a dream, but the South African revolution shows that it is a powerful dream for many people.

See also: Affirmative Action Programs (India): Cultural Concerns; Affirmative Action Programs (United States): Cultural Concerns; Affirmative Action, Sociology of; Colonization and Colonialism, History of; Conflict Sociology; Discrimination: Racial; Environmental Justice; Ethnic Conflicts; Ethnic Groups/Ethnicity: Historical Aspects; Ethnicity, Sociology of; Hate Crimes; Policing; Race and Gender Intersections; Race and the Law; Race and Urban Planning; Race: History of the Concept; Race Identity; Race Relations in the United States, Politics of; Racism, History of; Racism, Sociology of; Residential Segregation: Sociological Aspects; Slavery as Social Institution; Slaves/Slavery, History of

Bibliography

- Anti-Defamation League 1993 Highlights from an Anti-Defamation League Survey on Racial Attitudes in America. Anti-Defamation League, New York
- Balibar E, Wallerstein I 1991 Race, Nation, Class: Ambiguous Identities. Verso, London
- Banton M P 1983 Racial and Ethnic Competition. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Batur-VanderLippe P 1999 Colonialism and post-colonialism: the global expansion of racism. In: Feagin J R, Feagin C B (eds.) Racial and Ethnic Relations. Prentice-Hall, Upper Saddle River, NJ
- Blauner R 1972 Racial Oppression in America. Harper & Row, New York
- Bobo L, Suh S A 1995 Surveying Racial Discrimination: Analyses from a Multiethnic Labor Market. Research Report. Department of Sociology, University of California, Los Angeles
- Cheng C 1997 Are Asian American employees a model minority or just a minority? Journal of Applied Behavioral Science 33: 277–90
- Cox O C 1948 Caste, Class, and Race. Doubleday, Garden City, NY
- Du Bois W E B 1965 [1946] The World and Africa. International Publishers, New York
- Essed P 1991 Understanding Everyday Racism. Sage, Newbury Park, CA
- Feagin J R 2000 Racist America: Old Roots, Current Realities, and Future Reparations. Routledge, New York
- Feagin J R, Feagin C B 1999 Racial and Ethnic Relations, 6th edn., Prentice-Hall, Upper Saddle River, NJ
- Gordon M M 1964 Assimilation in American Life. Oxford University Press, New York
- Hannaford I 1996 Race: The History of an Idea in the West. Johns Hopkins University Press, Baltimore, MD

- Myrdal G 1964 [1944] An American Dilemma. McGraw-Hill, New York
- Omi M, Winant H 1994 Racial Formation in the United States: From the 1960s to the 1990s, 2nd edn. Routledge, New York
- Park R E 1950 Race and Culture. Free Press, Glencoe, IL
- Rex J 1973 Race, Colonialism and the City. Routledge and Kegan Paul, London
- Turner M A, Struyk R J, Yinger J 1991 Housing Discrimination Study: Synthesis. US Dept. of Housing and Urban Development, office of Policy Development and Research, Washington, DC
- Wilson W J 1978 The Declining Significance of Race: Blacks and Changing American Institutions. University of Chicago Press, Chicago, IL

J. R. Feagin

Racism, History of

In common usage the term racism is often employed in a loose and unreflective way to describe the hostile or negative feelings of one ethnic group or historical collectivity toward another and the actions resulting from such attitudes. But historians and social scientists normally require a more precise and limited definition, although they may disagree on what it should be. It is useful, therefore, to review the historiographic discourse on the meaning of racism before attempting a brief survey of what contemporary historians might accept as its principal manifestations.

1. Historiography of Racism

The term racism was coined in the 1930s mainly in reference to the theories on which the Nazis based their persecution of the Jews. The first historian to focus directly on the subject was Barzun. His book Race: A Study in Superstition (originally published in 1937 and reprinted in 1965) set two important precedents for most future historians of racism: it presumed that claims of the innate inferiority of one 'race' to another were false or at least unproven, and its main concern was with the history of ideas rather than with the social and political applications of prejudiced beliefs and attitudes. Barzun's concern with the intellectual origins of Nazi antisemitism was shared by the many scholars who wrote on the subject after World War II in response to what the Holocaust had revealed about the horrifying consequences of racist ideas. A notable example was Poliakov's Le Myth Aryen, translated into English as The Aryan Myth (1974). But disagreements developed on whether biological racism was continuous with earlier antisemitic attitudes that were, ostensibly at least, based on religion or whether it was a radical new departure, a sine qua non for something like the Holocaust.

In the immediate postwar decades, the term racism was also applied with increasing frequency to the relationships between whites or Europeans and people of color, especially Africans or those of African descent, in colonial, postcolonial, and former slave societies. The rising concern with black-white relations in the US, South Africa, and (to a somewhat lesser extent) in Great Britain, beginning in the 1950s and early 1960s, gave rise to an enormous literature on the origins and development of white supremacy as an ideology. Historians of ideas did most of the early work, but gradually the emphasis shifted somewhat from the racist ideas themselves to the patterns or racial discrimination and domination for which they served as a rationale. Many historians of black-white relations used the term casually and without reflecting on its exact meaning. At its most imprecise, it could mean anything that whites did or thought that worked to the disadvantage of blacks.

There have been relatively few attempts to write general histories of racism, which encompass both the antisemitic and color-coded varieties. For the most part, the two historiographies have not addressed each other, and the definitions employed have sometimes been incompatible. Some historians of antisemitic racism have found the term applicable only if the aim was the elimination of the stigmatized group. Some historians of white supremacy, on the contrary, would limit the term to ideologies associated with patterns of domination or hierarchical differentiation. The first attempt at a comprehensive history of American racism, Gossett's Race: The History of an Idea in America (1963) traced consciousness of race to the ancient world. Its treatment of specifically American manifestations cast its net quite wide to include representation and treatment of American Indians and immigrants from southern and eastern Europe, including Jews, as well as blacks. But most subsequent work on the history of American racism has been group specific and has concentrated most heavily on attitudes toward African Americans. Mosse's general history of European racism, on the other hand, pays most of its attention to the growth of antisemitism between the Enlightenment and the Holocaust (Mosse 1978). But there appear to be only two significant attempts to cover Western attitudes toward race comprehensively: Hannaford's Race: The History of an Idea in the West (1996) and Geiss' Geschichte des Rassismus (1988). Hannaford's study, as its title indicates, is strictly an intellectual history and considers race as a concept more than racism as an ideology. It argues strenuously that no clear concept of race existed before the seventeenth century, thus raising the issue of whether anything that existed before the invention of race in the modern sense can be legitimately labeled racism. Geiss, on the contrary, sees racism as anticipated in most respects by the ethnocentrism or xenophobia that developed in the ancient world, as reflected, for example, in the Old Testament.

2. Toward a Definition of Racism for Historical Purposes

Somewhere between the view that race is a peculiar modern idea without much historical precedent and the notion that it is simply an extension of the ancient phenomena of ethnocentrism and xenophobia may lie a working definition that is neither too broad for historical specificity or too narrow to cover more than the limited span of Western history during which a racism based on scientific theories of human variation was widely accepted. If racism is defined as an ideology rather than as a theory, links can be established between belief and practice that the history of ideas may obscure. But ideologies have content, and it is necessary to distinguish racist ideologies from other belief systems that emphasize human differences and can be used as rationalizations of inequality. The classic sociological distinction between racism and ethnocentrism is helpful, but not perhaps in the usual sense, in which the key variable is whether differences are described in cultural or physical terms. It is actually quite difficult in specific historical cases to say whether appearance or 'culture' is the source of the salient differences, because culture can be reified and essentialized to the point where it has the same deterministic effect as skin color. But it would stretch the concept of racism much too far to make it cover the pride and loyalty that may result from ethnic identity. Such group-centeredness may engender prejudice and discrimination against those outside the group, but two additional elements would seem to be required before the categorization of racism is justified. One is a belief that the differences between the ethnic groups involved are permanent and ineradicable. If conversion or assimilation is genuinely on offer, we have religious or cultural intolerance but not racism. The second is the social side of the ideology—its linkage to patterns of domination or exclusion. To attempt a short formulation, we might say that racism exists when one ethnic group or historical collectivity dominates, excludes, or seeks to eliminate another on the basis of differences that it believes are hereditary and unalterable.

3. The Emergence of Racism

Historians who can accept this middle-of-the-road definition can agree with the scholars who have examined conceptions of human diversity in classical antiquity and the early Middle Ages without finding clear evidence of color prejudice or racism. Neither the classical conception that one becomes civilized through being able to engage in politics nor the Christian belief that everyone regardless of color or ancestry is a potential convert with a soul to be saved could readily sustain a racist view of the world. The period between the fourteenth and the seventeenth centuries is much more problematic. The literal demonization of the Jews in the late middle ages, the belief that they were in league with the devil and plotting the destruction of Christianity, could lead unsophisticated folk to believe that they were outside the bounds of humanity, even though church authorities persisted in advocating their conversion. Folk antisemitism resulted in massacres and expulsions of Jews in virtually every country in Western Europe. A degree of elite or official sanction for such attitudes came in sixteenth century Spain when Jews who had converted to Christianity and their descendants became the victims of a pattern of discrimination and exclusion. When purity of blood, or limpieza de sangre, became a qualification for certain offices and honors it signified that what people could accomplish or achieve no longer depended on what they did but on who they were. Precedents for the notion that blood will tell could be found in the inheritability of royal or noble status but the designation of an entire ethnic group as incapable of a reliable conversion to Christianity constituted, at the very least, a transitional stage between religious bigotry and biological racism.

The period of the Renaissance and Reformation was also the time when Europeans were coming into increasing contact with people of darker pigmentation in Africa, Asia, and the Americas and were making judgments about them as they traded with them, fought with them over territory, or enslaved them. A belief that all these non-Europeans were children of God with souls that missionaries could save did not prevent a brutal expropriation of their land and labor, but it did inhibit the articulation of a racial justification for how they were being treated. When Africans were carried by force to the New World to labor on plantations, slave traders and slave owners sometimes invoked an obscure passage in the book of Genesis to explain the color of their human property. Ham had committed a sin against his father Noah that resulted in a divine curse on his descendants to be 'servants unto servants.' When Africans were enslaved, first by Arabs, and then by Europeans, it became convenient to believe that the punishment of God had included a blackening of the skin. But the passage had other possible meanings, and no orthodox religious authorities ever endorsed the interpretation of the curse popular among slaveholders, because they feared that it would impede conversion of blacks to Christianity. The standard and official justification for enslaving Africans was that they were heathens and that enslavement made heaven accessible to them.

An implicit racism became evident, however, when converted slaves were kept in bondage, not because they were actual heathens but because they had heathen ancestry. As with the doctrine of purity of blood in Spain, descent rather than performance became the basis for determining the qualifications for membership in a community that was still theoretically based on a shared Christian faith. Beginning in the late seventeenth century laws were passed in English North America forbidding marriage between whites and blacks and discriminating against the mixed offspring of informal liaisons. Without clearly saying so, such laws implied that blacks were unalterably alien and inferior.

4. The Rise of Modern Racism

A modern naturalistic form of racism could not be articulated fully until the Enlightenment. A secular or scientific theory of race required a new way of looking at human diversity, one that moved the subject away from the Bible, with its insistence on the essential unity and homogeneity of the human race and its collective elevation above the animal kingdom. Eighteenth-century ethnologists began to think of human beings as part of the natural world and subdivided them into three to five races, usually considered as varieties or subspecies. Most eighteenth-century ethnological theorists believed that whiteness was the original color of humanity and that blackness or brownness resulted from a process of degeneration caused by climate and conditions of life. Although the white or Caucasian race was generally considered more beautiful and civilized than the Mongolian and especially the Negro, the belief that human beings constituted a single species with a common origin remained dominant. In the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, however, an increasing number of ethnologists asserted that the races were separately created and constituted distinct species. As debates over the morality of slavery and the slave trade erupted in Western Europe and the US in the wake of democratic revolutions and the rise of humanitarian movements, some of the most militant defenders of black bondage adopted these polygenetic arguments as a justification for enslaving Africans and holding them in permanent servitude. But the fact that polygenesis seemed to conflict with scripture limited the usage of this extreme version of scientific racism. Many defenders of slavery in the American South, where evangelical religion enforced biblical literalism, reverted to the Curse on Ham or made the degeneracy hypothesis of Enlightenment ethnology into an argument for the permanent or irreversible divergence of the races from their common origin.

The nineteenth century was an age of emancipation, nationalism, and imperialism—all of which contributed to the growth and intensification of ideological racism in Europe and in the US. Although the emancipation of blacks from slavery and Jews from the ghettos, which seemed a logical consequence of the democratic revolutions of the late eighteenth century, received most of its support from religious or secular believers in an essential human equality, the consequences of these reforms was to intensify rather than diminish racism. Race relations became less paternalistic and more competitive. Poor or working class whites in the US, for example, feared competition with emancipated blacks for work, land, and social status. Middle class (especially lower middle class) Germans viewed the increasing involvement of Jews in finance, commerce, the professions, journalism, and the arts during the late nineteenth century as a potential threat to their own economic security, social status, and traditional values. Of course, it was the legacy of inherited stereotypes about 'the Other,' in addition to the immediate economic and social circumstances, that gave edge and intensity to these feelings of insecurity and hostility. The idiom of Darwinism, with its emphasis on 'the struggle for existence' and concern for 'the survival of the fittest' was conducive to the development of a new and more credible scientific racism in an era that increasingly viewed race relations as an arena for conflict rather than as a stable hierarchy.

The growth of nationalism, especially romantic cultural nationalism, encouraged the growth of a more mystical variant of racist thought. When it could be assumed that one had to be of German ancestry to participate in the German Volkgeist, Jews could be discriminated against or excluded just as effectively as if their deficiencies were clearly defined as genetic or biological. For most of the nineteenth century the question of whether German Jews could or should be converted to Christianity was an open one. Beginning in the late 1870s and early 1880s, however, the coiners of the term 'antisemitism' made explicit what some cultural nationalists had previously implied—that to be Jewish was not simply to adhere to a set of religious beliefs or cultural practices but meant belonging to a race that was the antithesis of the race to which true Germans belonged. The latter was variously designated as Teutonic, Aryan, Nordic, or simply Germanic. In Great Britain and the US romantic nationalism took the form of a veneration for Anglo-Saxon ancestors and legacies that could turn racist, as it did for a time in the US, when confronted with large-scale immigration from eastern and southern Europe. In France, an ethnocentric cultural nationalism fed the fury against the Jews that surfaced in the Dreyfus affair at the turn of century. It did not triumph against the universalistic civic nationalism inherited from the revolutionary past, but it did make antisemitic racism a strain of right-wing French thought that would resurface during the 1930s and especially under the German occupation.

The climax of Western imperialism in the late nineteenth century 'scramble for Africa' and parts of Asia and the Pacific represented an assertion of the competitive ethnic nationalism that existed among European nations (and which, as a result of the Spanish-American War came to include the US). A belief that different races, subraces, or racial mixtures inhabited each nation led some, especially the Germans and the English, to suppose that the quality of each nation's racial stock was being tested for its fitness. But imperialism also required the massive subjugation and colonial domination of non-European populations. An ideology proclaiming that whites were superior to 'lesser breeds' and responsible for ruling over them and tutoring them in the rudiments of civilization was a prime rationale for this new burst of European expansionism, even if it was not a cause of it. The relation of racism to imperialism is more problematic than one might suppose, however, because the most consistent and extreme racists were often anti-imperialists. They believed that nothing useful could be done with people whose inferiority was so profound and permanent that they were incapable of being civilized. For them the taming or domestication of such savages was not worth the trouble. Within colonies that attracted substantial numbers of European settlers, such as French Algeria or some of the British colonies of South and East Africa, a more extreme and explicit racism than the one usually professed by government officials or missionaries could be found in the discourse of white colonists about their 'native' servants or farm laborers.

5. The Climax: Racism in the Twentieth Century

The climax of the history of racism came in the twentieth century in the rise and fall of what might be called overtly racist regimes. In the American South, the passage of racial segregation laws and restrictions on black voting rights reduced African Americans to lower caste status, despite the Constitutional Amendments that had made them equal citizens. Extreme racist propaganda, which represented black males as ravening beasts lusting after white women, served to rationalize the practice of lynching. These extra-legal executions increasingly were reserved for blacks accused of offenses against the color line, and they became more brutal and sadistic as time went on; by the early twentieth century victims were likely to be tortured to death rather than simply being killed. A key feature of the racist regime maintained by state law in the South was a fear of sexual contamination through rape or intermarriage, which led to efforts to prevent the conjugal union of whites with those with any known or discernable African ancestry. The effort to guarantee 'race purity' in the American South anticipated aspects of the official Nazi persecution of Jews in the 1930s. The Nuremberg laws of 1935 prohibited intermarriage or sexual relations between Jews and Gentiles, and the propaganda surrounding the legislation emphasized the sexual threat that predatory Jewish males presented to German womanhood and the purity of German blood. Racist ideology was eventually of course carried to a more extreme point in Nazi Germany than in the American South of the Jim Crow era. Individual blacks had been hanged or burned to death by the lynch mobs to serve as examples to insure that the mass of southern African Americans would scrupulously respect the color line. But it took Hitler and the Nazis to attempt the extermination of an entire ethnic group on the basis of a racist ideology.

Hitler, it has been said, gave racism a bad name. The moral revulsion of people throughout the world against what the Nazis did, reinforced by scientific studies undermining racist genetics (or eugenics), served to discredit the scientific racism that had been respectable and influential in the US and Europe before World War II. But explicit racism also came under devastating attack from the new nations resulting from the decolonization of Africa and Asia and their representatives in the United Nations. The Civil Rights movement in the US, which succeeded in outlawing legalized racial segregation and discrimination in the 1960s, was the beneficiary of revulsion against the Holocaust as a logical outcome of racism. But it also drew crucial support from the growing sense that national interests were threatened when blacks in the US were mistreated and abused. In the competition with the Soviet Union for 'the hearts and minds' of independent Africans and Asians, Jim Crow and the ideology that sustained it became a national embarrassment with possible strategic consequences.

The one overtly racist regime that survived World War II and the Cold War was the South African, which did not in fact come to fruition until the advent of Apartheid in 1948. The laws passed banning all marriage and sexual relations between different 'population groups' and requiring separate residential areas for people of mixed race ('Coloureds'), as well as for Africans, signified the same obsession with 'race purity' that characterized the other racist regimes. However, the climate of world opinion in the wake of the Holocaust induced apologists for apartheid to avoid straightforward biological racism and rest their case for 'separate development' mainly on cultural rather than physical differences. The extent to which Afrikaner nationalism was inspired by nineteenth-century European cultural nationalism also contributed to this avoidance of a pseudo-scientific rationale. No better example can be found of how a 'cultural essentialism' based on nationality can do the work of a racism based squarely on skin color or other physical characteristics. The South African government also tried to accommodate itself to the age of decolonization. It offered a dubious independence to the overcrowded 'homelands,' from which African migrants went forth to work for limited periods in the mines and factories of the nine-tenths of the country reserved for a white minority that constituted less than a sixth of the total population.

6. The End of Racism?

The defeat of Nazi Germany, the desegregation of the American South in the 1960s, and the establishment of majority rule in South Africa suggest that regimes based on biological racism or its cultural essentialist equivalent are a thing of the past. But racism does not require the full and explicit support of the state and the law. Nor does it require an ideology centered on the concept of biological inequality. Discrimination by institutions and individuals against those perceived as racially different can long persist and even flourish under the illusion of nonracism, as historians of Brazil have discovered recently. The use of allegedly deep-seated cultural differences as a justification for hostility and discrimination against newcomers from the Third World in several European countries has led to allegations of a new 'cultural racism.' Similarly, those sympathetic to the plight of poor African Americans and Latinos in the US have described as 'racist' the view of some whites that many denizens of the ghettos and barrios can be written off as incurably infected by cultural pathologies. From the historian's perspective such recent examples of cultural determinism are not in fact unprecedented. They rather represent a reversion to the way that the differences between ethnoracial groups could be made to seem indelible and unbridgeable before the articulation of a scientific or naturalistic conception of race in the eighteenth century.

See also: Anti-Semitism; Discrimination; Discrimination, Economics of; Discrimination: Racial; Ethnic Groups/Ethnicity: Historical Aspects; Ethnic Identity, Psychology of; Ethnicity: Anthropological Aspects; Holocaust, The; Prejudice in Society; Race and the Law; Race: History of the Concept; Race Identity; Race Relations in the United States, Politics of; Racial Relations; Racism, Sociology of

Bibliography

- Banton M 1998 Racial Theories. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Barzun J 1965/1937 Race: A Study in Superstition. Harper and Row, New York
- Fredrickson G M 1981 White Supremacy: A Comparative Study in American and South African History. Oxford University Press, New York
- Geiss I 1988 Geschichte des Rassismus. Suhrkamp, Frankfurt, Germany
- Gossett T F 1963 Race: The History of an Idea in America. Southern Methodist University Press, Dallas, TX
- Hannaford I 1996 Race: The History of an Idea in the West. Johns Hopkins University Press, Baltimore, MD
- Langmuir G I 1990 Toward a Definition of Antisemitism. University of California Press, Berkeley, CA
- Lauren P L 1988 Power and Prejudice: The Politics and Diplomacy of Racial Discrimination. Westview Press, Boulder, CO
- Mosse G L 1978 Toward the Final Solution: A History of European Racism. H Fertig, New York
- Pieterse J N 1992 White on Black: Images of Africa and Blacks in Western Popular Culture. Yale University Press, New Haven, CT
- Poliakov L 1974 The Aryan Myth: A History of Racist and Nationalist Ideas in Europe. Chatto for Essex University Press, London
- Smedley A 1993 Race in North America: Origin and Evolution of a World View. Westview Press, Boulder, CO
- Taguieff P 1997 Le Racisme. Flammarion, Paris

G. M. Fredrickson

Racism, Sociology of

Few concepts in social science have generated more heat and less light than 'race' and its derivative 'racism,' the former because of its multiplicity of meanings, and the latter because of its dual career as a concept and as an ideological bludgeon.

1. Definitions

'Race' has been used with four distinct meanings:

- (a) As a synonym for a biological species, as in 'the human race.'
- (b) As a synonym for a biological subspecies as in 'the Caucasoid race.'
- (c) As a synonym for a nation or ethnic group, as in 'the French race.'
- (d) As a term to designate a group of diverse origins thought to be a biological subspecies in a given society, as in 'the Jewish race' in Nazi Germany. To reduce the confusion and distinguish this usage from the second, the term 'social race' has sometimes been used, but generally the qualifier is omitted.

The first usage is largely metaphorical and, thus, unproblematic. However, the other three, are hopelessly confusing, either because they have no clear empirical referent (as in the second), or because they overlap empirically with one another (as in the second, third, and fourth), or both. The result is a conceptual muddle that has plagued the social science literature since the turn of the twentieth century.

'Racism,' i.e., the ideology or attitudes associated with one or more of the listed definitions of 'race,' is in an even more parlous state of conceptual confusion. The following list includes some but not all of the current usages:

- (a) As an ideology or set of attitudes accompanying the second meaning of 'race,' that is, a belief in the relative inferiority or superiority in moral, intellectual, physical, and other attributes of biological subspecies of Homo sapiens.
- (b) As an ideology or set of attitudes corresponding to the third meaning of 'race,' that is, as a synonym for ethnocentrism, as in the belief that one's own ethnic group is superior to others.

(c) As an ideology or set of attitudes linked to the fourth meaning of 'race,' namely 'social race.'

(d) As a set of practices or institutions, divorced from individual beliefs or attitudes, that, by design or otherwise, have a differential impact on various racial or ethnic groups. This is usually labeled 'institutional racism,' and is a synonym for discrimination, witting or unwitting. Thus, an ostensibly neutral test on which some groups consistently perform better than others is said to be 'institutionally racist.'

(e) As a general term of opprobrium hurled at any person, policy, or practice one disapproves of. Examples would be the 'Zionism is racism' resolution passed by the United Nations, or accusations leveled at opponents of race-based affirmative action in the USA. In the latter case, and indeed in much contemporary usage in the USA, race-blindness is said to be racist, while race discrimination is defined as liberal, thus turning the concept on its head.

2. Evolution in the Use of the Term 'Racism'

Clearly, racism as a social concept has outlived whatever use it may have had until the 1960s, before its usage became broadened beyond recognition. At mid-twentieth century, a clear distinction was maintained in most social literature between attitudes and behavior, between prejudice and discrimination, and between race and ethnicity. The concept of racism was largely restricted to prejudicial 'attitudes' applied to 'social races.' Discrimination was treated as varying in partial independence of prejudice, and discrimination was seen as a possible (but not necessary) consequence of racist attitudes. Prejudicial attitudes applied to ethnic groups were termed 'ethnocentrism,' as distinct from racism. Driven by an ideological agenda of stigmatizing any beliefs or practices thought to sustain any kind of group differential in society (e.g., group differences in performance in tests, in admission to universities, in crime or incarceration rates, in school drop-out rates, in mortality or morbidity rates, in representation in various occupations, and so on), social scientists since the 1960s have gradually blurred or eliminated this double distinction between prejudice and discrimination, and between race and ethnicity. The result has been to universalize the concept of racism. Everybody can now be called a racist, including those who steadfastly refuse to make racial distinctions.

To blur the distinction between prejudice and discrimination, as the concept of 'institutional racism' does, achieves at least two aims. First, it dissociates 'racism' from individuals, and makes it an inherent property of social institutions, or indeed of entire societies. Second, it dissociates racism from consciousness and intentionality. Both individuals and institutions can be labeled 'racist' irrespective of beliefs, attitudes, or intentions. A classical liberal, for instance, who believes in philosophy of individual rights and equality of opportunity, without any consideration of race or ethnicity, can easily be labeled a racist if, for instance, she opposes 'race norming' of tests in employment or education. Thus, we find opponents on the two sides of a clear debate on whether to take race into account in social policy hurl the epithet of 'racist' at each other. 'Racism' is now void of meaning and reduced to pure invective.

The confounding of race and ethnicity has also served a variety of political agenda. The analytical use of the distinction between race and ethnicity is that racial (e.g., physical) categorization of groups leads to much more rigid, enduring, invidious, and stigmatizing social cleavages than ethnic (e.g., cultural) criteria of group membership. For example, the categorically different position of blacks in the USA compared to other minority groups, such as Hispanics or Asian Americans, can only be understood because they are overwhelmingly defined by the double stigma of racial slavery.

African-Americans were essentially treated as a stigmatized pariah group in American society. However, redefining American blacks, as merely one ethnic minority in a 'multicultural' society may, it is hoped, destigmatize their uniquely invidious position, but it does nothing to explain the stubborn resilience of their disabilities and predicaments in American society. The confounding of race and ethnicity in this cited example cuts both ways ideologically: it may on the one hand promote pride in 'black culture,' but it also underpins the racist argument of innate black inferiority. If blacks are but one ethnic group among many, how come they fail where others (notably Asian Americans) succeed?

3. Recent Developments

The unintended consequences of this broadening of the meaning of racism are three-fold. First, it robbed social science of a useful tool that permitted complex analysis of complicated social phenomena. Examples of such analyses are the relationship between prejudice and discrimination (one can be for instance, an unprejudiced discriminator or a prejudiced non-discriminator, depending on a social context which rewards or punishes discrimination); the difference between profoundly racist societies such as the Ante Bellum US and apartheid South Africa, and less racist ones such as Mexico or Brazil, where ethnic and class distinction often overshadow racial ones; and, the social consequence of stressing physical phenotypes such as skin color, as distinguished from cultural characteristics, such as language or religion, for the dynamics of group conflicts. Broadening the meaning of racism not only transformed a concept into an epithet; it simultaneously impoverished social analysis. It also made the teaching of race relations in race-polarized societies a minefield of political correctness liberally sprinkled with euphemisms and impervious to rational discourse.

Second, the broadening usage of racism and the confounding of race and ethnicity have noticeably weakened the effectiveness of remedial policies by facilitating and legitimating a shift from universalistic, race-blind policies of equal opportunity and individual rights, to one of groups rights, proportional representation, quota systems, and collective grievances and guilt. Policies such as race-based affirmative action in the USA are not only ineffective but even retrogressive because they are based on bad social science. The inherent contradiction involved in race-based affirmative action is that the remedy of 'positive discrimination' uses as a selection criterion the very stigma the policy seeks to eliminate. Surely, the way to reduce the social significance of race is not to classify the population into official race groups, to use these categories in official statistics and reports, and to request individuals to identify themselves by race for the purpose of school attendance, employment, promotion, college admission, faculty recruitment, etc.

4. Racism and Sociobiology

Third, the extension of the concept of race and its confounding with ethnicity are congruent with the sociobiological approach to the study of race and ethnicity that has been slowly gaining ground in the social sciences over the last 20 years of the twentieth century. The motor of natural selection is differential reproduction. Organisms are selected to behave in ways that are reproductively successful. Reproductive success can be direct or indirect. An organism can have offspring, or it can help other related organisms (that share a proportion of their genes) to reproduce. In short, nepotism—the favoring of kin—is a common strategy for maximizing inclusive fitness. This clearly operates in humans as in other social species, and is particularly evident in nuclear and extended families. However, members of ethnic and racial groups also define themselves as linked by common biological descent, that is, as large extended families. Racism and ethnocentrism can thus be seen as extended forms of nepotism. Members of such groups are typically more closely related to one another on average, than to members of other groups.

Racial and ethnic groups, in short, share the fundamental property of real, or at least putative, common descent, although they only constitute diluted forms of nepotism. The distinction between racial and ethnic groups is in the criteria used to determine membership: either physical traits in the case of races, or cultural characteristics in the case of ethnics. Preference for other individuals who resemble one physically is common where certain visible traits, such as skin color, enable one to discriminate easily between groups. However, in the case of neighboring groups that closely resemble one another (such as Swedes and Norwegians, or Zulu and Swazi), cultural traits, notably language and dialect, are more useful than biological features in establishing group membership.

The choice of racial or cultural criteria of group membership is thus opportunistically dictated by which does the best job of cheaply, quickly, easily, and reliably discriminating between co-existing groups. Sometimes both racial and cultural traits are used, but purely physical traits are often unreliable because neighboring groups frequently interbreed. Ethnocentrism, therefore, is far more general a phenomenon than racism, even though racism is generally present where it 'works,' e.g., in situations of recent long-distance migration rapidly putting in close contact large numbers of phenotypically distinct populations. Military conquest, colonialism, slavery, and labor migration are examples of such situations where racism thrives. Conversely, after several generations of contact and interbreeding, racism tends to wane, unless forcibly maintained as in the USA and South Africa, by a discriminatory political and legal system.

Seen in evolutionary perspective, racism becomes a natural propensity to favor individuals to whom one assesses to be more closely biologically related to one, and thus an expression of the nepotism that drives natural selection through inclusive fitness. This general preference for 'look-alikes' operates both at the individual level (e.g., in assortative mating between members of the same group), and between groups where group differences in the distribution of certain phenotypes are pronounced enough to make reliable and easy discrimination possible.

According to this evolutionary perspective, racism is both primordial, that is rooted in the biology of nepotism, and circumstantial or instrumental, varying with the degree to which co-existing groups look alike or different. It is neither inevitable nor unchangeable, but it is likely to occur whenever physical phenotypes, especially highly viable ones, such as skin pigmentation, sharply differentiate between groups. Extensive interbreeding, however, can quickly undermine it. Racism is also responsive in both directions, to state-imposed policies that either reward, or punish it. A state determined to maintain a racial caste society can do so for centuries, as US and South African history amply demonstrate. Conversely, the state can create an environment in which racial tolerance can thrive. The persistence or waning of racism is also a function of the degree of overlap between class and race. Racism is more likely to endure when large socioeconomic differences exist between racially defined groups, and to subside where those differences are reduced.

In conclusion, the double side of racism is that while, in all likelihood, it is indeed 'in our genes' as an expression of the biology of nepotism, it takes definite environmental conditions to become expressed. In this respect, it is no different from all our genetic propensities. The phenotype is always the product of interaction between the genotype and the environment. But that environment is not only changeable; it can also be manipulated for malign or benign ends. However, the main lesson of multiracial societies is that any state policy based on race, whether purportedly malign or benign, consolidates and perpetuates racial distinctions.

See also: Colonialism: Political Aspects; Colonization and Colonialism, History of; Discrimination: Racial; Ethnic Conflicts; Ethnicity, Sociology of; Eugenics, History of; Gender, Class, Race, and Ethnicity, Social Construction of; Genotype and Phenotype; Hate Crimes; Poverty, Sociology of; Prejudice in Society; Race and Gender Intersections; Race and the Law; Race Identity; Racial Relations; Racism, History of; Social Stratification; Urban Poverty in Neighborhoods; Xenophobia

Bibliography

- Allport G W 1954 The Nature of Prejudice. Addison-Wesley, Cambridge, MA
 Banton, M 1977 The Idea of Race. Tavistock, London
 Francis E K 1976 Interethnic Relations. Elsevier, New York
 Hutchinson J, Smith A D (eds.) 1996 Ethnicity. Oxford University Press, Oxford, UK
 Rex J, Mason D (eds.) 1986 Theories of Race and Ethnic Relations. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
 Schermerhorn R A 1970 Comparative Ethnic Relations. Random House, New York
 Sowell T 1994 Race and Culture. Basic Books, New York van den Berghe P L 1981 The Ethnic Phenomenon. Elsevier, New York

P. L. van den Berghe

Radicalism

The word 'radicalism' is derived from the Latin 'radix' meaning 'root.' Radicalism is any stance, practical, intellectual, or both, that goes to the root of existing practices, beliefs, or values. By transposition the term has shifted from meaning things related to the root or foundation of an institution or set of arrangements, to describing the view that existing arrangements should be transformed on the basis of foundations, roots, which are either to be rediscovered and re-asserted, or to be transplanted from the ideal to the actual. It is normally associated with the left, with liberalism (see Liberalism) and socialism (see Socialism), but since the term is relative, any fundamental criticism of or assault on existing practices can reasonably be termed radical.

1. Radicalism is a Relationship Term not a Content Term

Radicalism is, like conservatism (see Conservatism: Theory and Contemporary Political Ideology), a relationship term not a content term. It describes not any particular set of aspirations and aversions, but a distance between what exists and what is desired, and the way in which proposed changes are justified. Its particular character is therefore dependent on the historical circumstances in which it exists. Views put forward by radicals in Communist China might be shared by conservatives in Connecticut; the radicalism of California might be the traditionalism of Catalunya. Hannah Arendt's observation that the 'most radical revolutionary will become a conservative on the day after the revolution' may thus describe not only a change of heart following the acquisition of power, but a change in the relationship between a substantive policy which remains consistent, but which moves from opposition to implementation.

2. Some General Features of Radicalism as a Form Can Be Identified

Despite the contingency of radicalism however, some general features of its form can be identified. Radicalism normally involves the detection or description of principles that are considered to lie at the root of both existing and desired arrangements or ways of thinking. This concentration on a single and logical hierarchy of cause and effect or structure and foundation, is accompanied by a goal and a program that similarly concentrates on a single policy or set of policies the pursuit of which is intended or expected to transform a broad swathe of social life. The transformative keys are as various as are the forms of radicalism: democracy (see Democratic Theory), the market, religious faith.

3. Attempts to Describe Radicalism as a Feature of Personality or Social Situation

Various attempts have been made to account for radicalism in terms of the psychological disposition of radicals. This generally has been done by those who do not welcome whatever project radicals may currently be pursuing. These attempts are vitiated by the manner in which a change in the political location of an actor or group can alter the descriptive appropriateness of the term. Stalinists can move from radicalism to conservatism simply by successfully seizing and ex-exercising power. Their critical stance towards established authority comes to an end once they are themselves the embodiment of that authority.

4. Radicalism, Conservatism, Pragmatism, and Traditionalism

Since it goes to the roots, radicalism tends to ignore the complexity of the branches. It has, therefore, been contrasted with pragmatism, traditionalism, and conservatism. This contrast can be misleading. Pragmatism, traditionalism, and conservatism can be terms almost as contentless and historically contingent as radicalism. On the other hand, each of them operates as a matter of both historical fact and logical necessity with principles of selection, and none of them accepts unconditionally all aspects of existing arrangements and practices. Even the most stubborn conservative will have criteria for preferring Renoir to rats. Conversely, radicalism is a part of the tradition of many if not all societies, and the title of the English socialist and Christian Tawney's collection of essays, The Radical Tradition (1964) was only superficially paradoxical. It is, in other words, a conservative fallacy that tradition is homogeneous. Radicalism is one of its historically contingent components in most if not all societies. It is conversely a radical fallacy that radicalism seeks a transformation of all aspects of a society's life. A radical program seldom lacks foundations in some existing practices, institutions, or values, however peripheral or subordinated those may be at the time the program is advanced. And if radicals believe their own particular principles are deeply embedded in their society's traditions, they can recommend a return to roots rather than a departure from them. Franklin D. Roosevelt's remark, therefore, that the radical is someone with both feet firmly planted in the clouds, misses the point. The radical, rather, is someone who stands on their own patch of solid ground and wants the small cloud which they can see from that real but partial vantage point to encompass the whole sky.

5. Radicalism and Reason

The term 'radical' has been used most frequently to describe those who, whilst their criticism may be fundamental, do not reject the democratic and liberal methods of reason and persuasion in favour of insurrection or coup. Radicalism normally implies an appeal to reason, and therefore a dependence on persuasion, reasoned assent, and free individual choice. But appeals to other roots, instinct, faith, national myth are possible and have been made. Radicalism, as a matter of historical nomenclature, is more likely to be used to describe the ambitious advocacy of democracy or markets than of totali-tarianism (see Totalitarianism) or authoritarianism. But it can describe Fascists who appeal to racial myth or religious extremists who demand that social life be determined, and law applied, on the basis of their interpretation of Christianity, Islam, or Hinduism.

6. Radicalism and Rulers

Were radicalism simply an abstract disposition, then it might be found to characterize equally rulers and their critics. But because of its association with challenges to existing arrangements, if it does characterize rulers, it is presented frequently by them as if they were Davids facing the Goliaths of custom or entrenched interest. Radicalism as a characteristic of government has usually laid great stress on the allegedly tremendous, and unfairly insuperable, obstacles in its path. Radicalism out of power has the real adversary of incumbent elites. Radicalism in power must to an extent invent enemies to maintain its radical credentials. It is not an accident that those most eager to use the powers of government to shape economy, society, or religion to their own favored roots are most likely to detect enemies within.

7. Approbatory and Critical Uses of the Term

'Radical' and 'radicalism' have been used with approbatory, pejorative, critical, or neutral tone according to the different historical locations in which they have been employed. Whereas in the 1960s and 1970s 'radical' was often used by conservatives to dismiss the proposals of their opponents, by the end of the twentieth century the term could be employed by left and right alike with entirely positive purpose. In the United Kingdom, Prime Minister Tony Blair, after the Labour Party's election victory of 1997, used radical to mean progressive, optimistic, forward looking, and subsumed socialism and liberalism under the title. The leader of the Conservative Party, William Hague, was equally able to recommend what he termed radical measures, for the term can mean thorough, imaginative, unhidebound.

8. Historical Instances of Radicalism

As an abstract term, therefore, radicalism lacks content, though it may have a distinguishable form, and can gain substance only in context. Its substantial meanings have, therefore, been historical and particular, proper names rather than taxonomic categories. 'Radical' as an adjective qualifying a noun has been more common than 'radicalism' as a noun by itself: radical liberalism in eighteenth century Europe; radical philosophy, the radical right, and radical feminism in the twentieth century.

Because any set of arrangements can be subjected to radical appraisal, the terms 'radical' and 'radicalism' have been applied to an extremely wide range of ideas and movements, from Lollards in fourteenth century Europe, Diggers and Levellers during the English revolution of the seventeenth century, to neo-Nazis in twenty-first century Europe and North American. The earliest substantial use was to describe democrats and liberals in the eighteenth century, those inspired by human rights, and by the examples of the American and French Revolutions. Radical liberalism and radical democracy were movements of active opinion that challenged the old order in Europe with demands based on individual social, civil, and political rights. In the nineteenth century, radicalism concentrated on the extension of political rights. The various fascist movements of the mid-twentieth century have been described as the radical right, in that they were in part an accentuation of aims and aversions already present in conservative and right wing politics. In the 1960s and 1970s, the New Left in Europe and North American was an instance of radicalism with a broad range of targets, but a narrower range of solutions from within which each segment chose its favorite: the abolition of capitalism, the overthrow of gerontocracy, the transformation of consciousness with drugs, or the decentralization and de-industrialization of western society. A different sort of radicalism, though one which also stressed individual liberation, was found within the New Right of the 1980s and 1990s. Here, the character of the radical demand was made more complex by a double track radicalism, on the one hand calling for a root and branch destruction of what were seen as restraints on the market and hence on individual utility maximization and self-fulfilment through choice about the use of property, but on the other calling for a radical imposition of cultural and moral controls, if necessary by government. By the end of the twentieth century radicalism was an aspect of environmental or green theory (see Green Parties), and of feminism. Radicalism had, too, religious avatars in the New Christian Right in the US, Islamism in Asia and the Middle East (see Islamic Fundamentalism), and political Hinduism in India. But in each case, within the variety of the movement, the breadth of targets was given coherence by the unity of ascribed causes for identified malaises.

9. Conclusion

Not only does the term radicalism lack any firm historical content, it possesses an equal normative flexibility, and is used neutrally and descriptively, and as a term of both approval and condemnation. For those who believe that language is the only reality we have, it provides a congenial illustration.

A radical may be a person with a vision, but it is usually a vision derived from experience, an extension of the radical's own values to a whole society. There is a conservative foundation for radical politics, which is why, once radicals achieve power, they can appear to shift from change to conservation. Radicals are not for change as such, but only, like conservatives, for particular sets of arrangements, for the cultivation of which change may appear necessary, and for the achievement of which they believe they have identified a single cause or cluster of causes.

See also: Communism; Communist Parties; National Socialism and Fascism; Parties/Movements: Extreme Right; Revolutions, History of; Revolutions, Sociology of; Revolutions, Theories of; Social Movements, Sociology of

Bibliography

- Belchem J 1996 Popular Radicalism in Nineteenth-century Britain. Macmillan, Basingstoke, UK
- Biagini E F 1996 Citizenship and Community: Liberals, Radicals and Collective Identities in the British Isles, 1865–1931. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Blinkhorn M (ed.) 1990 Fascists and Conservatives: The Radical Right and the Establishment in Twentieth-century Europe. Unwin Hyman, London
- Inglis F 1982 Radical Earnestness: English Social Theory 1880–1980. Robertson, Oxford, UK
- Kaplan J, Weinberg L 1999 The Emergence of a Euro-American Radical Right. Rutgers University Press, New Brunswick, NJ
- Kramnick I 1990 Republicanism and Bourgeois Radicalism: Political Ideology in Late Eighteenth Century England and America. Cornell University Press, Ithica, NY
- Tawney R H 1964 The Radical Tradition: Twelve Essays on Politics, Education and Literature. George Allen & Unwin, London
- Wilks S 1993 Talking About Tomorrow: A New Radical Politics. Pluto/New Times, London

R. Barker

Radio as Medium

Radio, the transmission of sound via electromagnetic waves, is the most widely used electronic means of communication on the globe. It is second only to spoken language and nonverbal interaction as a medium of human communication. Despite the broad reach of television and the growing role of cable and Internet, radio remains an important arena of cultural expression, commerce, politics, and education in advanced capitalist countries. In many developing countries, including most of Africa, much of Asia, and the Middle East, and parts of Latin America, Eastern Europe, and Oceania, radio continues to be the primary means of mass communication. Due to its mobility, low cost, and flexibility, radio is one of the fastest growing media of communication worldwide.

Although radio has a variety of scientific and commercial applications as a technology of radio wave transmission (e.g., radio astronomy, radio telegraphy, radio telephony), as a social medium radio has been configured principally as a means of point-to-mass communication or broadcasting. Two broad models of radio broadcasting emerged during the first half of the twentieth century: commercial broadcasting and public monopoly broadcasting. While both models defined the radio wave spectrum as a public resource or good, they differed on whether the spectrum should be exploited by competing private entities for profit or developed by a single public entity as a nonprofit service. During the last quarter of the twentieth century both commercial broadcasters and community-based nonprofit broadcasters challenged the public monopoly model and launched new and hybrid broadcasting forms. This article examines the cultural, technological, economic, and political factors that shaped radio as a social medium of broadcasting.

1. Technology and Cultural Form

Radio is comprised of a dynamic sound technology wedded to a flexible yet resilient set of cultural practices. This combination of technological and cultural factors both enables and constrains radio as a medium. Radio production, for example, is shaped by the capacities of the technology (real-time, sound-only) as well as the forms of expression that have been adapted to the medium over time (program genres, formats, and presentation styles). Radio reception is likewise constrained. For example, a Walkman radio differs from a console radio in both its technological configuration and in the cultural assumptions that shape its use (mobile-individualized listening vs. situated-shared listening). This interaction of technology and culture shapes not only the form and content of the radio medium, but radio's relationship to time, space, community, and identity.

In this sense, a defining feature of radio as a technology and cultural form is its conflicted relationship to modernity. On the one hand, radio broadcasting represents a heightened sense of movement towards modernity; that is, movement toward a condition in which human social relations are increasingly abstract, individualized, and future-directed. To the extent that radio is understood to speed up processes of social progress and development (through, for example, the diffusion of innovations) the medium evokes a sense of 'hypermodernity.' On the other hand, radio provides a means of resisting or allaying the impact of increased mobility and rationalization in social life. To the extent that radio is used as a tool for building intimacy and community in an individuated and changeable modern world, broadcasting practices are 'antimodern.'

Radio broadcasting both reflects and constitutes uniquely modern forms of social organization. It works to integrate and coordinate an increasingly mobile, dispersed, and complex society, at the same time that it promotes the privatization of social life. The simultaneous access of vast numbers of isolated listeners to a single radio content creates a virtual common space that tends to become coterminous with the nation (due, in part, to government regulation and commercial market formation). In this way, radio, like print and cinema, acts as a medium for the 'community in anonymity which is the hallmark of modern nations' (Anderson 1991 p. 36).

At the same time, however, radio voices have a materiality that reproduces the immediate, tactile quality of primary orality in a number of ways. Roland Barthes's concept of the 'grain' of the voice is helpful in characterizing the somatic presence of radio voices. Barthes (1990) describes the grain as 'the body in the voice as it sings;' that is, the listener's sense of the physical presence of the performer in the sound of his or her voice (p. 299). Walter Ong (1995) argues that radio talk has the same ability as oral speech to envelope and immerse listeners, uniting the audience 'with themselves and with the speaker' (p. 74). Indeed, broadcasters actively work to recreate the sociability and interactivity of oral settings by developing intimate, chatty forms of radio talk. In this way, radio gives listeners a sense of continuity with older forms of intimacy and community at the same time that it enables distinctly modern forms of social life.

2. History and Political Economy

Radio has historically been deployed by a range of political and economic institutions largely within the bounds of the nation-state. During the last two decades of the twentieth century radio changed from a predominantly public service medium to an eminently commercial one. To understand the meaning of this global transformation it is necessary to investigate the social forces that guided and shaped radio broadcasting beginning in the 1920s. Among the most important influences on the medium have been national and transnational communication corporations, the state (nationalist and expansionist) and community groups.

2.1 Beginnings: The 1920s and 1930s

Radio expanded from a means of point-to-point communication to a medium of point-to-mass communication, or broadcasting, during the 1920s and 1930s. The rise of broadcasting was both shaped by and reflective of larger political and economic changes in the first quarter of the twentieth century, including the rise of transnational communication corporations following World War I (e.g., Philips, RCA, Telefunken), the growth of product marketing, increased trade in cultural goods (e.g., film and recorded music), and the escalation of both nationalism and international expansion. Technological developments including voice broadcasting (replacing Morse code) and high-power radio transmissions were also necessary ingredients for broadcasting.

Approaching the medium as a strategic communication technology, scarce resource, and tool for national integration, central governments began asserting control over the radio spectrum in the 1910s and 1920s. In part, this followed the pattern established by state intervention in telegraph and telephone development. As a US Commerce Department publication lamented, 'When the social possibilities of broadcasting became apparent many countries determined upon maintaining it as a public utility, particularly those where government ownership of communication services had previously been the rule' (Batson 1932, p. 2). Even in the USA, however, the central government claimed radio as a public resource and used regulatory powers to promote a national broadcasting system with citizenship and public service requirements for broadcasters. These regulations, codified in the 1927 Radio Act and again in the Communications Act of 1934, granted concessions or licenses for commercial broadcasting and actively encouraged the development of commercial networks on a national scale.

Radio was shaped by the climate of intense nationalism and international expansion in which it was born. In industrialized countries radio was viewed as a means of consolidating the nation as both market and polity, strengthening ties with colonies and dependencies and opening foreign markets. For example, the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) began its Empire Service in 1932, while the Japanese government established broadcasting stations in occupied territories in both Korea and China. US media corporations such as the Radio Corporation of America, General Electric, and Westinghouse financed broadcasting stations in foreign markets in order to promote the sale of radio receivers (e.g., Latin America). In less industrialized countries and colonial territories broadcasting rarely reached beyond a few major cities and was often limited to the interests of colonial governments (e.g., Hong Kong, Kenya).

In post-revolutionary societies such as Mexico and Soviet Russia, as well as fascist countries like Germany and Italy, the state turned to radio as a tool for building political solidarity and cultural identity through official broadcasting projects and the distribution of radio sets for both public and in-home listening. In Nazi Germany inexpensive radio sets known as the 'People's Wireless' or 'Goebbels' Lips' allowed listeners to tune in to Adolf Hitler's speeches but blocked the reception of foreign stations (Euro-media Research Group 1997, p. 79). In almost all independent countries radio developed within a nationalistic framework: Broadcasters were required to be citizens transmitting from national soil, the state was given special access to the medium on the grounds of national interest and security, and content was frequently regulated to promote and 'improve' the national culture (e.g., language and music requirements).

Although radio broadcasting took many different forms, two broad types of radio organization—commercial broadcasting and public monopoly broadcasting—emerged during this period. In the commercial model, radio programs were designed to attract large audiences that could be sold to consumer product advertisers through program sponsorship or 'spot' advertisements. This model predominated only in the USA and Latin America, although Canada, Australia, and New Zealand had significant commercial radio sectors and small pockets of commercial radio existed elsewhere. In France and Luxembourg, for example, private broadcasters transmitted commercial programs in direct competition with the BBC (e.g., Radio Luxembourg, Radio-Normandie). In the vast majority of countries and occupied territories radio was a public monopoly (or modified monopoly) financed by government subsidy or receiver license fees and subject to varying degrees of government control. These two general models yielded different geographies of broadcasting: Whereas public monopolies tended to produce a small number of stations serving the national community (with limited regional or local service), commercial systems tended to generate a large number of stations serving the local community. With the rise of national networks, however, local commercial affiliates developed a strong national orientation.

Only countries in North America and Western Europe approached universal radio access by the end of the 1930s when, for example, about 75 percent of the British population had radios. One of the most influential broadcasts of the era, Franklin Roosevelt's first 'Fireside Chat' of March 18, 1933, was heard by an estimated audience of 60 million (out of a total population of about 120 million). Urban and industrializing areas of Latin America, Oceania, and Asia, including the Soviet Union, had small but growing numbers of radio listeners. Rural parts of these regions, along with most of Africa and the Middle East, had negligible radio listenership.

2.2 Take-Offs and Transitions: The 1940s and 1950s

World War II had a major impact on radio organization, content, and listenership. Timely broadcasts of news and information greatly increased the utility of the medium, promoted frequent listening and raised demand for radio sets both during and after the war. Radio listening grew even in countries where most people could not afford radio sets (e.g., Egypt) 'because merchants or owners of coffee shops would have a set to attract customers' (Dabbous 1994, p. 65). The role of the central state in broadcasting also increased significantly on both the domestic and international fronts. At home, the state took an interest in the security and efficiency of the radio system. Official reports and government-sponsored programs proliferated on both public monopoly and commercial radio stations. In some cases (e.g., Vichy France) the state used the wartime emergency to prohibit private broadcasting and institute a public monopoly system.

International broadcasting was exploited by all of the belligerents during the war, largely in response to Italy and Germany who invested heavily in short-wave broadcasting. The BBC, for example, became the medium for Charles de Gaulle's appeals to the French Resistance, beginning with his celebrated broadcast of June 18, 1940. The US government developed international broadcasting projects aimed at Asia, Europe, and Latin America. In the case of Latin America, the US Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs developed a wartime broadcasting offensive that worked to solidify US hegemony in the region while strengthening the cultural influence of US advertisers and a small number of Latin American broadcasters. In 1948 the Coordinator's radio unit was transferred to the US State Department where it became the Voice of America (VOA) broadcasting service. By the end of the war, international broadcasting became the provision of the central state.

Radio broadcasting became one of the most important ideological and political tools of the Cold War. Along with international broadcasting, the USA, Soviet Union, and their allies sponsored clandestine radio stations in countries around the world (e.g., Guatemala, Turkey, Yugoslavia). The mobility and low cost of radio, however, also made it a powerful tool for grassroots revolutionary movements in the postwar period. Communist insurgents in China in the late 1940s and revolutionaries in Cuba in the late 1950s used clandestine broadcasting stations to maneuver against their enemies and mobilize popular support. Fidel Castro's Radio Rebelde, for example, became a model of effective clandestine broadcasting for decades to come.

Most of the countries that fought for independence at the end of World War II (e.g., China, India, Indonesia) followed a path similar to earlier postrevolutionary societies: They established state-directed broadcasting systems that controlled language and content and used the medium for nationalist ends. New governments struggled to improve broadcasting coverage and increase listenership quickly and efficiently. Consequently, broadcasting services were often highly centralized and limited to one or two national services (e.g., the Central People's Broadcasting Station in Beijing, China).

The history of radio in the postwar period was also shaped by the rise of a second broadcasting medium:

television. Although television fundamentally transformed radio broadcasting in the USA during this period, television's impact was much more gradual worldwide. Radio remained a public monopoly in most countries and a strong competitor for the national audience. In parts of Europe (e.g., Italy, Norway, Sweden) television failed to reach a majority of the population until the early 1960s and in Latin America the high cost of television guaranteed that radio would continue as the primary mass medium. Indeed, this period can be characterized as a golden age of radio in countries with developed broadcasting systems. In Latin America, for example, popular music (e.g., mambos, rancheras, sambas) provided the primary material for broadcasting while the radionovela (drama serial) reached the height of its popularity. In both commercial and public monopoly systems this was an important period of genre formation, with the live production of musical variety programs, comedies, soap operas, novelas, news, and game shows filling the airwaves.

In the USA radio changed radically beginning in the early 1950s. In order to develop national television networks, broadcasting corporations like the National Broadcasting Company stripped capital, talent, and program genres from radio and ultimately dismantled their national radio networks. Without national network programming, radio stations were forced to reorient their activities to the local and regional level and cultivate new markets (e.g., teenagers, ethnic minorities, and out-of-home listeners). Radio content became increasingly diversified and localized as radio shifted to a repertoire of recorded music supervised by disk jockeys (DJs) who advertised products and promoted the radio station. By the late 1950s stations were catering to narrow market segments with increasingly standardized program formats (e.g., 'beautiful music', and 'top-40').

Overall the early postwar period was marked by two divergent trends in radio broadcasting. While richer Western countries moved away from radio and toward television as the primary broadcast medium, many newly independent, postcolonial countries looked to radio as the primary tool for national communication and unification projects. Although television came to symbolize development, it remained impractical for the vast majority of countries due to high costs and infrastructure limitations. Beginning in the postwar decades, then, a significant divide emerged and grew between countries that saw high levels of television penetration beginning in the second half of the 1950s and those in which radio remained the primary mass medium through the late 1970s and beyond.

2.3 Change and Competition: The 1960s and 1970s

Public monopoly broadcasting remained dominant during this period despite technological changes and increasing competition from television. In the countries that emerged from the last major wave of decolonization (e.g., Algeria, Nigeria, Uganda) public monopoly broadcasting with strong government influence was the norm. In their study, Broadcasting in the Third World, Elihu Katz and George Wedell (1977) noted the tendency towards government control of radio broadcasting in many developing countries. In the case of Nigeria, for example, they observed that: 'The demands of a government needing to assert its authority over a country of 50 million people of diverse ethnic, linguistic, and cultural characteristics, between 70 and 80 percent of whom were illiterate, made closer control of broadcasting inevitable' (p. 83).

At the same time, however, public monopoly broadcasters faced growing criticism for controlling and limiting public information. In India, for example, a 1964 government report noted that 'Suspicion of official information has deepened in India because of an incorrect, even improper use of media for personalized publicity and an undue accent on [government] achievements ...' (Ninan 1998, p. 4). In France, during the political crisis of 1968, listeners turned to commercial radio stations outside of France (the peripheral stations) to hear balanced coverage of events that French radio covered with a progovernment bias. In many countries protests against the public monopoly system were registered in the form of unlicensed, pirate stations operating within the national territory. While some countries managed to stave off reforms, significant liberalization began during this period. For example, Italy legalized private broadcasting in 1976 and Sweden permitted noncommercial 'neighborhood radio' as early as 1978.

During the same period commercial broadcasting (both television and radio) came under attack as a wasteland of low-quality programming that failed to meet basic public needs for information, education, and culture. In the USA, legislators responded with the Public Broadcasting Act of 1967 which created a public corporation that helped to finance educational television as well as National Public Radio, a public service national radio network. In Latin America, where radio became accessible to the majority of the population during this period, most governments either initiated or greatly expanded the use of radio in national education projects. Overall, this period witnessed a sizable growth in educational and nonprofit broadcasting by diverse civic groups, including religious organizations, universities, and other nonprofit groups.

Although radio listening increased worldwide during this period, the divide between rich and poor countries continued. Radio's growth in the developed world was driven, in part, by innovations such as frequency modulation broadcasting (FM) and transistor radios. While FM radio made high-fidelity broadcasting possible, inexpensive transistor sets increased radio's portability outside of the home and facilitated the expansion of car radio. In the USA, for example, both innovations helped to push the number of radio sets to 1,813 per 1,000 population by 1975. In the developing world, however, FM expanded much more slowly due to the costs of conversion from amplitude modulation (AM) receivers. In addition, although inexpensive transistor sets made radio much more accessible to communities without electricity, the price of batteries remained prohibitively high for many listeners. Thus radio penetration remained relatively low in poorer regions of the world at the end of the decade. Asia and the Middle East, for example, had 62 sets per 1,000 population while Africa had 70 sets per 1,000 population in 1977 (Katz and Wedell 1977, p. 62).

2.4 Liberalization, Deregulation, and Consolidation: The 1980s and 1990s

The move to reform public monopoly broadcasting that began in the 1970s grew enormously during the 1980s. Liberalization was a response to a variety of pressures: social pressure to increase political and cultural pluralism over the air, political pressure to reduce public spending (especially during a time of economic crisis), and ideological pressure in favor of free market capitalism. This process was particularly evident in Western Europe, where local noncommercial stations were legalized in the early 1980s, followed by commercial stations in the mid- to late-1980s (e.g., Belgium, Denmark, FRG). In many cases, the radio system was opened to allow competition at the local level while the public monopoly on national radio broadcasting remained in place (e.g., the UK).

After the break-up of the Soviet Union and the Eastern Bloc in the late 1980s, most of the world's radio systems faced liberalization of some kind. Much of Eastern Europe became an unregulated market open to competition from North American and European companies (although, in fact, development remained limited due to severe economic dislocation in the region). In Africa most countries opened their radio systems to commercial broadcasting, although commercial development was also highly circumscribed by economic conditions. South Africa, for example, began to liberalize its broadcasting system in the mid-1990s with the privatization of some government-owned stations, licensing of new commercial stations, and the establishment of community broadcasting. Only in the Arab world did monopoly systems remain largely unscathed.

What began as liberalization in the 1980s became a move toward market regulation in the 1990s. As commercial broadcasters grew and faced local competition, they moved toward networking, syndication, and consolidation at a national level. In Sweden, for example, although the Radio Act of 1996 prohibited multiple ownership 'all but a few of the more than 90 commercial stations [were] closely integrated into four more or less national networks' (Euromedia Research Group 1997, p. 218). A similar process took place in France where a political movement in opposition to the public broadcasting monopoly was ultimately exploited by commercial interests. Whereas the 1980s had been dominated by small, activist stations, the 1990s witnessed the 'oligopolization of the private radio sector in France' at the hands of professional broadcasting corporations (Kuhn 1995, p. 107).

The move towards market regulation also produced oligopoly in the US radio industry. Beginning in the early 1980s, deregulation removed federal content regulations and reduced the limits on cross-ownership of media. With the Telecommunications Act of 1996 all national limits on station ownership were removed, opening the door to a series of mergers and consolidations. By the year 2000 radio broadcasting had moved from monopolistic competition to oligopoly: Many major cities had one station owner with 40 percent of the market and some had two owners with 70 percent of the market. According to Charles Fairchild (1999) the 1996 deregulation aimed, in part, to make radio competitive with other consolidated media industries, thus preparing the radio system for exploitation by integrated media conglomerates. At the same time, developments such as Internet radio and digital audio broadcasting (DAB) provided ideal media platforms for the convergence of recorded music, text, and image through a real-time broadcasting-style format.

Radio reached almost every person on the globe by the end of the twentieth century. Radio listening continued to grow in the world's expanding urban areas, primarily in the form of in-car and portable radio listening. Radio listening also grew in rural areas due to electrification projects as well as the development of low-tech, wind-up radio receivers that finally made radio affordable in areas without electricity. Radio's popularity also increased during this period as broadcasters exploited the potential interactivity and intimacy of the medium. Listener-participation talk shows reinvigorated the medium and promoted public discussion of personal topics (especially personal relationships) as well as political issues in countries as different as China, Mexico, and the USA.

In the growing commercial sector, radio stations delivered increasingly standardized program formats to targeted market segments. Format-specific radio chains developed a 'brand value' or 'lifestyle statement' that could be 'applied profitably to other aspects of their listeners' lives,' including other forms of media consumption (Hendy 2000, p. 47). Convergence and conglomeration in radio and related media industries (recorded music, television, Internet), as well as the growth of satellite delivery systems, set the stage for transnational deployment of increasingly 'branded' radio services. Although linguistic diversity and national regulatory policies continued to pose obstacles, regional radio integration was feasible in a few linguistically and economically unified regions (e.g., the Southern Cone of Latin America and the European Economic Community).

In contrast, the last decade of the twentieth century was also a boom period for decentralized community-based radio broadcasting. Community broadcasting, which emphasized community control and participation, was nurtured by democratization movements around the globe. The World Association of Community Radio Broadcasters (AMARC) provided a venue for the organization and promotion of community radio and lobbied for 'social enterprise' broadcasting as a means of encouraging economically viable community stations. Just such a model of community radio was initiated in South Africa in the second half of the 1990s, where nonprofit community broadcasters were allowed to support themselves through advertising. These community stations, some of which served populations of over 50,000, provided local service where none had existed before and covered events such as the local Truth and Reconciliation Hearings. By 2000, despite the vocal protests of the commercial broadcasting industry, even the United States Federal Communication Commission had approved noncommercial low-power FM broadcasting at the community level.

3. The Future of Radio Broadcasting

Radio's future is likely to unfold along two quite different paths in the early twenty-first century. First, radio's flexibility as a real-time, sound-only medium will ensure its survival as a social medium of broadcasting. Radio will continue to accompany people while they drive cars, work, and do other activities that require visual attention and mobility. Radio's flexibility and low cost will continue to drive the proliferation of small, decentralized stations at the local level. In less developed regions of the world this form of traditional radio broadcasting will continue to be a viable medium for development by commercial, governmental, and nonprofit groups.

Second, radio will tend to merge with other digital media. Both industrial conglomeration and technological convergence will work to collapse the distinction between radio, television, and Internet. This will occur primarily in advanced capitalist countries where radio will be integrated into multimedia formats that can be delivered via satellite, cable, and mobile radio telephony to privatized consumers. At the same time, a real-time 'radio' style of mass intimacy and anonymous interactivity will continue to shape electronic media and their contradictory relationship to modern life.

See also: Broadcasting: General; Broadcasting: Regulation; International Communication: History; International Communication: Regulation; Media Effects; Media Imperialism; Media, Uses of; Talk Show in Media; Television: History; Television: Industry

Strauss N (ed.) 1993 Radiotext(e). Semiotext(e). Columbia University, New York
Williams R 1974 Television: Technology and Cultural Form. Schocken Books, New York

J. E. Hayes

Bibliography

- Anderson B R O'G 1991 Imagined Communities. Verso, London
Barthes R 1990 The grain of the voice. In: Firth S, Goodwin A (eds.) On Record: Rock, Pop, and the Written Word. Pantheon Books, New York, pp. 293–300
Batson L D 1932 Radio Markets of the World. Government Printing Office, Washington, DC
Dabbous S 1994 Egypt. In: Kamalipour Y R, Mowlana H (eds.) Mass Media in the Middle East. Greenwood Press, Westport, CT, pp. 64–8
Douglas S J 1999 Listening In: Radio and the American Imagination: from Amos 'n Andy and Edward R. Murrow to Wolfman Jack and Howard Stern. Times Books, New York
Euromedia Research Group (ed.) B. S. Ostergaard 1992 The Media in Western Europe. Sage, London
Fairchild C 1999 Deteritorizing radio: deregulation and the continuing triumph of the corporatist perspective in the USA. Media Culture and Society 21: 549–61
Hayes J E 2000 Radio. In: Balderston D, González M (eds.) Encyclopedia of Contemporary Latin American and Caribbean Cultures. Routledge, London, Vol. 1, pp. 1234–8
Hayes J E 2000 Radio Nation: Communication, Popular Culture and Nationalism in Mexico, 1920–1950. University of Arizona Press, Tucson, AZ
Hendy D 2000 Radio in the Global Age. Blackwell Publishers, Malden, MA
Hilmes M 1996 Radio Voices: American Broadcasting, 1922–1952. University of Minnesota Press, Minneapolis, MN
Hong L 1994 Radio Revival in China. Beijing Review 37: 15–18
Kamalipour Y R, Mowlana H (eds.) 1994 Mass Media in the Middle East. Greenwood Press, Westport, CT
Katz E, Wedell G 1977 Broadcasting in the Third World. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
Kuhn R 1995 Radio. In: The Media in France. Routledge, London, pp. 77–108
Lent J A (ed.) 1978 Broadcasting in Asia and the Pacific. Temple University Press, Philadelphia, PA
McDaniel D O 1994 Broadcasting in the Malay World. Ablex, Norwood, NJ
Miller T 1997 Radio. In: Cunningham S, Turner G (eds.) The Media in Australia. Allen & Unwin, St. Leonards, NSW, pp. 47–69
Ninan S 1998 History of Indian broadcasting reform. In: Price M E, Verhulst S (eds.) Broadcasting Reform in India. Oxford University Press, Delhi, India, pp. 1–21
Ong W 1995 Orality and Literacy. Routledge, London
Ritchie S E 1999 The impact of community radio broadcasting on rural development in South Africa. In: Radio Africa '99: Proceedings of the Third Regional Workshop on Radio Communication in Africa. University of Botswana, Gaborone, Botswana, pp. 134–7
Scannell P, Cardiff D 1991 A Social History of British Broadcasting. Blackwell, Oxford

Random Assignment: Implementation in Complex Field Settings

Random assignment of units to treatment and control groups allows researchers to make the strongest possible causal connection between the treatment and observed outcomes. This article considers the way in which random assignment is implemented in educational and social field settings.

1. Widespread Acceptance of Random Assignment

The last three decades of the twentieth century have seen widespread acceptance of random assignment as an important aspect of high-quality research studies designed to test the effectiveness of interventions. In the 1970s and 1980s, proponents of randomized designs for studying program impacts began to assemble a literature attesting to their feasibility and frequent use (Boruch 1974, Boruch et al. 1978, Boruch and Wothke 1985). By the 1990s, randomized experiments in the social sciences had become so numerous that Greenberg and Shroder (1997) prepared a 500-page compendium of recent experiments in various content areas. The US Congress now routinely specifies that random assignment be used in studies of the effectiveness of federally funded programs, and recently called for a random assignment study of Head Start, America's flagship social program for disadvantaged children (Advisory Committee on Head Start Research and Evaluation 1999).

Randomized experiments have limitations as research vehicles (see Cook and Campbell 1979 for a discussion of the strengths and weaknesses of randomized experiments), and they are not universally accepted as the best way to learn about program effectiveness. One sector of the evaluation community espouses the virtues of qualitative research in place of randomized experiments and other quantitative approaches (e.g., Guba and Lincoln 1982), while another sector is more interested in issues of generalizability than internal validity (e.g., Cronbach 1982). Cook (1999) has written about the anti-random assignment culture that exists in American schools of education. Still, there is no denying that American society relies heavily on randomized experiments as one source of information about the effectiveness of social programs (St. Pierre and Puma 2000).

2. The Purpose of Random Assignment

As long as researchers take the time to explain the strengths and weaknesses of random assignment studies, those who commonly question experiments are easily able to understand the rationale underlying random assignment. Perhaps most helpful is the argument that random assignment is a special purpose tool, and while it is good only for one purpose, for making causal inferences, it is far better for that purpose than any alternative. As a special purpose tool, random assignment has many limitations. For example, it does not assure group comparability over time (attrition from the evaluation sample may result in nonrandom analytic groups), it cannot ensure that subjects remain in the intervention being studied (with or without random assignment, interventions may incur high dropout rates), and it does not help with issues of generalizability (a one-site random assignment study is no more generalizable than a one-site quasi-experiment). Cook and Campbell (1979) stated it clearly: 'Though random assignment is germane to the research goal of assessing whether the treatment may have caused any observed effects, it is conceptually irrelevant to all other research goals' (p. 343).

3. Common Objections to Random Assignment

Most of the common objections to random assignment in studies of program effectiveness do not dispute its utility as a tool for understanding causal connections. Instead, objections take other forms. Some are made in an attempt to avoid participation in a research study. Take the oft-made claim that 'random assignment is unethical' or that 'random assignment means denying services to some subjects.' These are political statements, either made without understanding what random assignment means, or made in an attempt to retain control over which subjects are to be served by a given social program.

When there is excess demand for a social intervention, program operators are in the position of denying services to needy families every day as they make decisions about which families are the neediest or the most deserving. As long as a randomized experimental study of such an in-demand program does not reduce the total number of subjects served, then there is no denial of services—the same aggregate number of families are served with or without an experiment. What an experiment does change is the mechanism for selecting which families receive the services; random assignment is used to decide who participates in the program instead of the judgment of program staff. Thus, when program operators say that random assignment is unethical or involves denying services, they usually are saying that they don't want to give up the power to determine which families are served.

But what about denying services to families? Is this always unethical? Suppose a funding agency wants to learn about the effectiveness of one of its social programs and in the absence of evidence of effectiveness, the funding agency plans to withdraw its support. Suppose further that there is no waiting list and hence that a randomized experiment would make it impossible to maintain aggregate service levels since some families would be assigned to a control group. In this case, the ethical problem of doing an experiment which reduces the number of families serviced by a social program has to be weighed against the possibly greater ethical problem of not doing an experiment and risking reduced funding for the entire program.

An underlying, and typically unvoiced, objection to random assignment is that program staff or funders assume the effectiveness of social programs instead of worrying about whether scarce resources are being spent in the most appropriate manner. This is understandable, since scientific skepticism seems to counteract the ability of program operators to do their best work. But again, this is a political issue—that it is appropriate to assume the effectiveness of a social program instead of subjecting it to a rigorous test.

Another objection to random assignment is that assignment to a control group 'feels bad' to program staff and to the families they serve. The argument that randomization is like a lottery doesn't work in many social program settings. Why? Because a lottery usually has only one winner, and the losers can take solace in the fact that they are in the great majority. On the other hand, those assigned to the control group in a randomized study do not view their assignment the same way they view a lottery loss, since the odds of winning the lottery are miniscule, whereas the odds of being randomly assigned to the desired social program are usually 50/50.

Some other arguments are that randomized experiments are expensive (Levitan 1992) or that they take a long time. The response to this sort of complaint is, 'Compared to what?' A randomized experiment is expensive and time-consuming when compared with the alternative of doing no research at all. But this is rarely a realistic alternative. Many quasi-experimental alternatives are just as expensive (any design in which data are collected from a treatment group and a nonequivalent comparison group) and time-consuming (the common pre-post study) as randomized studies. Some alternative approaches are quick and inexpensive, for example, relying on data collected for other purposes. However, the fact is that none of these alternatives are capable of doing the one thing that randomized studies excel at—providing strong evidence about causal connections. The problem with using alternatives to random assignment to study program effectiveness is that even if they are less expensive, even if they require less time, even if they are easier to implement, they rarely are worth the time and money spent on them. Why? Because the results are not helpful for their intended purpose—for understanding program effectiveness. To paraphrase the common aphorism about education, ‘If you think randomized studies are expensive, try ignorance.’

4. Conditions Making Random Assignment Easier

There are several circumstances that reduce the difficulty of implementing random assignment studies. Suppose an intervention program is in short supply and there is a list of subjects waiting to participate. This often happens with Head Start (the largest federal preschool program in the US) projects in large metropolitan areas. If being placed on a waiting list means that a family is likely to miss a substantial portion of the Head Start year, then randomly assigning families from the waiting list to be in the program or in a control group might well be preferable to being on the waiting list with certainty. The absence of a waiting list does not mean that subjects are uninterested in a program. It often means that program staff do not want to spend time and energy on recruiting until they have openings. Hence, it is possible in short-supply situations for researchers to generate a waiting list by helping to recruit subjects and informing them about the planned study.

Suppose a treatment can be delayed with no ill effect on the participants. This is likely the situation in a school that wishes to test the short-term effectiveness of a one-semester school health curriculum. In this case, it would be possible to randomly assign students to take the school health course in the fall semester or in the spring semester.

Suppose a program’s proponents are skeptical and are searching for the best solution to a social problem instead of trying to promote a specific intervention. Or, suppose a demand for evidence of program effectiveness cannot be ignored, for example, a congressional mandate. In these cases, political objections to random assignment are eased because program implementers are supportive of or at least are willing to cooperate with the research.

Suppose that a social program has many local projects, for example, the Head Start program has about 1,600 local projects and the Even Start program (a family literacy program) has about 800 projects. An experimental evaluation of these programs could be done by selecting a relatively large number of projects and randomly assigning only a few subjects within each project. This approach minimizes the unpleasant effects of random assignment for any given project, making it more palatable to local program staff.

Assigning higher-level units is another way to ease the pain of random assignment. Suppose that there is an interest in testing three different solutions to a given social problem. One way to construct this test is to randomly assign individuals to one of three interventions implementing the three different solutions. A different approach which avoids many of the common objections to random assignment is to randomize groups of individuals. For example, a federal agency could hold a grant competition to test three different approaches to preschool education. School districts would not be allowed to receive a grant unless they indicated their willingness to implement any of the three approaches. School districts that receive grants would then be randomly assigned to implement one of the three preschool approaches.

5. Working Towards Correct Random Assignment

Random assignment is more likely to be successfully implemented if done by researchers and research organizations with prior experience in conducting experimental studies. Certain research organizations have built the capacity to and reputation for conducting random assignment studies. Greenberg et al. (1999) report that almost half of the social experiments started in the US since 1983 have been done by three large research organizations.

In the same vein, random assignment is more likely to be successful if it is under the control of researchers rather than program implementers (Conner 1977). The latter are likely to make exceptions or may misunderstand random assignment rules, even if those rules are carefully prepared by researchers. The research team does not have to be physically present in order to control the random assignment. One approach is to have program staff be responsible for recruiting subjects, explaining the experimental alternatives, and transmitting lists of study subjects to the research team via fax, email, or other means. The research team then does the random assignment and sends back listings of research subjects, sorted into treatment and control groups. A related approach is for the research team to prepare a random assignment computer program for use by program staff who recruit subjects and enter basic data on a micro-computer which does the random assignment on the spot.

The way in which random assignment is implemented depends on the way in which applicants are recruited for an intervention. Sometimes a large pool of applicants are recruited. In these cases, information on the entire pool can be sent to the research team at the same time, simplifying the random assignment. The process is more complicated when applicants enter a program on a rolling basis. In these cases, a random assignment algorithm has to be developed so that applicants are told their treatment/control status soon after they apply. However, simple assignment rules such as assigning the first applicant to the treatment, the second to control, the third to treatment, etc. are easily manipulated by program staff who often have control over the flow of applicants. More complex assignment systems are less subject to local control. For example, random assignment of families to an intervention could be done in blocks of four, where the order of treatment and control assignment is random within each block.

6. Preserving Randomization

Implementing random assignment is difficult. Once achieved, how can it be preserved throughout the life of an evaluation? One issue has to do with when randomization takes place. This involves tradeoffs between generalizability and internal validity. Families interested in participating in the Even Start family literacy program could be randomized as soon as they are first recruited for the program, after they have had the evaluation explained to them and have indicated their willingness to accept any of the alternatives, or after they have completed a one-month 'tryout period' during which they can try Even Start and see whether they truly are interested in the program. Early randomization draws on the largest possible pool of families (increased generalizability) but risks losing many families (decreased internal validity) who find out that they are not assigned to the desired group or who leave the program after a tryout period. Late randomization winnows the pool of families (decreased generalizability) to those who are most likely to participate in the study (increased internal validity). Gueron and Pauly (1991) and Rieken et al. (1974) give additional examples.

Whether assigned to an intervention or a control group, subjects may refuse to cooperate with research measurements once an experiment has been started. Such attrition has the potential to destroy the comparability of the intervention and control groups. Clearly, it is best to use all means possible to avoid attrition of subjects. In some circumstances (e.g., studies of welfare programs), subjects can be sanctioned if they do not participate in research; in other cases, incentives for participation can be offered. Attrition is all but unavoidable in most social experiments since families move, are ill or otherwise unavailable for measurement activities, or simply refuse to participate in the research. Methods for determining whether attrition is related to the treatment and ways of dealing with this problem are discussed by Cook and Campbell (1979).

Are there ways to reduce the likelihood that subjects will refuse to go along with the randomization, or refuse to participate in the study? One approach is to plan the study so that subjects who agree to participate in the randomization have a better chance of getting the desired intervention than they would have if the study had not existed. This works best when there is a waiting list and when the intervention has a large number of openings relative to the number of subjects needed for the study. A second approach is to offer a competing intervention to members of the control group. This could work in several different ways. One competing intervention could be a financial or in-kind incentive for participating in the study. Another competing intervention could be a reduced or modified version of the treatment being studied. Yet a third alternative could be to offer control group subjects the opportunity to enroll in the desired intervention at a later point in time.

Bibliography

- Advisory Committee on Head Start Research and Evaluation 1999 Evaluating Head Start: A Recommended Framework for Studying the Impact of the Head Start Program. US Department of Health and Human Services, Washington, DC
- Boruch R 1974 Bibliography: Illustrative randomized field experiments for program planning and evaluation. Evaluation 2: 83-7
- Boruch R, McSweeney A J, Soderstrom E J 1978 Randomized field experiments for program planning, development and evaluation. Evaluation Quarterly 2: 655-95
- Boruch R, Wothke W 1985 Randomization and field experimentation. New Directions for Program Evaluation 28
- Conner R F 1977 Selecting a control group: An analysis of the randomization process in twelve social reform programs. Evaluation Quarterly 1: 195-244
- Cronbach L J 1982 Designing Evaluations of Educational and Social Programs, 1st edn. Jossey-Bass, San Francisco
- Cook T D 1999 Considering the major arguments against random assignment: An analysis of the intellectual culture surrounding evaluation in American schools of education. Paper presented at the Harvard Faculty Seminar on Experiments in Evaluation, Cambridge, MA
- Cook T D, Campbell D T 1979 Quasi-experimentation: Design & Analysis Issues for Field Settings. Rand McNally College Pub. Co., Chicago
- Greenberg D, Shroder M 1997 The Digest of Social Experiments, 2nd edn. The Urban Institute Press, Washington, DC
- Greenberg D, Shroder M, Onstott M 1999 The social experiment market. Journal of Economic Perspectives 13: 157-72
- Guba E G, Lincoln Y S 1982 Effective Evaluation, 1st edn. Jossey-Bass, San Francisco
- Gueron J M, Pauly E 1991 From Welfare to Work. Russell Sage Foundation, New York
- Leviton S A 1992 Evaluation of Federal Social Programs: An Uncertain Impact. George Washington University, Center for Social Policy Studies, Washington, DC
- Rieken H W, Boruch R F, Campbell D T, Coplan W, Glennan T K, Pratt J, Rees A, Williams W 1974 Social Experimentation: A Method for Planning and Evaluating Social Innovations. Academic Press, New York
- St. Pierre R G, Puma M J 2000 Toward the dream of the experimenting society. In: Bickman L (ed.) Advances in Social Research Methods: The Heritage of Donald Campbell. Sage Publications, New York

R. G. St. Pierre

Random Numbers

Random number generators (RNGs) are available from many computer software libraries. Their purpose is to produce sequences of numbers that appear as if they were generated randomly from a specified probability distribution. These pseudorandom numbers, often called random numbers for short (with a slight abuse of language), are crucial ingredients for a whole range of computer usages, such as statistical experiments, simulation of stochastic systems, numerical analysis with Monte Carlo methods, probabilistic algorithms, computer games, cryptography, and gambling machines, to name just a few. These RNGs are small computer programs implementing carefully crafted algorithms, whose design is (or should be) based on solid mathematical analysis. Usually, there is a basic uniform RNG whose aim is to produce numbers that imitate independent random variables from the uniform distribution over the interval $[0,1]$ (i.i.d. $U[0,1]$), and the random variables from other distributions (normal, chi-square, exponential, Poisson, etc.) are simulated by applying appropriate transformations to the uniform random numbers.

1. Random Number Generators

The words random number actually refer to a poorly defined concept. Formally speaking, one can argue that no number is more random than any other. If a fair dice is thrown eight times, for example, the sequences of outcomes 22222222 and 26142363 have exactly the same chance of occurring, on what basis could the second one be declared more random than the first?

A more precisely defined concept is that of independent random variables. This is a pure mathematical abstraction, which is nevertheless convenient for modeling real-life situations. The outcomes of successive throws of a fair dice, for instance, can be modeled as a sequence of independent random variables uniformly distributed over the set of integers from 1 to 6, i.e., where each of these integers has the probability $1/6$ for each outcome, independently of the other outcomes. This is an abstract concept because no absolutely perfect dice exists in the real world.

An RNG is a computer program whose aim is to imitate or simulate the typical behavior of a sequence of independent random variables. Such a program is usually purely deterministic: if started at different times or on different computers with the same initial state of its internal data, i.e., with the same seed, the sequence of numbers produced by the RNG will be exactly the same.

When constructing an RNG to simulate a dice, for example, the aim is that the statistical properties of the sequence of outcomes be representative of what should be expected from an idealized dice. In particular, each number should appear with a frequency near $1/6$ in the long run, each pair of successive numbers should appear with a frequency near $1/36$, each triplet should appear with a frequency near $1/216$, and so on. This would guarantee not only that the virtual dice is unbiased, but also that the successive outcomes are uncorrelated.

However, practical RNGs use a finite amount of memory. The number of states that they can take is finite, and so is the total number of possible streams of successive output values they can produce, from all possible initial states.

Mathematically, an RNG can be defined (see L'Ecuyer 1994) as a structure (S, μ, f, U, g) , where S is a finite set of states; μ is a probability distribution on S used to select the initial state (or seed) s_0 ; the mapping $f: S \rightarrow S$ is the transition function; U is a finite set of output symbols; and $g: S \rightarrow U$ is the output function.

The state evolves according to the recurrence $s_n = f(s_{n-1})$, for $n \geq 1$. The output at step n is $u_n = g(s_n) \in U$. These u_n are the so-called random numbers produced by the RNG. Because S is finite, the generator will eventually return to a state already visited (i.e., $s_{i+j} = s_i$ for some $i \geq 0$ and $j > 0$). Then, $s_{n+j} = s_n$ and $u_{n+j} = u_n$ for all $n \geq i$. The smallest $j > 0$ for which this happens is called the period length ρ . It cannot exceed the cardinality of S . In particular, if b bits are used to represent the state, then $\rho \leq 2^b$. Good RNGs are designed so that their period length is close to that upper bound.

Choosing s_0 from a uniform initial distribution μ can be crudely approximated by using external randomness such as picking balls from a box or throwing a real dice. The RNG can then be viewed as an extensor of randomness, stretching a short random seed into a long stream of random-looking numbers.

2. Randomness from Physical Devices

Why use a deterministic computer algorithm instead of a truly random mechanism for generating random numbers? Simply calling up a system's function from a program is certainly more convenient than throwing dice or picking balls from a box and entering the corresponding numbers on a computer's keyboard, especially when thousands (often millions or even billions) of random numbers are needed for a computer experiment.

Attempts have been made at constructing RNGs from physical devices such as noise diodes, gamma-ray counters, and so on, but these remain largely impractical and unreliable, because they are cumbersome, and because it is generally not true that the successive numbers they produce are independent and uniformly distributed. If one insists on getting away from a purely deterministic algorithm, a sensible compromise is to combine the output of a well-designed RNG with some physical noise, e.g., via bitwise exclusive-or.

3. Quality Criteria

Assume, for the following, that the generator's purpose is to simulate i.i.d. $U[0,1]$ random variables. The goal is that one cannot easily distinguish between the output sequence of the RNG and a sequence of i.i.d. $U[0,1]$ random variables. That is, the RNG should behave according to the null hypothesis $\mathbb{H}_0$: 'The u_n are i.i.d. $U[0,1]$,' which means that for each t , the vector $(u_0, \dots, u_{t-1})$ is uniformly distributed over the t -dimensional unit cube $[0,1]^t$. Clearly, $\mathbb{H}_0$ cannot be exactly true, because these vectors always take their values only from the finite set

$$\Psi_t = \{(u_0, \dots, u_{t-1}) : s_0 \in S\}.$$

If s_0 is random, Ψ_t can be viewed as the sample space from which the output vectors are taken. The idea, then, is to require that Ψ_t be very evenly distributed over the unit cube, so that $\mathbb{H}_0$ be approximately true for practical purposes. A huge state set S and a very large period length ρ are necessary requirements, but they are not sufficient; good uniformity of the Ψ_t is also needed. When several t -dimensional vectors are produced by an RNG by taking non-overlapping blocks of t output values, this can be viewed in a way as picking points at random from Ψ_t , without replacement.

It remains to agree on a computable figure of merit that measures the evenness of the distribution, and to construct specific RNGs having a good figure of merit in all dimensions t up to some preset number t_1 (because computing the figure of merit for all t up to infinity is infeasible in general). Several measures of discrepancy between the empirical distribution of a point set Ψ_t and the uniform distribution over $[0,1]^t$ were proposed and studied in the last few decades of the twentieth century (Niederreiter 1992, Hellekalek and Larcher 1998). These measures can be used to define figures of merit for RNGs. A very important criterion in choosing such a measure is the ability to compute it efficiently, and this depends on the mathematical structure of Ψ_t . For this reason, it is customary to use different figures of merit (i.e., different measures of discrepancy) for analyzing different classes of RNGs. Some would argue that Ψ_t should look like a typical set of random points over the unit cube instead of being too evenly distributed. That it should have a chaotic structure, not a regular one. However, chaotic structures are hard to analyze mathematically. It is probably safer to select RNG classes for which the structure of Ψ_t can be analyzed and understood, even if this implies more regularity, rather than selecting an RNG with a chaotic but poorly understood structure.

For a concrete illustration, consider the two linear recurrences

$$\begin{aligned} x_{1,n} &= (a_{1,1}x_{1,n-1} + \dots + a_{1,k}x_{1,n-k}) \bmod m_1 \\ x_{2,n} &= (a_{2,1}x_{2,n-1} + \dots + a_{2,k}x_{2,n-k}) \bmod m_2 \end{aligned}$$

where k , the m_j 's, and the $a_{i,j}$'s are fixed integers, ' $\bmod m_j$ ' means the remainder of the integer division by m_j , and the output function

$$u_n = (x_{1,n}/m_1 - x_{2,n}/m_2) \bmod 1$$

This RNG is a combined linear multiple recursive generator (L'Ecuyer 1999a). Its state at step n is the $2k$ -dimensional vector whose first k components are in $\{0, 1, \dots, m_1-1\}$ and last k components are in $\{0, 1, \dots, m_2-1\}$. There are thus $(m_1m_2)^k$ different states and it can be proved that Ψ_k is the set of all k -dimensional vectors with coordinates in $\{0, 1/m, \dots, (m-1)/m\}$, where $m = m_1m_2$. This implies, if m is large, that for each $t \leq k$, the t -dimensional cube $[0,1]^t$ is evenly covered by Ψ_t . For $t > k$, it turns out that in this case, Ψ_t has a regular lattice structure (Knuth 1998, L'Ecuyer 1998), so that all its points are contained in a series of equidistant parallel hyperplanes, say at a distance d_t apart. To obtain a good coverage of the unit cube, d_t must be as small as possible, and this value can be used as a selection criterion.

$$(x_{1,n}, \dots, x_{1,n-k+1}, x_{2,n}, \dots, x_{2,n-k+1}),$$

L'Ecuyer (1999a) recommends a concrete implementation of this RNG with the parameter values: $k = 3$, $m_1 = 2^{32} - 209$, $(a_{11}, a_{12}, a_{13}) = (0, 1403580, -810728)$, $m_2 = 2^{32} - 22853$, and $(a_{21}, a_{22}, a_{23}) = (527612, 0, -1370589)$. This RNG has two main cycles of length $\rho \approx 2^{191}$ each (the total number of states is approximately 2^{192}). Its lattice structure has been analyzed in up to $t = 48$ dimensions and was found to be excellent, in the sense that d_t is not far from the smallest possible value that can be achieved for an arbitrary lattice with $(m_1m_2)^k$ points per unit of volume. These parameters were found by an extensive computer search.

For a second example, consider the linear congruential generator (LCG) defined by the recurrence $x_n = ax_{n-1} \bmod m$ and output function $u_n = x_n/m$. This type of RNG is widely used and is still the default generator in several (perhaps the majority of) software systems. With the popular choice of $m = 2^{31} - 1$ and $a = 16807$ for the parameters, the period length is $2^{31} - 2$, which is now deemed much too small for serious applications (Law and Kelton 2000, L'Ecuyer 1998). This RNG also has a lattice structure similar to the previous one, except that the distances d_t are much larger, and this can easily show up in simulation results (Hellekalek and Larcher 1998, L'Ecuyer and Simard 2000). Small LCGs of this type should be discarded.

Another way of assessing the uniformity is in terms of the leading bits of the successive output values, as follows. Suppose that S (and Ψ_t) has cardinality 2^e . There are tl possibilities for the l most significant bits of t successive output values $u_n, \dots, u_{n+t-1}$. If each of these possibilities occurs exactly 2^{e-tl} times in Ψ_t , for all l and t such that $tl \leq e$, the RNG is called maximally equidistributed (ME). Explicit implementations of ME or nearly ME generators can be constructed by using linear recurrences modulo 2 (L'Ecuyer 1999b, Tezuka 1995, Matsumoto and Nishimura 1998).

Besides having a long period and good uniformity of Ψ_t , RNGs must be efficient (run fast and use little memory), repeatable (the ability of repeating exactly the same sequence of numbers is a major advantage of RNGs over physical devices, e.g., for program verification and variance reduction in simulation; Law and Kelton 2000, and portable (work the same way in different software/hardware environments). The availability of efficient methods for jumping ahead in the sequence by a large number of steps is also an important asset of certain RNGs. It permits the sequence to be partitioned into long, disjoint substreams and to create an arbitrary number of virtual generators (one per substream) from a single backbone RNG (Law and Kelton 2000).

Cryptologists use different quality criteria for RNGs (Knuth 1998, Lagarias 1993). Their main concern is the unpredictability of the forthcoming numbers. Their analysis of RNGs is usually based on asymptotic analysis, in the framework of computational complexity theory. This analysis is for families of generators, not for particular instances. They study what happens when an RNG of size k (i.e., whose state is represented over k bits of memory) is selected randomly from the family, for $k \rightarrow \infty$. They seek RNGs for which the work needed to guess the next bit of output significantly better than by flipping a fair coin increases faster, asymptotically, than any polynomial function of k . This means that an intelligent guess quickly becomes impractical when k is increased. So far, generator families conjectured to have these properties have been constructed, but proving even the existence of families with these properties remain an open problem.

4. Statistical Testing

RNGs should be constructed based on a sound mathematical analysis of their structural properties. Once they are constructed and implemented, they are usually submitted to empirical statistical tests that try to detect statistical deficiencies by looking for empirical evidence against the hypothesis $\mathbb{H}_0$ defined previously. A test is defined by a test statistic T , function of a fixed set of u_n 's, whose distribution under $\mathbb{H}_0$ is known. The number of different tests that can be defined in infinite and these different tests detect different problems with the RNGs. There is no universal test or battery of tests that can guarantee, when passed, that a given generator is fully reliable for all kinds of simulations. Passing a lot of tests may improve one's confidence in the RNG, but never proves that the RNG is foolproof. In fact, no RNG can pass all statistical tests. One could say that a bad RNG is one that fails simple tests, and a good RNG is one that fails only complicated tests that are very hard to find and run. In the end, there is no definitive answer to the question 'What are the good tests to apply?'

Ideally, T should mimic the random variable of practical interest in a way that a bad structural interference between the RNG and the problem will show up in the test. But this is rarely practical. This cannot be done, for example, for testing RNGs for general-purpose software packages. For a sensitive application, if one cannot test the RNG specifically for the problem at hand, it is a good idea to try RNGs from totally different classes and compare the results.

Specific statistical tests for RNGs are described in Knuth (1998), Hellekalek and Larcher (1998), Marsaglia (1985), and other references given there. Experience with empirical testing tells us that RNGs with very long periods, good structure of their set Ψ_t , and based on recurrences that are not too simplistic, pass most reasonable tests, whereas RNGs with short periods or bad structures are usually easy to crack by statistical tests.

5. Non-uniform Random Variates

Random variates from distributions other than the uniform over $[0, 1]$ are generated by applying further transformations to the output values u_n of the uniform RNG. For example, $y_n = a + (b-a)u_n$ produces a random variate uniformly distributed over the interval $[a, b]$. To generate a random variate y_n that takes the values -1 and 1 with probability 0.2 each, and 0 with probability 0.6 , one can define $y_n = -1$ if $u_n \leq 0.2$, $y_n = 1$ if $u_n > 0.8$, and $y_n = 0$ otherwise.

Things are not always so easy, however. For certain distributions, compromises must be made between simplicity of the algorithm, quality of the approximation, robustness with respect to the distribution parameter, and efficiency (generation speed, memory requirements, and setup time). Generally speaking, simplicity should be favored over small speed gains.

Conceptually, the simplest method for generating a random variate y_n from distribution F is inversion: define $y_n = F^{-1}(u_n) \triangleq \min\{y | F(y) \geq u_n\}$. Then, if we view u_n as a uniform random variable, $P[y_n \leq y] = P[F^{-1}(u_n) \leq y] = P[u_n \leq F(y)] = F(y)$, so y_n has distribution F . Computing this y_n requires a formula or a good numerical approximation for F^{-1} . As an example, if y_n is to have the geometric distribution with parameter p , i.e., $F(y) = 1 - (1-p)^y$ for $y = 1, 2, \dots$, the inversion method gives $y_n = F^{-1}(u_n) = 1 + \ln(1 - u_n)/\ln(1-p)$. The normal, student, and chi-square are examples of distributions for which there are no close form expression for F^{-1} , but good numerical approximations are available (Bratley et al. 1987).

In most simulation applications, inversion should be the method of choice, because it is a monotone transformation of u_n into y_n , which makes it compatible with major variance reductions techniques (Bratley et al. 1987). But there are also situations where speed is the real issue and where monotonicity is no real concern. Then, it might be more appropriate to use fast non-inversion methods such as, for example, the alias method for discrete distributions or its continuous acceptance-complement version, the acceptance/rejection method and its several variants, composition and convolution methods, and several other specialized and fancy techniques often designed for specific distributions (Bratley et al. 1987, Devroye 1986, Gentle 1998).

Recently, there has been an effort in developing so-called automatic or black box algorithms for generating variates from an arbitrary (known) density, based on acceptance/rejection with a transformed density (Hörmann and Leydold 2000). Another important class of general non-parametric methods is those that sample directly from a smoothed version of the empirical distribution of a given data set (Law and Kelton 2000, Hörmann and Leydold 2000). These methods shortcut the fitting a specific type of distribution to the data.

6. A Consumer's Guide

No uniform RNG can be guaranteed against all possible defects, but the following ones have fairly good theoretical support, have been extensively tested, and are easy to use: the Mersenne twister of Matsumoto and Nishimura (1988), the combined MRGs of L'Ecuyer (1999a), the combined LCGs of L'Ecuyer and Andres (1997), and the combined Tausworthe generators of L'Ecuyer (1999b). Further discussion and up-to-date developments on RNGs can be found in Knuth (1998), L'Ecuyer (1998) and from the following web pages:

<http://www.iro.umontreal.ca/~lecuyer>
<http://random.mat.sbg.ac.at> <http://cgm.cs.mcgill.ca/~luc/>
http://www.webnz.com/robert/rng_links.htm
 For non-uniform random variate generation, software and related information can be found at:
<http://cgm.cs.mcgill.ca/~luc/>
<http://statistik.wu-wien.ac.at/src/unuran/>

See also: Monte Carlo Methods and Bayesian Computation: Overview; Random Assignment: Implementation in Complex Field Settings

Bibliography

- Bratley P, Fox B L, Schrage L E 1987 A Guide to Simulation, 2nd edn. Springer, New York
- Devroye L 1986 Non-uniform Random Variate Generation. Springer, New York
- Gentle J E 1998 Random Number Generation and Monte Carlo Methods. Springer, New York
- Hellekalek P, Larcher G (eds.) 1998 Random and Quasi-random Point Sets, Vol. 138, Lecture Notes in Statistics. Springer, New York
- Hörmann W, Leydold J 2000 Automatic random variate generation for simulation input. In: Joines J A, Barton R R, Kang K, Fishwick P A (eds.) Proceedings of the 2000 Winter Simulation Conference. IEEE Press, Piscataway, NJ, pp. 675–82
- Knuth D E 1998 The Art of Computer Programming, Vol. 2: Seminumerical Algorithms, 3rd edn. Addison-Wesley, Reading, MA
- Lagarías J C 1993 Pseudorandom numbers. Statistical Science 8(1): 31–9
- Law A M, Kelton W D 2000 Simulation Modeling and Analysis, 3rd edn. McGraw-Hill, New York
- L'Ecuyer P 1994 Uniform random number generation. Annals of Operations Research 53: 77–120
- L'Ecuyer P 1998 Random number generation. In: Banks J (ed.) Handbook of Simulation. Wiley, New York, pp. 93–137
- L'Ecuyer P 1999a Good parameters and implementations for combined multiple recursive random number generators. Operations Research 47(1): 159–64
- L'Ecuyer P 1999b Tables of maximally equidistributed combined LFSR generators. Mathematics of Computation 68(225): 261–9
- L'Ecuyer P, Andres T H 1997 A random number generator based on the combination of four LCGs. Mathematics and Computers in Simulation 44: 99–107
- L'Ecuyer P, Simard R 2000 On the performance of birthday spacings tests for certain families of random number generators. Mathematics and Computers in Simulation 55(1–3): 131–7
- Marsaglia G 1985 A current view of random number generators. In: Computer Science and Statistics, Sixteenth Symposium on the Interface. North-Holland, Amsterdam, pp. 3–10
- Matsumoto M, Nishimura T 1998 Mersenne twister: A 623-dimensionally equidistributed uniform pseudo-random number generator. ACM Transactions on Modeling and Computer Simulation 8(1): 3–30
- Niederreiter H 1992 Random Number Generation and Quasi-Monte Carlo Methods, Vol. 63, SIAM CBMS-NSF Regional Conference Series in Applied Mathematics. SIAM, Philadelphia, PA
- Tezuka S 1995 Uniform Random Numbers: Theory and Practice. Kluwer, Norwell, MA

P. L'Ecuyer

Ranke, Leopold von (1795–1886)

Leopold Ranke was born in Wiehe an der Unstrut in Thuringia on the December 20, 1795 as the son of the lawyer Gottlob Israel Ranke. His family had long served as evangelical pastors in the area of Saxony between the rivers Saale and Unstrut. From 1809 to 1814 he attended the renowned Pforta school at Naumburg in Saxony, and from the spring of 1814 to the summer of 1818 he studied theology and classical literature in Leipzig. He completed his doctorate in 1817 with a (lost) dissertation on Thukydides. In 1818 Ranke started teaching history at the Fridericianum Gymnasium in Frankfurt an der Oder. In 1825 he was appointed associate professor of history at the University of Berlin, and in 1834 he was promoted to a full professor. In 1841 he was appointed official historian to the Prussian state by Friedrich Wilhelm IV, and in 1854 to the renewed parliament. Ranke was ennobled in 1865, becoming Leopold von Ranke, and in 1867 he was named chancellor of the order pour le mérite. He rejected countless offers to teach at other universities, at Munich among others, and remained in Berlin, where he died on the May 23, 1886. From 1880 onwards he was almost blind, and was forced to dictate his later works to assistants.

Ranke's career as a historian was influenced less by the historical science of the time, but rather by his interest in classical literature. His earliest existing studies are on the subject of translation and interpretation of classical Greek texts. Recent research has shown that the German literature of his time, Goethe, Schiller, and Friedrich Schlegel, also had an important influence on his conception of historical writing. It is also known that Ranke admired the literary form of contemporary British and French historiography. Ranke's early years were during the era of French hegemony over Germany and Europe, and the time of the rising German nationalist movement from 1806 onwards. These experiences of contemporary history left lasting impressions on Ranke's thinking. His political sympathies lay with Prussian state conservatism. On behalf of the Prussian government, but with independent control, Ranke published the Historisch-politische Zeitschrift from 1832 to 1836, through which the government aimed to exert a moderate conservative influence on the public. Ranke had to give up the journal after a short time because of lack of success; however, he did use the opportunity to publish a number of historical-political essays, in which he developed important methodological principles, and also began to sketch out his later, larger works. The most important of these articles are for example Über die Zeit Ferdinands I. und Maximilians II. (On the Time of Ferdinand I. and Maximilian II.), Frankreich und Deutschland (France and Germany), Vom Einfluß der Theorie (On the Influence of Theory) (all 1832), Rom 1815–1823 (Rome from 1815 to 1823), Die großen Mächte (The Great Powers) (both 1833), and Das politische Gespräch (The Political Conversation) (1836). Ranke placed importance on his good relations with the Prussian court, but was also held in high esteem by the Bavarian King Maximilian II, who had attended his lectures as a student at the University of Berlin, and for whom Ranke held a series of free lectures in Berchtesgaden in the September and October 1854 which were taken down in shorthand. The king had wished for 'a short and condensed overview of the motivating ideas of the various centuries of history from the Christian era on,' and Ranke developed basic characteristics of his historical perception in eight lectures which were then published in 1888 under the title Über die Epochen der neueren Geschichte (On the Epochs of Recent History).

Ranke's works total 63 volumes, including nine volumes of a world history which he dictated late in his life but was unable to complete. His first work Geschichte der romanischen und germanischen Völker von 1494–1514 (History of the Latin and Teutonic Nations from 1494 to 1514) (1824) was a great success. It already showed some of the basic characteristics of his conception of Europe, and was of historiographical importance particularly because Ranke made an exemplary critical analysis of his sources in a separate volume, Zur Kritik neuerer Geschichtsschreiber (On the Critical Methods of Recent Historians). In this work he raised the method of textual criticism used in the late eighteenth century, particularly in classical philology to the standard method of scientific historical writing. In 1827 he visited the archives of Vienna, Venice, Rome, and Florence and various German libraries with a stipend of the Prussian government and discovered the since famous Venetian relations, legation reports from the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, which became an important basic source for the series of his great historical works beginning in 1832. The experiences of the July Revolution in France in 1830 led him to interpret the modern history of the European states more strongly in perspective of the relation between the present and the past. From 1832 to 1836 he published the three volumes of Die römischen Päpste, ihre Kirche und ihr Staat im 16 und 17. Jahrhundert (Ecclesiastical and Political History of the Popes during the 16th and 17th Centuries), and from 1839 to 1847 the six volumes of Die deutsche Geschichte im Zeitalter der Reformation (History of the Reformation in Germany). These two works were developed in a single process and complement one another. Further main works followed in 1847–1848, Preußische Geschichte (History of Prussia), 1852–1861, Französische Geschichte (History of France), and 1859–1868, Englische Geschichte (History of England), as well as the incomplete world history of 1881–1888. After the foundation of the German Reich in 1870 and 1871, Ranke partly revised his Preußische Geschichte by emphasizing the 'German' role of Prussia in the old Reich more strongly in a second edition. Numerous studies concentrating for the most part on Prussian and Austrian history complete his work. It must be noted that the focal point of these works, with editions and investigations on the Prussian state chancellor von Hardenberg and on Friedrich Wilhelm IV, was in the area of contemporary history.

From 1830 onwards Ranke's thought centers on the history of the European states of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, based on his experiences of the time. However, depending on his estimation of the problems and their continuations, he did look back into the late and even the early middle ages, and on the other hand pursued the configurations of the European states not only up to 1789–1795, but also into the beginning of the nineteenth century. We can see from the focal point of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the age of the secularized Renaissance papacy, the reformation and religious wars, the modern process of building states and the crystallization of the European powers system and its functioning between repeated hegemonic claims and equilibrium, that Ranke viewed the European historical process as essentially grounded in the tension between state and religion. The state and the church are buttresses of the system, at the same time however also buttresses of change, as they tend to broaden and reinforce their power so widely that they cause opposition and opposite tendencies, just as do the acting personalities themselves. In Ranke's historical perception however, each state and church, as well as their representatives, have a specific 'task,' with which they contribute to the overall human task of cultural development. The task of historians is to recognise this 'task' and the 'leading ideas,' and to portray at which points the protagonists deviate from them, causing turbulences and even historical catastrophes, and where they return to realizing these leading ideas and thereby to a harmonious equilibrium of the forces. Multiplicity is essential for the workings of this self-regulating system of states and religion, or churches. 'States are "Thoughts of God"' (Politisches Gespräch, ed. U. Muhlack, p. 95), and historical research pursues their development over the centuries. Ranke's great historical writings begin at the point when the medieval universalism of the church and the 'Sacrum Imperium' of the Germans started to break down and the specific European culture developed, in which the pretention of religious or state universality repeatedly appeared, but was crushed by the resistance of the state and national individualities. Multiplicity and unity are connected in this history of the great European nations and their summing together in the European powers system in such a way as to enable human energies to be realized more productively than ever before.

The recognition of this historical process has for Ranke, a value in itself. Ranke formulated this thought, which is a plea against liberal progressive thinking, repeatedly; most markedly in the sentence from the lectures 'Über die Epochen der neueren Geschichte': 'Each age is immediate to God, and its value is not based on that which it brings forth, but in its own existence, in its own self, which however does not rule out that something else emerged from it' (von Ranke et al. 1971, p. 60). Ranke hereby opposes every functionalization of historical events and situations for contemporary interests, yet makes it clear that the present cannot be understood without the historical process and that contemporary action may not ignore the way things have come to pass. For example one can learn from the past that is not possible to re-establish the absolute monarchy or the old importance of the church in the 'Age of Revolution.' Therefore Ranke did not limit himself to a purely contemplative ideal of historical insight beyond all practical applications. In his inaugural lecture in Berlin in 1836, Über die Verwandtschaft und den Unterschied der Historie und der Politik (On the Relation and the Difference of History and Politics), he declared that an insight into the past as free from prejudice as possible, was a condition for the possibility of reasonable politics in the present. Historical insight explains the conditions under which contemporaries act. However, these must be drawn into the leading ideas of their predecessors, and may not criticize them from the standpoint of their contemporary interests. Ranke also described this concept of historical objectivity in various works, the most well known of which being the formulation: 'We have given history the task of judging the past, of teaching the world for the use of future years: the present attempt does not forbid itself such high tasks: it merely aims to show how it really was' (SW 33, VII).

Ranke founded his ideal of objectivity for the most part on historical theology, not on logical insights. The basis of historical insight was for him a certain knowledge of God: 'History is religion' ... 'At least there is the closest connection between them' (letter to Georg Waitz, December 30, 1841, Briefwerk 313). As Ranke saw God as manifested in all historical appearances, and especially in their inner relations to one another, historical insight represented for him the specific modern and up to date search for the recognition of God. The religious conviction that all historical action is carried by providence meant on one hand a limitation of the possibilities of insight, because the historian can at best guess at God's will. On the other hand this conviction lends Ranke's historical perception a harmonistical character, which has earned sharp criticism in the past decades of historicism-critical historical science. His ideal of objectivism was rejected by his Berlin colleague and methodological opponent Johann Gustav Droysen but also by his pupil Heinrich von Sybel and by Heinrich von Treitschke, the protagonist of the politically active, Prussia-oriented liberal-conservative historiography in late nineteenth century Germany.

In the field of German history of the late nineteenth and early twentieth century, however, Ranke was very highly respected. His rather too uncritical successors unfortunately produced a perception of history which did not take sufficient account of the specific forces of the modern age. As mentioned previously, Ranke himself had always related history to the present and had included the French Revolution as well as the re-establishment of the European system of powers at the Congress of Vienna in his continuity-oriented thinking. He saw in the French Revolution in particular, a dynamic element which gave the stagnating European powers system new energies and ability to integrate, so that European state system could regenerate and reinforce itself through increased nationalization. There was no longer room for industrialization, the modern competitive economy and capitalism, liberalism, even socialism and communism in this historical perception.

Leopold Ranke is counted along with Johann Gustav Droysen (1808–1884), Barthold Georg Neibuhr (1776–1831), and Theodor Mommsen (1817–1903) as one of the most important founders of modern history in Germany and as the most influential international representative of classical German historicism. His own research work and his teaching at the University of Berlin made an essential contribution to the circulation and final establishment of modern source of criticism. He pushed ahead the autonomization of history as a science, by distancing himself both from the rhetorical tradition of history as an ‘art,’ and also from the contemporary historical philosophy, particularly that of Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel. With his systematic work from sources he emphasized the importance of empiricism, and simultaneously made it repeatedly clear in theoretical comments and in his historical practice than the individual event or fact can only be interpreted in its surrounding context. His art of portrayal was essential to his success and to his, at times, world recognition in the developing modern international field of history, with which style he has gone down in history as one of the founders of modern historiography. Ranke expressly aimed to make history into a ‘pleasure.’ His mastery of specifically narrative forms contributed to bridging the gap between the empirical and specialized historian and the bourgeois readership of the nineteenth century. As mentioned previously, one consequences of this esthetization could also be a harmonizing view of events and situations. However, Ranke’s narrative mastership did allow him to lead from the apparently coincidental individual event on to the contemplation of the most general insights, in a way that is very plausible for the historical-political consciousness of the nineteenth century. His stories deal with the responsibility of individuals for their fate, without suggesting that they could control this fate. That is the meaning of the sentence, that the historian is to deal with humanity, ‘as it is, explainable or unexplainable: the life of the individual, the generations, the peoples, at times the hand of God above them’ (SW 33/34, VIII).

See also: Historicism; Historiography and Historical Thought; Modern History (Since the Eighteenth Century); History: Overview; Objectivity, History of; Religion, History of

Bibliography

- Berding H 1971 Leopold von Ranke. In: Wehler H-U (ed.) Deutsche Historiker, Göttingen, vol. 1, pp. 7–24
- Fulda D 1996 Wissenschaft aus Kunst. Die Entstehung der modernen deutschen Geschichtsschreibung 1760–1860. Berlin, pp. 296–410
- Hardtwig W 1991 Geschichtsreligion—Wissenschaft als Arbeit—Objektivität. Der Historismus in neuer Sicht. Historische Zeitschrift 252: 1–32
- Hardtwig W 1997 Historismus als ästhetische Geschichtsschreibung. Geschichte und Gesellschaft 23: 99–114
- Hinrichs C 1754 Ranke und die Geschichtstheologie der Goethezeit. Göttingen/Frankfurt Main/Berlin
- Iggers G 1971 Deutsche Geschichtswissenschaft. Munich, pp. 86–119
- Iggers G, von Moltke K (eds.) 1973 The Theory and Practice of History, Leopold Ranke. Indianapolis, New York
- Krieger L 1977 Ranke. The Meaning of History. Chicago, London
- Metz K-H 1979 Grundformen historiographischen Denkens. Wissenschaftsgeschichte als Methodologie. Dargestellt an Ranke, Treitschke und Lamprecht, Munich
- Muhlack U 1988 Leopold von Ranke. In: Hammerstein N (ed.) Deutsche Geschichtswissenschaft um 1900. Stuttgart, pp. 11–36
- Vierhaus R 1957 Ranke und die soziale Welt. Münster
- von Ranke L 1897–1890 Sämtliche Werke, 54 vols. [Ed. Dove A] Leipzig, Germany
- von Ranke L 1926 Werke Gesamtausgabe der Deutschen Akademie [ed. Joachimsen P] Munich
- von Ranke L 1949 Das Briefwerk [ed. Fuchs W P] Hamburg
- von Ranke L 1953 Die römischen Päpste in den letzten vier Jahrhunderten, with an introduction by V. Friedrich. Baethgen, Stuttgart
- von Ranke L 1957 12 Bücher preußischer Geschichte [ed. Andreas W] Hamburg, 4 vols.
- von Ranke L 1963 Die großen Mächte, politisches Gespräch. Göttingen
- von Ranke L 1964–75 Aus Werk und Nachlaß [eds. Fuchs W P and Schieder T]. Munich/Vienna, 4 vols.
- von Ranke L 1988 Und die moderne Geschichtswissenschaft. Stuttgart
- von Ranke L 1989 Über die Epochen der neueren Geschichte. Darmstadt
- von Ranke L 1995 Die großen Mächte, politisches Gespräch. Frankfurt Main/Leipzig

W. Hardtwig

Ranking Models, Mathematics of

Suppose that k items are ranked from best (1) to worst (k) by a nondeterministic process. For example, the observed ranking could represent an arbitrarily selected voter’s preferences for the $k = 5$ candidates in an election, or a judge’s ranking of $k = 4$ salad dressings by their perceived tartness. A probability model on rankings—or, more simply, a ranking model—specifies the probability, $P(\pi)$, of observing each of the $k!$ rankings π . This article discusses many of the ranking models that have been proposed in the statistical and psychological literature, and interrelates their basic properties. The focus will be on three widely used methods for constructing ranking models, based on: (a) order statistics, (b) paired comparisons, and (c) distances between permutations.

Sect. 1 describes Thurstone order statistics models. In Sect. 2, several thematic properties of ranking models are introduced, and then these general properties are discussed in the particular context of Thurstone order statistics models. Sects. 3 and 4 consider ranking models induced by paired comparisons and distance-based ranking models, respectively. For each model, its underlying motivation is studied, as well as its relationship to the basic properties of Sect. 2.

Much of this material is from the survey article by Critchlow et al. (1991). Other useful general references include the comprehensive monograph by Marden (1995) and the volume edited by Fligner and Verducci (1993).

Some basic notation is as follows. Once the k items are labeled arbitrarily as item 1 to item k , a ranking of the k items corresponds to a permutation function π from $\{1, \dots, k\}$ onto $\{1, \dots, k\}$, where $\pi(i)$ is the rank assigned to item i , $i = 1, \dots, k$, and where $(\pi(1), \dots, \pi(k))$ is the associated vector of ranks. Alternatively, any ranking π can be described by the corresponding ordering of the k items, denoted by the bracketed vector $\langle \pi^{-1}(1), \dots, \pi^{-1}(k) \rangle$, where $\pi^{-1}(r)$ is the item assigned rank r , $r = 1, \dots, k$. Often, the simpler notation $\langle i_1, \dots, i_k \rangle$ will be used. For example, $\langle 3, 1, 2 \rangle$ denotes the ordering in which item 3 is ranked as best, item 1 is ranked as second best, and item 2 is ranked as worst.

1. Order Statistics Models

In his research on psychophysical phenomena, Thurstone (1927) hypothesizes that the actual perception of each item is a random variable. The relative ordering of these random variables then determines the judge's ordering of the items. Thurstone's original method considers only paired comparisons of the items, but Daniels (1950) extends the method to full orderings of the k items.

Formally, let X_i be a continuous random variable associated with item i , for $i = 1, \dots, k$. A random ranking π is defined by setting $\pi(i)$ equal to the rank, from smallest to largest, of X_i among $\{X_1, \dots, X_k\}$. In other words, the ranking π with ordering $\langle i_1, \dots, i_k \rangle$ is assigned the probability

$$P(\pi) = P\{X_{i_1} < \dots < X_{i_k}\} \quad (1)$$

If the random variables X_i are allowed to have arbitrary dependencies, then any probability distribution on rankings can be obtained from this construction. To restrict the model, it is often assumed that the X_i are independent, and that their cumulative distribution functions $F_i(x) = F(x - \mu_i)$ constitute a location family, where F is fixed and where the μ_i ($i = 1, \dots, k$) are shift parameters. The resulting ranking model is referred to as a Thurstone order statistics model (see, e.g., Yellott 1977).

Two well-studied cases of the Thurstone model are the Thurstone (1927)–Mosteller (1951)–Daniels (1950) model (TMD model) where F is the standard normal distribution, and the Luce (1959)–Plackett (1975) model where $F(x) = 1 - \exp(-\exp x)$ is the Gumbel distribution. Brook and Upton (1974) use the TMD model to analyze voters' rankings of candidates for public office, while Henery (1981) uses the Luce–Plackett model to study outcomes of horse races. As discussed in the next section, the Luce–Plackett model affords a simple expression for the ranking probabilities given in Eqn. (1). Also, this model coincides with the first order model in Plackett's (1975) system of logistic models. Further development of order statistics models can be found, for example, in Yellott (1977), Henery (1983), Stern (1990), and Bockenholt (1993).

2. Properties of Ranking Models

This section introduces the study of ranking models with respect to certain thematic properties. In particular, the properties of reversibility, complete consensus, and L-decomposability—which are shared by many diverse types of ranking models—are motivated and defined. Each of these properties is then discussed in the context of Thurstone order statistics models. In later sections, the same thematic properties will be reconsidered in relation to additional classes of ranking models.

2.1 Reversibility

Let $\mathcal{P}$ denote a class of ranking models $\{P(\pi): P \in \mathcal{P}\}$, usually indexed by a set of parameters. Assume that a particular strategy of ranking items from best (rank 1) to worst (rank k) corresponds to a ranking model $P \in \mathcal{P}$. Suppose one now reverses the meaning of the ranks, so that rank 1 is given to the worst item and rank k is given to the best item. Is the resulting ranking model $P^(\pi)$ still in the same class $\mathcal{P}$ —in other words, does P^ correspond to another choice of the parameters? If so, then the class $\mathcal{P}$ of ranking models is said to be reversible (Luce 1959 pp. 69–70, Marley 1968, 1982).

For fixed F , consider the class $\mathcal{P}_F$ of Thurstone order statistics models, with shift parameters $\mu_1, \dots, \mu_k$. Without loss of generality, assume that F has median zero. If the distribution F is symmetric, then the class $\mathcal{P}_F$ is reversible. Indeed, if particular parameter values $\mu_1, \dots, \mu_k$ correspond to ranking from best to worst, then the values $-\mu_1, \dots, -\mu_k$ correspond to ranking from worst to best. Consequently, the class $\mathcal{P}_F$ of TMD ranking models (F standard normal) is reversible. On the other hand, Pendergrass and Bradley (1960) show that the class $\mathcal{P}_F$ of Luce–Plackett ranking models—with F the asymmetric Gumbel distribution—is not reversible (for recent work, see Yellott 1997).

2.2 Complete Consensus

An important problem is to identify a single ranking that best summarizes a probability distribution or sample of rankings (see, e.g., Marley 1993). By definition, a ranking model $P(\pi)$ is unimodal, with modal ranking π_0 , if π_0 uniquely maximizes P . Any ranking model satisfies this simple condition for unimodality, provided there is not a tie for the most likely ranking. However, for many ranking models, the items may be ordered in a much stronger sense than that implied by the mere existence of a modal ranking π_0 . For any two items i and j , suppose that $\pi_0(i) < \pi_0(j)$, and that $P[\pi(i) < \pi(j)]$, the probability that item i is preferred to item j , exceeds 0.5. If this probability continues to exceed 0.5 given any fixed assignment of ranks to the other $k-2$ items, then item i is strongly preferred to item j . If every pair of items can be related by strong preference, then the ranking model $P(\pi)$ is said to have complete consensus with respect to the modal ranking π_0 . In brief, the condition is that if item a is ranked ahead of item b in π_0 , then for any fixed assignment of ranks to the other $k-2$ items $i_1, \dots, i_{k-2}$. The notion of complete consensus is discussed by Henery (1981), Fligner and Verducci (1988), and Critchlow et al. (1991).

$$P\{\langle i_1, \dots, a, \dots, b, \dots, i_{k-2} \rangle\} > P\{\langle i_1, \dots, b, \dots, a, \dots, i_{k-2} \rangle\}$$

One can construct distributions F for which the resulting Thurstone order statistics model does not even have a unique modal ranking (see Savage 1956). However, if the μ_i are distinct and if the density F' has monotone likelihood ratio, that is, if $F'(x-\mu_i)/F'(x-\mu_j)$ is decreasing in x for $\mu_i < \mu_j$, then the Thurstone order statistics model has the complete consensus property (Savage 1956, 1957), and the ordering of the items in the modal ranking coincides with the ordering of their associated parameters μ_i from least to greatest. Thus, for example, the TMD and Luce–Plackett models have complete consensus.

2.3 L-decomposability

The property of L-decomposability is a generalization of Luce's (1959) ranking postulate, defined in Eqn. (2)

below. If L-decomposability holds for a ranking model, then the ranking process can be viewed as a sequence of 'independent' stages: at stage 1 the most preferred item is chosen, at stage 2 the most preferred of the remaining items is chosen, and so forth until a full ranking is produced. The probability of the resulting ranking is assumed to be the product of the choice probabilities across the various stages.

Formally, for any subset B of the item labels $\{1, \dots, k\}$, and for each $i \in B$, let the choice probability $P_B(i)$ be the probability that item i is most preferred among those in B . Note that by definition, the choice probability $P_B(i)$ can depend only on i and B , and not on the relative ordering of any items not in B . Luce's ranking postulate states that for every ranking π with associated ordering $\langle i_1, \dots, i_k \rangle$

$$P(\pi) = P_{\{i_1, \dots, i_k\}}(i_1) \cdot P_{\{i_2, \dots, i_k\}}(i_2) \cdots P_{\{i_{k-1}, i_k\}}(i_{k-1}). \quad (2)$$

Any ranking model $P(\pi)$ that can be expressed in the form (2) for some collection of choice probabilities $P_B(i)$ is said to be L-decomposable (Critchlow et al. 1991, Fishburn 1994).

In formulating the ranking postulate, Luce had a particular family of choice probabilities $P_B(i)$ in mind—discussed in Eqn. (4) below—and from these he obtained a particular ranking model $P(\pi)$. On the other hand, the notion of L-decomposability is a slight generalization: given the ranking model $P(\pi)$, does there exist some collection of choice probabilities—not necessarily Luce's—that give rise to $P(\pi)$ via Eqn. (2)?

Critchlow et al. (1991) prove that a necessary and sufficient condition for L-decomposability is that for each rank $r = 3, \dots, k$ and for each $i_1, \dots, i_r$, the conditional probability is invariant under permuting the $i_1, \dots, i_{r-1}$. If a ranking model is L-decomposable, then it is easy to generate random rankings from the model, simply by generating the ranking stagewise, and using the choice probabilities at each stage.

$$P[\pi^{-1}(r) = i_r | \pi^{-1}(1) = i_1, \dots, \pi^{-1}(r-1) = i_{r-1}] \quad (3)$$

The Luce–Plackett model is an important example of a Thurstone order statistics model that satisfies L-decomposability, and indeed this property is closely linked with Luce's (1959) original formulation of the model. Luce's approach is to construct choice probabilities $P_B(i)$ on the basis of his Choice Axiom, which implies that for each item i there is a value p_i —the 'merit' of item i —such that for any subset B of $\{1, \dots, k\}$. Without loss of generality, the p_i can be scaled to sum to 1, so that p_i is interpreted as the probability that item i is most preferred among the full set of items. In conjunction with the ranking postulate in Eqn. (2), the choice probabilities in Eqn. (4) yield the ranking model where $B_r = \{i_r, \dots, i_k\}$ is the set of items remaining at stage r . Moreover, it can be proved that this is indeed an alternative description of the Luce–Plackett model, since Eqn. (5) coincides with the Thurstone order statistics model with Gumbel F and with $\mu_i = -\log p_i$. See, for example, Yellott (1977), who attributes this result to Holman and Marley see also Luce's Choice Axiom).

$$P_B(i) = p_i / \sum_{j \in B} p_j \quad (4)$$

$$P\{i_1, \dots, i_k\} = \prod_{r=1}^{k-1} \left(p_{i_r} / \sum_{j \in B_r} p_j \right) \quad (5)$$

3. Ranking Models Induced by Paired Comparisons

Babington Smith (1950) uses a conditioning argument for inducing a probability model on rankings from a set of arbitrary paired comparison probabilities. For each pair of items $i < j$, let p_{ij} be the probability that item i is preferred to item j ($i \neq j$) in a paired comparison of these two items. Imagine a tournament in which all of the $C(k, 2) \equiv k(k-1)/2$ possible paired comparisons are made independently. If the results of this tournament contain no circular triads ($h \neq i \neq j \neq h$), then the tournament corresponds to a unique ranking π of the items; otherwise the entire tournament is repeated until a unique ranking is obtained. The probability of any resulting π is thus given by where p_{ij} for $i > j$ is defined by $p_{ij} \equiv 1 - p_{ji}$, and C is a constant chosen to make the probabilities sum to 1.

$$P(\pi) = C \prod_{\{(i, j): \pi(i) < \pi(j)\}} p_{ij} \quad (6)$$

With regard to the properties of Sect. 2, the class of all Babington Smith models in Eqn. (6) is reversible, since if the parameter values p_{ij} (for $i < j$) correspond to ranking from best to worst, then the values $p_{ij}^* = 1 - p_{ij}$ correspond to ranking from worst to best. For a Babington Smith model to have complete consensus, Critchlow et al. (1991) prove that sufficient conditions are that no $p_{ij} = 0.5$ and that the $\{p_{ij}\}$ are strongly stochastically transitive (i.e., $p_{ij} \geq 0.5$ and $p_{jm} \geq 0.5$ imply $p_{im} \geq \max\{p_{ij}, p_{jm}\}$; see David 1988)). Finally, to verify L-decomposability, it is straightforward to check that Eqn. (3) is invariant under permuting the $i_1, \dots, i_{r-1}$, for all models of the form Eqn. (6).

Although the Babington Smith model is indexed by $k(k-1)/2$ parameters, constraints on the $\{p_{ij}\}$ proposed by Mallows (1957) lead to three important subclasses of the general Babington Smith model, having significantly fewer parameters. These subclasses are called the Mallows–Bradley–Terry (MBT) model, the rho-based model, and the ϕ -model, respectively.

To describe the MBT model, suppose the paired comparison probabilities have the Bradley–Terry (Bradley and Terry 1952) form

$$p_{ij} = v_i / (v_i + v_j)$$

for some nonnegative parameters $v_1, \dots, v_k$. Mallows suggests substituting the Bradley–Terry paired comparison probabilities into Eqn. (6), which leads to the MBT ranking model: for any ranking π with associated ordering $< i_1, \dots, i_k >$,

$$P(\pi) = C(\mathbf{v}) \prod_{r=1}^{k-1} (V_{i_r})^{k-r} \quad (7)$$ where $\mathbf{v} = (v_1, \dots, v_k)$ and the constant $C(\mathbf{v})$ is chosen to make the probabilities sum to 1. Since the Bradley–Terry paired comparison probabilities are strongly stochastically transitive, any MBT model has complete consensus, provided the v_i are distinct. Moreover, the ordering of the v_i from largest to smallest corresponds to the ordering of the items from best to worst in the modal ranking.

A further simplification of the MBT model has just one continuous parameter $\theta \in (0, 1)$ and a vector of discrete parameters $(\pi_0(1), \dots, \pi_0(k))$, where $\pi_0(i)$ is the rank assigned to item i by the modal ranking π_0 . Assuming that $v_i = \theta^{2\pi_0(i)}$ in Eqn. (7) gives Mallows's rho-based model

$$P(\pi | \theta, \pi_0) = C(\theta) \theta^{R^2(\pi, \pi_0)} \quad (8)$$

where

$$R^2(\pi, \pi_0) = \sum_{i=1}^k [\pi(i) - \pi_0(i)]^2$$

is the Spearman's rho-distance between the rankings π and π_0 , and is related to Spearman's (1904) correlation coefficient. The rho-based model has the interpretation that the probability $P(\pi)$ decreases geometrically, as the R^2 distance from π to π_0 increases. θ is a dispersion parameter: as $\theta \neq 1$, the rho-based model approaches the uniform distribution on all $k!$ possible rankings, whereas when $\theta \neq 0$, the model becomes increasingly concentrated about the modal ranking π_0 .

The final simplification of the general Babington Smith model is the well-known ϕ -model (Mallows 1957, Mann 1945). Unlike the rho-based model, the ϕ -model is not an MBT model. To describe the ϕ -model, suppose that in Eqn. (6) the corresponding paired comparison probabilities have the simple form $p_{ij} = (\phi + 1)^{-1} \geq 0.5$ for $\pi_0(i) < \pi_0(j)$, so that the probability that item i is preferred to item j only depends upon their relative order in the modal ranking. Then the resulting ranking model is

$$P(\pi | \phi, \pi_0) = C(\phi) \phi^{T(\pi, \pi_0)} \quad (9)$$

where

$$T(\pi, \pi_0) = \sum_{i < j} I\{\pi(i) - \pi(j)[\pi_0(i) - \pi_0(j)] < 0\}$$ is the Kendall's tau-distance between the rankings π and π_0 , and $I(\cdot)$ is the indicator function: $I(A) = 1$ if the event A occurs, and $= 0$ otherwise. Thus, the ϕ -model and its parameters have interpretations analogous to the rho-based model, except the tau-distance is used instead of Spearman's rho-distance. The ϕ -model has been developed, applied, and extended subsequently by many authors, for example Feigin and Cohen (1978), Schulman (1979), Smith and Evans (1991), and Huh et al. (1995), to name just a few.

4. Distance-based Ranking Models

By letting $\lambda = -\log \phi$ in (8), the ϕ -model can be written in the form of an exponential family as

$$P(\pi | \lambda, \pi_0) = C(\lambda) \exp\{-\lambda T(\pi, \pi_0)\}$$

where the constant $C(\lambda) = [\sum_{\pi \in S_k} \exp\{-\lambda T(\pi, \pi_0)\}]^{-1}$. Diaconis (1988 p. 104) uses this representation to motivate a general class of metric-based ranking models where d is an arbitrary metric on the group S_k of all permutations.

$$P(\pi | \lambda, \pi_0) = C(\lambda) \exp\{-\lambda d(\pi, \pi_0)\}$$

Diaconis (1988 pp. 112–9) considers the following metrics on S_k to be among the most widely used in applied scientific and statistical problems:

$$T(\pi, \nu) = \sum_{i < j} I\{\pi(i) - \pi(j)[\nu(i) - \nu(j)] < 0\}$$ is the Kendall's tau metric:

$$R(\pi, \nu) = \left(\sum_i [\pi(i) - \nu(i)]^2 \right)^{1/2}$$ is the Spearman's rho metric:

$$F(\pi, \nu) = \sum_i |\pi(i) - \nu(i)|$$

is the Spearman's footrule metric:

$$H(\pi, \nu) = \sum_i I\{\pi(i) \neq \nu(i)\}$$

is the Hamming metric:

$C(\pi, \nu)$ = minimal number of transpositions needed to transform π into ν is Cayley's metric and

$U(\pi, \nu) = k -$ (the maximal number of items ranked in the same relative order by π and ν) is Ulam's metric. All of these satisfy the usual metric axioms of positivity, symmetry, and the triangle inequality, and thus give rise to metric-based ranking models. Additionally, the class of metric-based models may be enlarged to include Mallows's rho-based model, Eqn. (8), by dropping the triangle inequality requirement for d . The resulting function d is called a distance rather than a true metric, and the resulting model is a distance-based ranking model (Fligner and Verducci 1986). Not much is lost in this generalization, although the triangle inequality property has a desirable interpretation with respect to the behavior of likelihood ratio tests for π_0 (Critchlow 1985 pp. 101–2).

Properties of distance-based ranking models are related to analogous properties of the distance d . Let $\mathcal{P}_d$ denote the class of all ranking models associated with a fixed distance d . Then $\mathcal{P}_d$ is reversible if the distance d satisfies where $\pi^(i) \equiv k + 1 - \pi(i)$ and $\nu^(i) \equiv k + 1 - \nu(i)$ are the permutations that rank the items in exactly the reverse order as π and ν , respectively. All of the distances T , R , R^2 , F , H , C , and U satisfy Eqn. (10), and hence give rise to reversible classes.

$$d(\pi^, \nu^) = d(\pi, \nu) \quad \text{for all } \pi, \nu \in S_k \quad (10)$$

A distance-based model has complete consensus if and only if d possesses the transposition property (Critchlow 1985 pp. 101–2): $d(\pi, \nu) \leq d(\pi', \nu)$ whenever π , π' , and ν are permutations such that π and π' assign identical ranks to all items except for i and j , and ν agrees with π on the relative ordering of i and j . Since the distances T , R , R^2 , and F satisfy this transposition property, the models based on these distances exhibit complete consensus.

Finally, Critchlow et al. (1991) prove that a distance-based ranking model is L-decomposable if and only if the distance d is additively decomposable, in the sense that for each $r = 2, \dots, k$, there exist functions f_r and g_r such that where e is the identity permutation $e(i) \equiv i$. It follows that the models based on T , R^2 , F , and H are L-decomposable.

$$d(\pi, e) = f_r[\pi^{-1}(1), \dots, \pi^{-1}(r-1)] + g_r[\pi^{-1}(r), \dots, \pi^{-1}(k)]$$

4.1 Extensions

Some important multiparameter extensions of the distance-based and ϕ -models include the ϕ -component models and multistage models of Fligner and Verducci (1986, 1988), as well as the orthogonal contrast models (Chung and Marden 1991, 1993, Marden 1992).

Critchlow (1985) develops distance-based models for partially ranked data, such as rankings of only the q best items out of k , where $q < k - 1$. The set of all partial rankings of the best q items is identified with the quotient space S_k/S_{k-q} of the permutation group, consisting of all right cosets of the subgroup $S_{k-q} = \{\pi \in S_k \mid \pi(i) = i, i = 1, \dots, q\}$. Any metric d on S_k induces a Hausdorff metric d^* on the quotient space S_k/S_{k-q} , which serves as the metric for these models. Critchlow gives the Hausdorff extensions of T , R , F , H , C , and U , and applies the resulting models to partially ranked data sets.

See also: Consensus Panels: Methodology; Non-parametric Statistics: Rank-based Methods; Order Statistics; Ordered Relational Structures; Scaling and Classification in Social Measurement; Unfolding and Vector Models

Bibliography

- Babington Smith B 1950 Discussion on Professor Ross's paper. Journal of the Royal Statistical Society B 12: 153–62
- Bradley RA, Terry MA 1952 Rank analysis of incomplete block designs. I. Biometrika 39(3): 324–45
- Bockenholt U 1993 Applications of Thurstonian models to ranking data. In: Fligner MA, Verducci JS (eds.) Probability Models and Statistical Analyses for Ranking Data. Springer-Verlag, New York, pp. 157–72
- Brook D, Upton G J G 1974 Biases in local government elections due to position on the ballot paper. Applied Statistics 23: 414–9
- Chung L, Marden J I 1991 Use of nonnull models for rank statistics in bivariate, two-sample, and analysis-of-variance problems. Journal of the American Statistical Association 86: 188–200
- Chung L, Marden J I 1993 Extensions of Mallows' ϕ model. In: Fligner MA, Verducci JS (eds.) Probability Models and Statistical Analyses for Ranking Data. Springer-Verlag, New York, pp. 108–39
- Critchlow DE 1985 Metric Methods for Analyzing Partially Ranked Data. Lecture Notes in Statistics, Vol. 34. Springer-Verlag, New York
- Critchlow DE, Fligner MA, Verducci JS 1991 Probability models on rankings. Journal of Mathematical Psychology 35: 294–318
- Daniels HE 1950 Rank correlation and population models. Biometrika 33: 129–35

- David H A 1988 The Method of Paired Comparisons, 2nd edn. Oxford University Press, New York
- Diaconis P 1988 Group Representations in Probability and Statistics. Institute of Mathematical Statistics, Hayward
- Feigin P, Cohen A 1978 On a model for concordance between judges. Journal of the Royal Statistical Society B 40: 203–13
- Fishburn PC 1994 On 'choice' probabilities derived from ranking distributions. Journal of Mathematical Psychology 38: 274–85
- Fligner MA, Verducci JS 1986 Distance-based ranking models. Journal of the Royal Statistical Society B 48: 859–69
- Fligner MA, Verducci JS 1988 Multi-stage ranking models. Journal of the American Statistical Association 83: 892–901
- Fligner MA, Verducci JS (eds.) 1993 Probability Models and Statistical Analyses for Ranking Data. Lecture Notes in Statistics, Volume 80. Springer-Verlag, New York
- Henery R J 1981 Permutation probabilities as models for horse races. Journal of the Royal Statistical Society B 43: 86–91
- Henery R J 1983 Permutation probabilities for gamma random variables. Journal of Applied Probability 20: 822–34
- Huh M-H, Critchlow DE, Verducci JS, Kiecolt-Glaser J, Glaser R, Malarkey WB 1995 A symmetric analysis of paired rankings with application to temporal patterns of hormonal concentration. Biometrics 51: 1361–71
- Luce RD 1959 Individual Choice Behavior. Wiley, New York
- Mallows CL 1957 Non-null ranking models. I. Biometrika 44: 114–30
- Mann HB 1945 Non-parametric tests against trends. Econometrica 13: 245–59
- Marden J I 1995 Analyzing and Modeling Rank Data. Chapman and Hall, London
- Marley A A J 1968 Some probabilistic models of simple choice and ranking. Journal of Mathematical Psychology 5: 311–32
- Marley A A J 1982 Random utility models with all choice probabilities expressible as 'functions' of the binary choice probabilities. Mathematical Social Sciences 3: 39–56
- Marley A A J 1993 Aggregation theorems and the combination of probabilistic rank orders. In: Fligner MA, Verducci JS (eds.) Probability Models and Statistical Analyses for Ranking Data. Springer-Verlag, New York, pp. 216–40
- Mosteller F 1951 Remarks on the method of paired comparisons: I. The least squares solution assuming equal standard deviations and equal correlations. Psychometrika 16: 3–9
- Pendergrass RN, Bradley RA 1960 Ranking in triple comparisons. In: Olkin I, Ghurye SG, Hoeffding W, Madow WG, Mann HB (eds.) Contributions to Probability and Statistics: Essays in Honor of Harold Hotelling. Stanford University Press, Palo Alto, CA, pp. 331–51
- Plackett RL 1975 The analysis of permutations. Applied Statistics 24: 193–202
- Savage IR 1956 Contributions to the theory of rank order statistics—the two-sample case. Annals of Mathematical Statistics 27: 590–615
- Savage IR 1957 Contributions to the theory of rank order statistics—the 'trend' case. Annals of Mathematical Statistics 28: 968–77
- Schulman RR 1979 Ordinal data: An alternative distribution. Psychometrika 44: 3–20
- Smith LA, Evans DA 1991 Estimating a population distribution of sequences of k items from cross-sectional data. Applied Statistics 40: 31–42
- Spearman C 1904 The proof and measurement of association between two things. American Journal of Psychology 15: 72–101
- Stern HS 1990 Models for distributions on permutations. Journal of the American Statistical Association 85: 558–64

- Thurstone L L 1927 A law of comparative judgement. Psychological Reviews 34: 273–86
- Yellott J 1977 The relationship between Luce's choice axiom, Thurstone's theory of comparative judgment, and the double exponential distribution. Journal of Mathematical Psychology 15: 109–44
- Yellott J 1997 Preference models and irreversibility. In: Marley A A J (ed.) Choice, Decision, and Measurement: Essays in Honor of R. D. Luce. Erlbaum, Hillsdale, NJ, pp. 133–53

D. E. Critchlow

Rape and Sexual Coercion

The following summarizes the biological, and cultural approaches to the understanding of rape in human societies and evaluates these approaches by reference to studies demonstrating the incidence and social correlates of sexual coercion in the United States and cross-culturally.

1. The Biological View

The biological explanation for rape and sexual coercion is grounded in the argument that sexual aggression is an evolved adaptation in human males. The argument builds on Charles Darwin's theory of natural and sexual selection. Natural selection is the doctrine that in the struggle for existence evolutionary progress is achieved by the inheritance of advantageous characteristics which prosper at the expense of less advantageous ones. Sexual selection is a specific case of natural selection applied to the evolution of sex differences. Darwin claimed that the greater size and strength of human males was due 'in chief part to inheritance from his half-human male ancestors.' According to Darwin such characteristics 'would have been preserved or even augmented during the long ages of man's savagery, by the success of the strongest and boldest men, both in the general struggle for life, and in their contest for wives.' He measured success by the number of children some men left as compared with their 'less favoured brethren' (Darwin 1936, pp. 872–3).

In the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the Darwinian doctrine of sexual selection was applied to treatises on human sexual behavior produced by the famous sexologists R. F. von Krafft-Ebing and Havelock Ellis. In his magnum opus, Psychopathia Sexualis, first published in German in 1886, Krafft-Ebing argued that 'gratification of the sexual instinct [is] the primary motive in man as well as in beast' (quoted by Sanday 1996 p. 125). In the third volume of his Studies in the Psychology of Sex, published in Philadelphia between 1897 and 1910, Ellis comes very close to making rape the sine qua non of sexual arousal. Ellis conceives of human sexual behavior as a game of combat. Playing the role of hunted animal the female conceals her sexual passion by adopting a demeanor of modesty in order that the male may be more ardent and forceful. Ellis claims that as the hunt becomes more sexually charged, 'an element of real violence, of undisguised cruelty' is introduced. Accepting the Darwinian theory of natural selection with its emphasis on competition and brute strength, Ellis claimed that a woman who resisted 'the assaults of the male' aided natural selection 'by putting to the test man's most important quality, force' (quoted by Sanday 1996, pp. 127–8) (see Male Dominance for more on the social meaning of sex differences in Western thought).

At the end of the twentieth century, the Darwinian approach was again applied to the subject of the 'biological bases of sexual coercion' by Randy Thornhill and Craig T. Palmer in their book A Natural History of Rape (2000). Like Krafft-Ebing and Ellis they make a distinction between sexual desire in human males and females. Citing the work of anthropologist Donald Symons (1979, pp. 264–7), these authors claim that rape is due to certain adaptations making males more easily aroused, with a greater sex drive, a reduced ability to abstain from sexual activity, in need of greater sexual variety, and less discriminating in choice of sexual partner (Thornhill and Palmer 2000, p. 62). However, while Symons suggests that rape is a by-product of such adaptations, Thornhill and Palmer suggest that rape is itself an adaptation, which they call 'the human rape-adaptation' (Thornhill and Palmer 2000, p. 62). By this they mean that rape has a direct biological basis rather than being a behavioral consequence of other evolved behaviors.

To support their argument for the evolved nature of such an adaptation, Thornhill and Palmer (2000, p. 62) say it is necessary to identify 'mechanisms involved in rape that were designed by selection in the past specifically for reproduction by means of rape'. Because such mechanisms exist in the morphology of certain insects, they seem to suggest, they must also exist in humans. To make their case, the authors draw parallels with scorpion flies, which they point out have a physical adaptation for rape. Male scorpion flies have an organ, 'a pair of clamp-like structures, one on either side of the penis,' that serves to keep unwilling females in a mating position (2000, p. 63).

Admitting that there is no 'conspicuous morphology that might be a rape adaptation' in human males, Thornhill and Palmer (2000, pp. 64–5) look 'to the male psyche for candidates for rape adaptations.' They propose (2000, pp. 65–6) a number of 'psychological mechanisms' as 'adaptations' that can be viewed as 'analogous' to the rape adaptations observed in 'male insects'.

In a review of the argument put forward by Thornhill and Palmer, Frans B. M. de Waal, a prominent biologist, points out that they have not demonstrated that rape in humans is a product of natural selection. According to Waal, 'for natural selection to favor rape, rapists would have to differ genetically from nonrapists and need to sow their seed more successfully, so to speak, causing more pregnancies than nonrapists, or at least more than they would without raping' (Waal 2000, p. 24). 'Not a shred of evidence for these two requirements is present' Waal concludes (2000, p. 24). Waal also points out that the psychological mechanisms Thornhill and Palmer propose do not demonstrate natural selection but have to do 'with judgment of people and situations, a multi-purpose capacity also present in women' (2000, p. 24). Waal's emphasis on judgement leads us to the cultural argument.

2. The Cultural Approach

Against a strictly biological explanation of human behavior anthropologist Clifford Geertz (1973, p. 46) argues that without culture patterns (i.e. 'organized systems of significant symbols') human behavior would be shapeless and without direction, 'a mere chaos of pointless acts and exploding emotions.' Applied to sexual behavior, the cultural approach, accepted by many anthropologists and sociologists, suggests that sexual behavior is part of a broader cultural system which includes notions of masculinity and femininity, ideas about appropriate sexual relations, cues for sexual arousal, and messages about the consequences of sexual expression. As anthropologist Malinowski said long ago, '[s]ex in its widest meaning... is rather a sociological and cultural force than a mere bodily relation of two individuals' (Malinowski 1929, p. xxiii).

Peggy Reeves Sanday (1981) puts Malinowski's claim to the test in a study of the sociocultural context of rape cross-culturally. Using a standard sample of band and tribal societies, Sanday found that 47 percent of the societies for which there was adequate information showed a low frequency of rape, compared with 18 percent which were unambiguously 'rape prone.' Commenting on the pattern of correlations revealed by her study, Sanday (1981, p. 5) concludes that rape by males is part of 'a cultural configuration' which includes interpersonal violence among men as well as between men and women and male social dominance. Rape-prone societies are more likely to be characterized by male segregation in separate houses, an ideology of male toughness, emphasis on competition, low respect for women as citizens, and the absence of women in the public domain of economic and political affairs. In the more rape-free societies, there is an ethos of cooperation and consensus in human affairs. The social separation of the sexes is less marked and both sexes are more likely to hold exalted positions in public decision-making and to be integrated and equal in the affairs of everyday life.

Anthropologist Carole Vance (1984, pp. 7–8) also cites the diversity in human sexual practices to suggest that biology does not 'directly or simply determine the configuration or meaning of sexuality'. If this were the case, she argues, we would encounter uniformity cross-culturally rather than the startling diversity that actually exists in which 'activities condemned in one society are encouraged in another, and ideas about what is attractive or erotic, or sexually satisfying or even sexually possible vary a great deal.' Vance concludes that 'the body and its actions [must be] understood according to prevailing codes of meaning.' She suggests that an important question for research must be 'What is the nature of the relationship between the arbitrariness of social construction and the immediacy of... bodily sensations and functions?' (Vance 1984, pp. 7–9; see also Caplan 1987, pp. 1–27 on the cultural construction of sexuality).

In a study of the sociocultural and historical contexts of rape in the United States, Sanday (1996, p. 26) coins the term 'sexual culture' to describe the system of meanings, standards, and expected behaviors by which male and female sexuality is judged and understood. She argues that historically theories like those of Darwin, Krafft-Ebing, and Ellis functioned as cultural templates for popular sexual stereotypes by means of which males and females judged appropriate sexual behavior and acted accordingly. Because these stereotypes condoned sexual aggression by making it 'natural,' such as seen in the idea that 'boys will be boys,' US rape laws applied primarily to the use of force by a stranger. This changed after feminist activism in the 1970s resulted in more stringent legal codes. The same activism initiated studies on the incidence and social correlates of rape in America showing that acquaintance rape was much more common than stranger rape (Sanday 1996, pp. 161–207).

3. Rape Statistics in the United States

US statistics come from numerous studies utilizing national, community, or college samples. In general, these studies define rape as nonconsensual sexual intercourse irrespective of whether the parties know one another. Nonconsent is defined using the modern legal definition of rape. In most states, rape is defined as nonconsensual sex either due to the use of force or taking advantage of a person's inability to consent because of intimidation or because of alcohol or drugs. Although most studies focus on heterosexual rape, some authors note that rape also affects same-sex couples.

The first study designed to measure the percentage of those claiming they had been raped in a specified sample population was conducted in 1957 by sociologist Eugene Kanin on a college campus. This survey revealed that 55 percent of the 291 college women interviewed said they had experienced offensive episodes 'at some level of erotic intimacy.' Twenty-one percent said they were offended 'by forceful attempts at intercourse' and 6.2 percent by 'aggressively forceful attempts at sex intercourse in the course of which menacing threats or coercive infliction of physical pain were employed.' Of the latter group 48 percent told no one and none reported to anyone in authority (Kirkpatrick and Kanin 1957, pp. 53, 56).

Another well-known path breaking study was conducted by Diane Russell in 1978 in San Francisco. Russell interviewed 930 women ranging in age from 18 to 80 of diverse social classes and racial/ethnic groups. Twenty-four percent of the women interviewed reported at least one completed rape, and 31 percent reported at least one attempted rape. The majority experienced rape by acquaintances and a much smaller percentage by strangers (Russell 1984, pp. 34–8).

Two large-scale national studies yielded similar results. In 1985 Mary Koss joined with Ms. magazine to survey a national sample of 6,159 students on 32 college campuses. This study found that many more women and men were having sex in the 1980s compared to the figures reported by Alfred Kinsey in his landmark studies of male and female sexual behavior published in the 1940s and 1950s. One-quarter of the men interviewed in the Koss–Ms. study reported involvement in some form of sexual aggression, ranging from unwanted touching to rape. A high percentage of the males did not name their use of force as rape. Eighty-eight percent said it was definitely not rape. Forty-seven percent said they would do the same thing again (summarized by Sanday 1996, pp. 191–2; see also Koss 1988, 1992, Warshaw 1988).

One in four of the women surveyed by Koss said yes to questions asking about behaviors that in most states would be legally defined as rape or attempted rape (for this definition see above). The power of popular stereotypes for defining acceptable sexual behavior and the adversarial nature of these stereotypes is reflected in the fact that most of the women reporting incidents that would legally qualify as rape did not call it rape. The term 'date rape' evolved from this study because many of the women surveyed said that the behavior often occurred on dates. Although most did not call it rape, Koss reported that 'the great majority of rape victims conceptualized their experience in highly negative terms and felt victimized whether or not they realized that legal standards for rape had been met' (Koss 1992, pp. 122–6).

By the end of the 1990s a number of scientifically designed research studies revealed similar statistics (for a summary of studies see Koss 1993 and Sanday 1996, pp. 184–206). The findings reported in these studies are corroborated by a national study of sex in America conducted in 1992 employing a representative probability sample of 3,432 Americans (see Michael et al. 1994). The findings fall within the range of many other studies: '22 percent of women were forced to do something sexually at some time,' while 'just 2 percent of men were forced.' The authors of this study concluded that 'as many as one in five women' experience some form of sexual coercion, including rape, in the United States (Michael et al. 1994, pp. 33, 221–2).

4. The Social Correlates of Rape in US Studies

A number of studies conducted late in the twentieth century indicate that the adversarial view of male–female sexual interaction described by the early sexologists is frequently held by sexually coercive males. In a study of a large southeastern university, Boeringer (1996, pp. 137–9) reports that 56 percent of the males he interviewed admitted to obtaining sex by verbal harassment (i.e., 'threatening to end a relationship unless the victim consents to sex, falsely professing love, or telling the victim lies to render her more sexually receptive'). One-quarter of the males reported using drugs or alcohol to obtain sex and 9 percent reported at least one use of force or threatened force to obtain sex. Boeringer concludes that such verbally coercive tactics suggest an 'adversarial view of sexuality in which one should use deceit and guile to win favors from a woman' (p. 140).

Sexually aggressive men, from convicted rapists to college males answering questions on social surveys, share a remarkably similar set of attitudes. Most believe that sexual aggression is normal, that sexual relationships involve game playing, that men should dominate women, that women are responsible for rape, and that relations between the sexes are adversarial and manipulative on both sides (Koss and Leonard 1984, pp. 221, 223). Reanalyzing Koss' data to pinpoint attitudes held by the self-admitted sexually aggressive men of her study (i.e., those who admitted to forcing a woman to have sex in Koss's 1985 questionnaire), Sanday (1996, pp. 196–7) found that these men often expressed adversarial-like beliefs. For example, many stated that they believe that a woman's No means Yes and that women say no to intercourse because they don't want to seem loose but really hope the man will force her. Compared with men who do not admit to forcing a woman, more of these men also think that being roughed up by a man is sexually stimulating to women and that women have an unconscious wish to be raped. Few of the women in Koss' sample hold such attitudes.

To conclude, there is considerable evidence suggesting that whatever the biological basis of male sexual aggression might be, family background and cultural context make a difference. The incidence of rape is far lower among men raised in stable, peaceful environments be it a family context in a complex society like the United States or the intimate communities of small-scale traditional societies in which the ethos is one of mutual respect between the sexes.

To say that some men will rape in all societies and to use this fact to make generalizations about the sexual predilections of all men may bring about the very sexual culture one is trying to avoid by creating a lore that makes sexual aggression a 'natural' part of masculinity. More important for the education of young males is the conclusion based on studies in the US and cross-culturally that most men in most societies do not rape, and those who do face social rejection or incarceration.

5. Prevention

Examples of prevention strategies based on the biological approach are offered by Thornhill and Palmer (2000, pp. 169–88). Believing that rape occurs 'in all the environments in which humans societies [sic] have been known to exist' (p. 171), they are less interested in changing the environment by challenging popular stereotypes than with focusing on the 'exact nature of the psychological mechanisms that guide male sexual behavior' (p. 172). They offer a number of suggestions including certain types of educational programs. Citing the view of rape proposed by Camille Paglia, claim Thornhill and Palmer (2000, p. 183) that since men 'have evolved sexual preferences for young and healthy women and are attracted to women who signal potential availability by means of dress and behavior,' women should be informed of the risk factors and use the information to lower their risk of rape by paying attention, for example, to dress and appearance. They also suggest more direct social interventions such as separating vulnerable females from males.

The cultural approach argues for a change in rape laws and sexual stereotypes so that nonconsensual sex is treated unambiguously as a crime. Increasingly, this approach defines rape not just in terms of the use of force or drugs, but more broadly as failure to obtain verbal consent. The operative words of the new American sexual ideology are 'affirmative verbal consent,' 'freely given agreement,' and 'sexual communication.' Such modern adaptations would be acceptable to Darwin's view of natural selection because they promote sexual health and well being in an era of sexually transmitted diseases. One point left out of discussions of the biological bases of rape is the fact that as much as Darwin stressed competition, he also stressed cooperation or acting on behalf of what he called 'the general good or welfare of the community' (quoted by Sanday 1996, p. 288). Called 'altruism' by students of human evolution, some suggest that the primary selective pressure in human evolution was not for violent men but for those who were able to cooperate with women and other males in organized food gathering. Some anthropologists believe that this ability to cooperate was responsible for the evolution of human culture (Tanner 1981). In light of the ever increasing incidence of sexually transmitted diseases together with the evolution of nuclear weapons, one can also note that today there is a fine line between aggressive behavior that results in reproductive success and behavior that leads human populations instead to the brink of extinction.

See also: Domestic Violence: Sociological Perspectives; Family and Gender; Family Bargaining; Female Genital Mutilation; Feminist Legal Theory; Feminist Theory; Feminist Theory: Psychoanalytic; Feminist Theory: Radical Lesbian; Gender and Feminist Studies; Gender and Reproductive Health; Gender and the Law; Gender Ideology: Cross-cultural Aspects; Heterosexism and Homophobia; Male Dominance; Masculinities and Femininities; Pornography; Prostitution; Rape and Sexual Coercion; Regulation: Sexual Behavior; Reproductive Rights in Affluent Nations; Reproductive Rights in Developing Nations; Sex Offenders, Clinical Psychology of; Sexual Attitudes and Behavior; Sexual Behavior: Sociological Perspective; Sexual Harassment: Legal Perspectives; Sexual Harassment: Social and Psychological Issues; Sexual Perversions (Paraphilias); Sexual Risk Behaviors; Sexuality and Gender; Teen Sexuality; Treatment of the Repetitive Criminal Sex Offender: United States; Women's Health

Bibliography

- Boeringer S B 1996 Influences of fraternity membership, athletics, and male living arrangements on sexual aggression. Violence Against Women 2(2): 134–47
- Caplan P (ed.) 1987 The Cultural Construction of Sexuality. Tavistock, London
- Darwin C 1936 The Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection or the Preservation of Favoured Races in the Struggle for Life and the Descent of Man and Selection in Relation to Sex. The Modern Library, New York
- Geertz C 1973 The Interpretation of Cultures: Selected Essays. Basic Books, New York
- Kirkpatrick C, Kanin E J 1957 Male sex aggression on a university campus. American Sociological Review 22: 52–8
- Koss M P 1988 Hidden rape: Sexual aggression and victimization in a national sample of students in higher education. In: Burgess A W (ed.) Rape and Sexual Assault II. Garland Publishing, New York, pp. 3–25
- Koss M P 1992 Defending date rape. Journal of Interpersonal Violence 7(1): 122–6
- Koss M P 1993 Rape: Scope, impact, interventions, and public policy responses. American Psychologist 48(10): 1062–9
- Koss M P, Leonard K E 1984 Sexually aggressive men: Empirical findings and theoretical implications. In: Malamuth N M, Donnerstein E (eds.) Pornography and Sexual Aggression. Academic Press, New York, pp. 213–32
- Malinowski B 1929 The Sexual Life of Savages in North-Western Melanesia: An Ethnographic Account of Courtship, Marriage, and Family Life among the Natives of the Trobriand Islands, British New Guinea. G. Routledge & Sons, London
- Michael, R T, Gagnon J H, Laumann E O, Kolata G 1994 Sex in America: A Definitive Survey. Little, Brown and Company, Boston

- Russell D E H 1984 Sexual Exploitation: Rape, Child Sexual Abuse, and Workplace Harassment. Sage, Beverly Hills, CA
- Sanday P R 1981 The socio-cultural context of rape: A cross-cultural study. Journal of Social Issues 37(4): 5–27
- Sanday P R 1996 A Woman Scorned: Acquaintance Rape on Trial. University of California Press, Berkeley, CA
- Symons D 1979 The Evolution of Human Sexuality. Oxford University Press, New York
- Tanner N M 1981 On Becoming Human. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Thornhill R, Palmer C T 2000 A Natural History of Rape: Biological Bases of Sexual Coercion. MIT Press, Cambridge, MA
- Vance C S 1984 Pleasure and danger. In: Vance C (ed.) Pleasure and Danger: Exploring Female Sexuality. Routledge and Kegan Paul, Boston, pp. 1–28
- Warshaw R 1988 I Never Called It Rape: The Ms Report on Recognizing, Fighting and Surviving Date and Acquaintance Rape. Harper & Row, New York
- de Waal F B M 2000 Survival of the rapist. NY Times Book Review April 2: 24–25

P. R. Sanday

Rational Choice and Organization Theory

Rational Choice Theory (RCT) and Organizational Theory (OT) are two different, yet—in the works of some neoclassical economists, rational choice sociologists, and economic organizational theorists—closely related theories. Rational choice theory is used by economic organizational theorists as a method of aggregation. Specifically, it is used when it is necessary to link the change in actions of individuals with change in characteristics of organizations. However, organizational analysts generally take a broader view in which organizational context, organizational structure, and individual actions interact and move together to change organizational functioning. Such a perspective does not rest on the assumption that aggregated individual choices explain organizational behavior. In some cases, organizational theory explains how individual actions articulate with structure. In other cases, organizational theory does not deal with individual actions. Rather, it deals with articulating relationships between and among organizational and contextual characteristics.

The purpose of this analysis is to compare RCT with OT. Rational choice theory is based on the premise of self-interested utility maximizing actions/choices of individuals. Organizational theory is based on the premise of organizational rationality, the efficient functioning of organizations through means/ends relationships. Organizational economic theory, which consists of transactions cost economics and agency theory, forms an indirect link between the RCT and OT. First, differences by defining the origin and premises of RCT and premises of Organizational Theory are elaborated. This is followed by demonstrating the link between the two, as developed in the premises of transaction cost analysis and agency theory. Although transaction theory holds to the premises of organizational efficiency, it finds the premise of self-interest utility maximization problematic. On the other hand, while agency theory holds the premise of self-interested, utility maximizing individual choice of RCT, and finds the guiding premise of organizational theory, the efficient functioning of firms, to be problematic. Thus, even the economic organizational theories, which purport to link RCT and OT are able to do so only if they accept either the RCT premises or the OT premises. As one set of premises are assumed, the other becomes problematic and becomes the questions to be examined in the analysis. No organizational theory has successfully integrated RCT and OT.

1. Rational Choice Theory: Origin and Premises

Rational Choice Theory originates in the British utilitarian tradition, via neo-classical economics. It is the core of classical economic theory. Although often qualified beyond recognition to meet conditional constraints of organizational analysts, it has been adopted in sociology (social choice) and in political science (public choice, game theory). In organizational theory and analysis, rational choice is most often used for the development of economic models of organizations. Transaction cost economics (TCE) and agency theory (AT) are the dominant economic organizational perspectives.

The premises at the basis of RCT as derived from neoclassical economic theory are: (a) self-maximizing individual utility driven actors, unconstrained by others and social norms (Coleman 1990, p. 503); (b) actors possess complete information and knowledge of their tastes, existing resources, the resources of others and market characteristics of the products and services they seek; (c) actors calculate and recalculate the changing conditions and act rationally; (d) however, preferences do not change, they are stable, and they are given often implied from the very behavior they are to predict; (e) actors are not emotional, irrational, impulsive, habitual in their choices, they are rational; (f) interaction is defined as an exchange between buyer and seller achieved when utility and cost converge in a market transaction of supply and demand equilibrium.

Rational choice theory (RCT) is an axiomatic system that provides a basis for making individual decisions/choices. The axioms of RCT define rational choice on the basis of choices between pairs of alternatives, which meet the axiomatic requirements of: consistency, transitivity, independence, continuity, and monotonicity. Consistency demands that it be possible for all the decision maker's options to be ranked. The assumption of consistency is also called the assumption of connectedness. Preferences must be either equal or unequal. Unequal preferences can be rank ordered for comparison across the decision maker's entire set of preferences. Transitivity is the assumption that if A is preferred to B, and B is preferred to C, then consistency requires that A is preferred to C (Green and Shapiro 1994, pp. 14–15). The distance between preferences or magnitude of preferences does not have to be known to the subject or the analyst. Independence assumes that all preferences are independent of all other preferences. The continuity assumption is that preferences hold across time and space. Rational choice theorists assume monotonicity—all decision rules and preferences are stable across individuals and time. Allowing for assumptions of interpersonal variation produces enormous tractability problems (Storm 1990, p. 126). Another assumption of RCT is that individuals 'maximize the expected value of their payoff measured on some utility scale' and that, usually, 'numerical probabilities can be attached to different eventualities' (Luce and Raiffa 1957, p. 50). Eventuality is calculated as the value of the outcome 'weighted by the probability of achieving it' (Elster 1986, Harsanyi 1986).

2. Organizational Theory: Origin and Premises

Rational choice theory and organizational theory are brought together by the term rational. However, the term has different meanings (Zey-Ferrell 1981) for RCT and OT. RCT is based on the idea that an individual seeks to maximize his/her utilities as they conduct organization business. The central tenant of rational choice is that individuals at all levels of organizations act selfishly based on their own preferences to maximize their utility. This is rational individual behavior. OT defines rational as the way in which economic organizations are designed—the most efficient method of organizing. This is rational organizational behavior.

Rationality in OT originates in Weber's ([1922] 1968) concept of 'rational bourgeois capitalism,' which connotes the systematic organization of ideas, people, and resources in the interests of instrumental efficiency and effectiveness. Weber wrote that rationality and its accompanying bureaucratic organizational form, based on formalization of the rule of law and differentiation of functions, pervaded not only the modern economy, but public administration, the legal system, and religions. The rationalization of bureaucratic structures led to increased efficiency. In Weber's model, organizational rationality and rationalization are essentially the same. This is not a (micro-level) individual process as it is in RCT. It is an organizational process or specification of mean/ends relationships based on systematic calculation and recalculation to achieve the most efficient organizational functioning. Subsequent analyses of organizations have assumed this rationality is the basis of organizations and developed theories around this premise.

3. Divergences of Rational Choice and Organizational Theories

In addition to definitional divergence of the term rational, the most apparent divergence is the difference in the unit of analysis. RCT attempts to explain individual choice behavior. RCT is based on the utility maximizing behavior of individual choice, while OT is based on the assumption of efficiency seeking organizational design. OT explains behavior of organizations. The utility maximizing behavior of individuals and the assumption of efficiency-seeking organizational design are similar, but are at different levels of analysis. If the unit is the individual, the utility being maximized is individual owner or employee self-interest. If the unit is the organization, the utility being maximized is profitability. Profitability of the firm does not always translate into income or other self-interests of firm members. Likewise, rational efficient organizational functioning does not always maximize the self-interest of organizational members.

Economic organizational theorist define organizations as firms doing business in markets. Neoclassical economists begin with market assumptions and work backward to firms and individuals assuming that actors operating in firms act in ways consistent with the theory of the market. However, assumptions that hold for RCT do not hold for organizational actors. Let us take just one assumption, that of assuming that all actors have full information about costs. Because each of them knows the cost and adjusts the quantity of their purchase, it is reasonable to assume that the market will settle on an equilibrium. In organizations these assumptions are false. Many types of decisions are not afforded to each actor. The choices available to each actor are not the same. Some actors' choices impose constraints on the choices available to others. Some actors do not know that a particular choice exists. For example, information about pending mergers and acquisitions. During mergers and acquisitions, parts of corporations maintain secrecy, not only from other firms, but from other units of their own firm and individual within their own units (Zey 1993, 1999). For example, securities firms are required by law to construct walls of secrecy, 'Chinese Walls,' between M&A units and traders to prevent insider trading. Information is also kept secret to prevent oppositional reactions to present and new allocations of organizational resources. Information is not equally distributed among or within organizational units for deliberate power-based reasons. Finally, the norms of

Table 1

Rational Choice Theory (RCT) and Organizational Theory (OT): Ideal type contrasts

	Rational choice theory	Organizational theory
Intellectual Origins	Neumann and Morgensterns Milton Freideman	Max Weber and Herbert Simon Oliver Williamson Michael Jensen
Unit of Analysis	Individual	Organization
Content of Analysis	Preferences	Characteristics of organization and relationships to context
Human Nature	Self-interested	Self- and other interested
Rationality	Individual, self-interested Utility maximizer	Means/ends efficiency of functioning
Utility Maximization	Self-interests	Profits in firms
Human Preferences	Fixed hierarchy	Variable over time and place
Basis for Interaction	Assumed trust	Trust is problematic
Constraints	Economic actions are constrained by tastes and scarcity of resources	Organization actions are constrained by scarcity but also by social structure, and historical context
Method	Predictive and explanation Not descriptive. Formal, mathematical model building no empirical data (clean hands)	Many methodologies comparative, historical based on data from empirical observations (dirty hands) organizational rationality, efficiency dictates that various units within an organization should not receive the same information, but only what is necessary for their organizational entity. For all units to receive all information would be inefficient.

4. The Link Between Rational Choice Theory and Organizational Theory

Although rational choice theory and organizational theory are based on different premises and units of analysis, one type of theory, organizational economic theory, has attempted to link the two sets of premises and units of analysis. There are two dominant perspectives in organizational economic theory transaction cost economics and agency theory.

Economic organizational theory, both agency theory (AT) and transaction cost economics (TCE), begins with the relationships between individuals and organizations that are often conceptualized as events or transactions in which goods and services are exchanged (transaction cost analysis) and as contracts, which are agreements to conduct specific transactions (agency analysis). One is immediately aware that the unit of analysis is aggregated individuals. Transactions and contracts are aggregated either cross-sectionally or over time. In contrast, OT deals with the properties and characteristics of organizations, not individuals.

Coase (1937) from whom Williamson elaborates his TCE, explains the origin of firms as alternatives to inefficient markets, while organizational theorists observe that people create organizations to generate income and power, to create larger empires with which they are identified, for themselves or groups to which they belong. Mergers to create new organizations often take place to take advantage of new technologies, to take advantage of tax changes, or to reposition the organization in a growing market. These changes may have little to do with rational economic organization or inefficient market functioning.

5. Convergence and Divergence of Economic Theories of the Firm and Organizational Theory

Transaction cost economics (TCE) and agency theory (AT), generally labeled economic organizational theories, have attempted to link RCT and OT and their different units of analysis and methods of theorizing through a set of assumptions that aggregate utility-maximizing individual behavior so that their behavior promotes organizational efficiency (profitability). However, survey research has demonstrated that not everyone has the same (or even individually consistent) utilities. Thus, the aggregation, specifically non-additive aggregation functions, of individual choices and action into organizational actions is not clearcut, because the complexity of the aggregation process often violates RCT assumptions.

Furthermore, the two economic organizational theories, AT and TCE, do not operate under the same premises. AT is based on the utility-maximizing individual of RCT (Jensen 1983, 1993, Jensen and Meckling 1976), while transaction cost economics assumes that humans are boundedly rational at best. AT attempts to explain why organizations are more or less efficient while TCE assumes that organizations are an efficient alternative to inefficient markets (Williamson 1975, 1985, 1996). The utility-maximizing behavior of organizations is efficiency-seeking organizational design. If the unit of analysis is the organization, and the utility being maximized is profit, then efficiency maximization is implied when income seeking is not compromised. Organizational theorists question these assumptions because organizations, even firms, are never constraint free and individuals within organizations do not operate under the same constraints.

Agency theory assumes that individuals are utility maximizers but does not assume that organizations are structured in the way they are because it is the most efficient method of organizing. This is demonstrated, not only in the assumption that managers and workers act as opportunistic agents—that is, not in the interest of the owners—but also by the preoccupations of agency theorists with governance and methods of controlling nonowners to maximize profits (returns to shareholders) to the owners (Jensen and Ruback 1983). Agency theorists and economic organizational theorists in general do not integrate into their analyses historical changes, which provide opportunities and constraints on individual and organizational actions as organizational theorists do. Jensen's presidential address to the American Finance Association demonstrates that he had not until recently discovered Chandler's work (1962, 1977, 1990) and that organizational forms which are most efficient change over time with each historical context in which they develop.

Transaction cost economics assumes that organizations are structured in the way they are because it is the most efficient method of organizing, but TCE does not assume that individuals within organizations are utility maximizers. For example, in Williamson's work, Markets and Hierarchies (1975), he assumes that organizations more efficiently eliminate (by management fiat) opportunistic ('self-interested with guile') individual behavior than market mechanisms. TCE theorists analyze uncertainty and asset specificity of transactions. Individual utility maximization is problematic because of the obvious tendency of rational actors to act opportunistically under conditions of uncertain and asset specificity. TCE, like AT ignores historical changes and processes which constrain and provide opportunities for organizations.

Both contextual and organizational changes are ignored. Organizational change, especially transformational change cannot be explained by economic theories of the firm (see Zey and Swenson 1998, 1999). This is problematic because of the major transformations of firms at the turn into the twenty-first century.

In both Williamson's transactions cost economics (1975) and in Jensen's agency theory (Jensen and Meckling 1976), the idea of self-interest in contractual arrangements between and within organizations is problematic. Ultimately, questions of reconciliation of differential self-interest in the absence of trust, is impossible. Trust, rules of fairness, norms of reciprocity, and conflict, are non-existent and irrelevant in RCT and economic theories of the firm. They are essential to organizational formation and perpetuation.

Neither TCE or AT holds both the basic premise of RCT, self-interested, utility maximizing individuals, and the basic premise of OT, that firms are designed in the most efficient form of organizational design. Agency theory holds the former, while TCE holds the latter. Each finds the others basic premises problematic and grist for the mill of organizational analysis. Thus, economic organizational theory has not yet integrated rational choice theory and organizational theory. This author does not think it is possible to do so because of conflicting premises and different units of analysis.

See also: Bounded and Costly Rationality; Decision and Choice: Economic Psychology; Decision Making: Nonrational Theories; Firm Behavior; Game Theory; Hierarchies and Markets; Institutional Economic Thought; Market Structure and Performance; Rational Choice Theory: Cultural Concerns; Transaction Costs and Property Rights; Utilitarian Social Thought, History of; Utilitarianism: Contemporary Applications; Weber, Max (1864–1920)

Bibliography

- Chandler A D Jr. 1962 Strategy and Structure: Chapters in the History of the Industrial Enterprise. MIT Press, Cambridge, MA
- Chandler A D Jr. 1977 The Visible Hand: The Managerial Revolution in American Business. Belknap Press, Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Chandler A D Jr. 1990 Scale and Scope: The Dynamics of Industrial Capitalism. Belknap Press, Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Coase R 1937 The nature of the firm. Economica 4: 386–405
- Coleman J S 1990 Foundations of Social Theory. Belknap Press, Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Elster J (ed.) 1986 Rational Choice. New York University Press, New York
- Green D P, Shapiro I 1994 Pathologies of Rational Choice Theory: A Critique of Applications in Political Science. Yale University Press, New Haven, CT

- Harsanyi J C 1986 Advances in understanding rational behavior. In: Elster J (ed.) Rational Choice. New York University Press, New York
- Jensen M 1983 Organizational theory and methodology. Accounting Review 55(2): 319–39
- Jensen M 1993 Presidential address: The modern industrial revolution, exit, and the failure of internal control systems. Journal of Finance 48(3): 225–64
- Jensen M, Meckling W 1976 Theory of the firm: Managerial behavior, agency costs, and ownership structure. Journal of Financial Economics 3: 305–60
- Jensen M, Ruback R S 1983 The market for corporate control. Journal of Financial Economics 11: 5–50
- Luce D R, Raiffa H 1957 Games and Decisions: Introduction and Critical Survey. A Study of the Behavioral Models Project Bureau of Applied Social Research, Columbia University. Wiley, New York
- Storm G S 1990 The Logic of Lawmaking: A Spatial Theory Approach. Johns Hopkins University Press, Baltimore, MD
- Weber M [1922] 1968 Economy and Society. Roth G, Wittich C (eds.). Bedminster Press, New York
- Williamson O E 1975 Markets and Hierarchies: Analysis and Antitrust Implications: A study in the Economics of Internal Organization. The Free Press, New York
- Williamson O E 1985 The Economic Institutions of Capitalism: Firms, Market, Relational Contracting. Free Press, New York
- Williamson O E 1996 The Mechanisms of Governance. Oxford University Press, New York
- Zey-Ferrell M 1981 Criticisms of the dominant perspectives in organizations. The Sociological Quarterly 22: 181–205
- Zey M 1993 Banking on Fraud: Drexel, Junk Bonds, and Buyouts. Aldine de Gruyter, Hawthorne, NY
- Zey M 1998 Rational Choice Theory and Organizational Theory: A Critique. Sage, Thousand Oaks, CA
- Zey M 1999 The subsidiarization of the securities industry and the organization of securities fraud networks to return profits in the 1980s. Work and Occupations 26: 50–76
- Zey M, Swenson T 1998 Corporate tax laws, corporate restructuring, and subsidiarization of corporate form, 1981–95. The Sociology Quarterly 39: 555–82
- Zey M, Swenson T 1999 The transformation of the dominant corporate form from multidivisional to multisubsidiary: The role of the 1986 Tax Reform Act. The Sociological Quarterly 40: 241–67

M. Zey

Rational Choice Explanation: Philosophical Aspects

Rational choice explanation is the progeny of the Scottish Enlightenment and neoclassical economics. It is essentially reasoning from economic assumptions of what actors value to reach conclusions about both individual actions and aggregate or collective-level outcomes. It is applied to virtually any significant behavior or social outcome, from political participation, crime, and drug addiction to institutional structures, legislative and interest group politics, law, norms, failures of collective action, and revolution. The most extensively developed parts of such theory are in the theory of elections and voting, the analysis of law under the rubric of law and economics, the study of group behavior, and game theory. Rational choice explanations gain their power from the attempt to reduce particular motivations to some narrower set of motivations, often simply to interests, which can be moderately well defined and measured across a large variety of contexts and actions.

The most common criticism of rational choice explanation is that it is false to the facts of actual motivations of people. This is a by-inspection claim. Because very much of actual behavior surely is motivated by interests, the dispute must actually be whether rational choice explanation is likely to help understand certain activities but not others. This is a question that cannot be answered in the abstract. Sometimes the criticism of rational choice trades on the fact that we commonly resolve many apparent choices by acting from habit or routine. As A. N. Whitehead quipped, civilization advances by the reduction of more and more choices to habit. A similar criticism of utilitarianism is that, if we spend as much time in calculating costs and benefits of our choices as would seem to be necessary to get our choices right, we will have no time left for life. J. S. Mill (1969) responded, rightly, that a sailor need not work out the positions of the stars anew each trip to sea but can simply rely on an astrolabe.

To illustrate the nature and power of rational choice explanation, as well as its plausible limits, I will address the aggregate-level phenomena of collective or group action, majority rule, and democracy. I will then address game theory and the value theory of rational choice. Finally, I will address the application of rational choice explanation to norms and social order.

1. Fallacies of Composition

A common criticism of rational choice explanation is that it cannot handle aggregate-level phenomena because it is fundamentally grounded in individual-level interests, choices, and actions. On the contrary, the chief successes of such theory have been to relate aggregate-level phenomena to individual-level actions. Several of the most important findings have been the—typically negative—demonstration that various aggregate-level claims are fallacies of composition from individual-level actions, choices, or values. It is a fallacy of composition to suppose that a collection of items has itself the characteristics of those items. This can be true, but it must be shown and not merely assumed. Consider three of these demonstrations.

The logic of collective action suggests that, although individuals may share a general interest in supplying themselves some collective benefit, they individually may have no interest in contributing effort or resources to the project. My contribution will buy a small part of our good, of which an even smaller part will go to me, so that my cost of contribution will be larger than my benefit from it. All members of a group may therefore be individually worse off because they failed to take some action (Olson 1965, Hardin 1982). This is a problem that is pervasive in societies, ranging from very small societies with limited resources to very large and complex industrial societies.

The Arrow theorem (Arrow 1963, Barry and Hardin 1982) concludes that a collective utility or welfare function cannot be aggregated from individual utility functions if both are ordinal (see discussion of ordinal utility theory below). In essence, the theorem says that there cannot be a collective preference that has the simple features of an individual preference function. Among the implications of this theorem is that every standard choice procedure is potentially incoherent. Majority rule, for example, can produce cyclic preferences such that candidate A would defeat B by a majority, B would defeat C, and C would defeat A. Hence, simple majority rule is potentially indeterminate. It often works well enough—or seems to work—in practice, however, because there might not be cyclic preferences or because there are devices that block such preferences from being effective and even from being revealed. For example, plurality elections or the use of run-offs between the top two candidates in a multicandidate election can hide any cyclicities because there cannot be cycles over only two candidates.

The economic theory of democracy explains why candidates might not be substantially differentiated in certain common contexts and why voters often have little interest in voting. It also makes sense of the otherwise surprising level of ignorance of typical voters. In this latter case, however, there may be no fallacy of composition, because individual-level ignorance often translates into collective ignorance. Consider the problem of voting, as analyzed by Anthony Downs (1957). The chance that my vote would make a difference in an election decided by a large electorate is very nearly nil. In a 1974 statewide contest for senator in the very small state of New Hampshire, with somewhat more voters than Iceland, the vote was so close that errors in counting made it practicably undecidable who had won. No-one's single vote mattered. Suppose that the trouble to me of voting is such that I would sooner spend several dollars to vote by telephone to avoid going to the polls. The value to me of electing one candidate rather than another would have to be in the many thousands of dollars to offset my costs of voting, because the benefit would have to be discounted by the very low likelihood that my vote would make a difference. Yet many people do vote. Much behavior seems not to fit the rational choice theory and must be explained in other ways.

If it would not be worth my very slight effort to vote, Joseph Schumpeter (1950) concludes, then it would be even less worth the much more substantial effort it would take for me to be well informed about the candidates and issues at stake. Evidence from many national contexts suggests, in fact, that citizens are abysmally ignorant when they vote. Here rational choice explanations seem to fit well. Editorial campaigns against voter ignorance are often misframed as being about the irrationality of citizens, who are acting all too rationally.

2. Game Theory

Rational choice explanations are commonly based in game theory, neoclassical economics, or commonsense arguments such as those of Smith and Hume. Game theory is perhaps the framework that best characterizes the nature of most of the problems in rational choice theory, although many of the most important insights in such theory predate game theory, which originated roughly during World War II (Von Neumann and Morgenstern 1953). Although it is called a theory, game theory is little more than a descriptive framework on which many theories about particular or quite general phenomena are founded. That framework takes many forms, the most transparent of which is the matrix form in which each of the players or participants faces a set of possible strategy choices. Outcomes of a play of a game are jointly determined by the strategy choices of all the players.

This characterization of our individual choices—of strategies, not of outcomes—makes game theory virtually antideontological. Judging action types as right or wrong makes no sense in interactive contexts, which are the principal contexts for most of moral theory. An action theory that takes what are essentially individual choices of outcomes as central is almost irrelevant to choice in social contexts in which, typically, important outcomes necessarily are not under the control of individual deciders (Hardin 1988, pp. 68–70). An ethic of rules makes nonsense of choices of strategies, which are chosen because of their effect on outcomes, as these are influenced by the strategy choices of others. Game theory can readily be fitted to consequentialism and especially utilitarianism. Utilitarianism essentially generalizes the principle of rational choice to choosing the welfare of all instead of only the welfare of the individual chooser.

To fit utilitarianism to game theory is to revamp its central concern with outcomes as valued by their benefits and costs. In interactive social choice, we typically cannot say that a particular action is right or wrong in producing a good overall outcome. We must, rather, judge strategy choices and we must judge them contingently. A strategy choice is right only to the extent that, in interaction with the choices of others, it produces a good overall outcome. If the others with whom I am interacting are sometimes utilitarian, sometimes self-seeking, and sometimes rule-guided in their choices, I may have difficulty determining my best strategy choice for producing a utilitarian outcome. This is not different from the difficulty that self-interested players have in determining the best strategy choices for themselves. Game theory is indeterminate in many contexts, and therefore both pragmatic and utilitarian choices in a real-world setting are apt to be indeterminate as well. Merely seeing the nature of interactive choice in descriptive game theory changes our understanding of the possibilities of rational choice theory and of utilitarianism.

3. Value Theory: Interests, Consumptions, and Welfare

Rational choice accounts are commonly grounded in interests. Sometimes, interests are the whole story of someone's motivations in a particular context. But typically, my interest in having more resources, such as money, is itself grounded in my desire to consume various things. Resources, capabilities, and opportunities matter to us only because they enable us to consume or experience various things, and consuming or experiencing these things is what constitutes our welfare. Resources are worthless otherwise. Focusing only on interests is therefore a shorthand for what the resources can enable us to do. Moreover, we could relate our consumptions to the overall welfare that they bring us. It would be a mistake to suppose interests translate smoothly into welfare or consumptions. Indeed, consumptions typically trade off against each other and against interests. If I invest much of my resources in a holiday, I may not have enough left for other things, such as a new refrigerator. Rational choice explanations involve all three of these categories—interests, consumptions, and welfare.

It would also be a mistake to suppose that my welfare is wholly self-interested. One of the things I might wish to consume or experience might be your happiness. One may say this is against my interests because it means using resources that I could use for my own happiness in some other, perhaps more direct, way. But this is a confusion in at least two ways.

First, the only point in having resources is to be able to consume in order to contribute to one's welfare, as is evident to everyone but a Scrooge for the resource of money. True, there is a conflict between using my resources for one consumption and saving them for another, but this is properly seen not as a conflict between consumptions and interests but as a conflict between different consumptions, or between different paths to welfare.

Second, there is no reason to suppose that, say, enjoying an opera, a good meal, or a lovely journey is a more direct or more successful route to enhancing my welfare with some bit of my resources than providing for my son's or lover's, or friend's happiness with that same bit of resources. More generally, my welfare is enhanced best by a mixture of consumptions and experiences, including contributions to the welfare of others, especially certain others. With those certain others, my welfare will depend on our sharing intentions to do various things for and with each other.

If we could suppose that economic interests as measured in resources were the primary issue for people, we could fairly easily explain actions as though people were all alike except for their circumstances. Rational choice explanations typically reduce the focus to interests, rather than other demands, such as demands for moral positions (ranging from deontological to utilitarian). In part they do so for methodological reasons. Analysis is more productive if we keep it clean and focused, and simplification is required for virtually all social analyses. But in part, the focus on interests is often basically right, especially for aggregate or collective issues. Other concerns matter to collective groups and societies, but they matter the way they do in life more generally. They often do not conflict with interests although, of course, occasionally they do and they may even trump interests in many contexts. For example, voters may vote against their personal interests in support of welfare programs and policies favoring ill-represented ethnic groups. But those who voted against the British Raj in India, French control of Algeria, or the US involvement in Vietnam may generally have voted with their interests as well as with moral concern. Still, many social and individual phenomena cannot readily be explained as the product of interest-seeking by individuals.

4. Value Theory: Cardinal, Ordinal, Ramsey–Neumann Cardinal

Apart from the structure or content of the value theory discussed above, there has been extensive debate over the form of such theory. Jeremy Bentham supposed that pleasures and pains during a day of someone's life could be defined in such a way that we could add the value of pleasures and subtract the value of pains for an overall measure of benefit to the person for that day. Today, we would speak of such a welfare or utility measure as cardinal in the sense that each experience one has could be assigned a utility number that could be added straightforwardly to other utilities.

Bentham's terminology was confused in that he spoke of the utility one gets from consuming some object and also of the utility inherent in the object. The latter notion underlies the labor theory of value that corrupted much of economic thinking throughout the nineteenth century and often still corrupts it today, in part under the doleful influence—on this matter—of Karl Marx. Bentham contributed to two opposing streams of value theory: that of the labor theory of value and that of the subjective theory that holds value to be strictly what a person gets out of an experience or consumption. The value to me of consuming something such as, say, beluga caviar might be far below the value to me of consuming other things that take equal expenditures of my resources. The value to you, even with the same overall level of resources, might be radically higher. Hence, you might consume a lot of beluga caviar and I might consume none after an initial taste. The subjective theory obviously has the disadvantage that we cannot always generalize from one person to others, although often we can generalize enough not to need to do in-depth studies of the tastes and preferences of everyone in order to explain overall behavior.

Bentham supposed further that the utility for one person could be added to that for another. This supposition would allow us to add up the utilities to all under one set of circumstances and to compare the total to that under another set of circumstances. Supposing we could do the measures, we could then say that, for example, one form of government is superior to another.

The so-called ordinal revolution in demand theory in economics overthrew all of the cardinal assumptions and set in their place a utility theory that is entirely subjective and that cannot be given interpersonal comparisons. The remarkable fact for economics is that such a limited theory clears up many prior problems and makes coherent sense of demand and supply relationships and, hence, prices in market exchange. Unfortunately, this revolution came only in the 1930s when moral theorists had ceased also to be economic theorists, as Smith, Hume, Mill, and Henry Sidgwick had been. It has therefore not had as much influence in general social theory as in economics, although it clearly should be brought to bear on the former as much as on the latter. A clear implication of interpersonally noncomparable value theory is that many traditional questions of interaction between people cannot be readily settled, so that moral and social theory must often be open on many issues.

In what might count as a minor sideline, Frank Ramsey (1931) and John von Neumann (Von Neumann and Morgenstern 1953) independently proposed a way to cardinalize preferences that are merely ordinal. Suppose you face a list of mutually exclusive outcomes, and suppose you can rank order any two outcomes. Assign a value of 0 to the least preferred, Z, and a value of 100 to the most preferred, A, outcomes in your list. For some outcome, K, between these two in your ranking, you can rank it against any lottery over A and Z. For example, suppose you would be indifferent to getting K and getting the combination of a p percent chance of getting A and a 100–p percent chance of getting Z ($0 < p < 100$). On the scale of 0 to 100, K has a cardinal value to you of p.

The Ramsey–Von Neumann cardinalization of utility (RN) clearly applies to personal decisions over outcomes. But we cannot use it to construct a Benthamite cardinal utility that is additive across persons, because there is no sense in which your 0 and my 0 are the same or your scale and mine, because each of them is arbitrary. If I assign a value of p and you assign a value of q to outcome K, we cannot meaningfully say that K has a joint value of p + q. Indeed, we can perform a linear transformation on your utility scale without affecting the results that follow from it. For example, we could divide the value of each outcome by 10 and add 37 to it, so that your scale would then run from 37 to 47, and this transformed scale would get all the results that your original scale from 0 to 100 would get. In addition, we can assign utility values to outcomes that fall outside the original ranking from A to Z, so that some outcomes might have negative utility and others might have extremely large positive values. This is suggested by the fact that the original normalization was performed over the arbitrary set of outcomes from A to Z. Hence, there is no meaning to any claim that your RN utility can be added to mine to yield an overall joint utility. The RN theory is therefore primarily of interest in individual decision making under risk, and is seldom of interest for more general social theory. It is irrelevant to Benthamite hopes for a cardinally additive utilitarianism.

5. Norms

There is a growing literature on the rational choice explication of norms. Edna Ullmann-Margalit (1977) gave rational reconstructions of norms for dealing with strategic contexts that are modeled by prisoner's dilemma, coordination, and partiality or unequal coordination games. In this categorization the descriptive apparatus of game theory is used to establish and characterize types of norms according to the strategic problems they resolve. The first of these norms essentially handle collective action problems because, without the force of the norms, many individuals would free ride, and any effort to provide a collective good would fail. The second handle such coordinations as the driving convention. That convention surely requires no norm to keep drivers in compliance with it, because the threat of grievous harm from violating the convention is sufficient. But many conventions are less regulated by such clear incentives and some of these might be more forceful if backed by norms. Norms in Ullmann-Margalit's third category handle unequal coordinations such as the division of labor by gender roles or social order in any hierarchical society in which obedience to norms might keep even those at the bottom of the hierarchy loyal and orderly. Again, these conventions are grounded in coordination incentives and they might be fully self-enforcing, but norms that moralize the inequalities might make those in the less well off positions less sullen in acquiescing in the arrangements.

More generally we may say that there are two broad categories of norms: norms of exclusion and universa-listic norms (Hardin 1995, Chaps. 4 and 5). Norms of exclusion are specific to particular groups, which can enforce the norms by sanctioning violators within the group; the sanctions can go so far as to shun and even exclude members. The sanctioning is grounded in the interests of individual sanctioners, so that the norms are commonly interest based, although group members might claim they are inherently moral or right. A norm of exclusion can work to help enforce cooperativeness in a group or community, or to enforce a coordination that might serve the interests of some but not all. For example, a minority culture might enforce upon its members the use of a minority language or a particular dress code. Using that language or following that dress code might reduce the possibilities for some members of the community to gain employment outside the community. The community might protect its hegemony over deviant members by shunning those who violate the language or dress code.

Universalistic norms can be dyadic, as in promising or truth telling, or large-number in the sense of applying to actions toward the whole society, as in not littering. Dyadic norms are commonly enforced through the sanctions inherent in the iterated prisoner's dilemma. If you lie to me or break your promise to me, I can simply avoid further interaction with you, to your likely cost. If you break a norm that affects everyone, such as a norm against littering or in favor of voting, no particular individual is likely to have an interest in sanctioning you. Hence, such norms are likely to be relatively weak in their force and in our adherence to them. Oddly, therefore, it is the often odious norms of exclusion, such as racist and ethnic norms, that have strongest force, while universalistic norms are relatively weak unless they are played out essentially in dyadic interactions. Those who insist that, morally, norms should commonly trump interests, should be bothered that it is interests that trump any plausible moral content of many norms, and that norms not backed by interests are likely to be weak. Large-number universalistic norms may be backed primarily by moral or psychologically inculcated commitments. If so, then it is of interest whether they are, in fact, very effective in motivating people.

6. Social Order

There are three grand schools of social theory. One, associated with the French sociologist Émile Durkheim and many others, holds that society is held together by shared values. The second, associated with Karl Marx and Plato's Thrasymachus, holds that conflict is pervasive and that social order must therefore be maintained through the imposition of power to coerce when necessary. The third, associated with Adam Smith, holds that society is organized by and for exchange, which involves a combination of coordination and conflict. Each of these schools has many strong contemporary advocates. A fourth plausible view is that much of social life is simply organized by coordination (Hardin 1999, Chap. 1). We need not share particular values in order to share interests in avoiding conflicts with each other. The ideal type of this last form of social order is coordination on traffic rules, especially on the rule to drive right (or to drive left). We can be hostile to each other in many ways and still find it sensible to avoid needless conflict over many things, so that we would willingly be coordinated. A shared value theory is also a coordination theory, but its advocates ground it in value commitments and are generally hostile to the inclusion of interests among those value commitments. The conflict and exchange schools are commonly grounded in interests, although the socially destructive conflict that sparked much of early liberal thought was over commitment to divergent religious views.

The pre-eminent coordination theorists among classical political philosophers were Thomas Hobbes and David Hume. They were both protogame theorists in their grasp of the fundamental nature of various social interactions. While Hobbes is commonly thought to be a major conflict theorist, his actual resolution of the problem of social order is to arrange for coordination on an all-powerful sovereign, whose task is essentially to coordinate us on order so that we may construct our own separate lives and engage with one another in productive pursuits (Hobbes 1968). Hume's (1978, Book 3) articulation of a remarkable array of coordination problems qualifies him to be seen as the greatest coordination theorist, although his complex insights were largely neglected for two centuries, in part because he lacked the technical vocabulary of game theory and did not himself bother to work out the general principles of it. He did, however, work out a general moral and political theory that was substantially grounded in strategic understanding (Hardin 1988, Chap. 2).

In complex modern societies, coordination may be the central, dominant mode of social order. It does not require consensus on values—pluralists can coordinate on an order for the society in which they seek their diverse values. It does perhaps fit especially well with modern individualist liberalism that allows individuals to live by their own lights. Indeed, coordination is a simple version of Mill's principle that we should be free to pursue our own ends without interference so long as our doing so does not interfere with others (Mill 1977). When there is such interference, of course, other principles may be required to regulate our interactions.

7. Concluding Remarks

Rational choice theory is a diverse set of approaches to the study of society that are based in assumptions of individual rationality. Indeterminacies in such theory often mirror indeterminacies in social relations and individual understandings of these. Indeed, many rational choice explanations have demonstrated the indeterminacy of social choice. Among the most important contributions of such theorizing is the descriptive clarity it often adds to our understanding of issues that have been poorly characterized before. Rational choice explanation is inherently about states of affairs, although it can include in a state of affairs concerns for anything that motivates people. It is therefore easy to see how it fits with utilitarianism.

Rational choice value theories, when introduced into the study of law, have led to the burgeoning movement of law and economics, which has produced the most systematic analysis of the broad sweep of law and legal rules that legal scholarship and practice have hitherto seen. The quick march of that movement—roughly beginning with the Coase theorem (Coase 1988)—through virtually all areas of law has provoked counterattacks, but none of these is itself grounded in a value theory systematic enough to permit more than piecemeal objections. The Coase theorem says, with audacious generality and simplicity, that if there are no transaction costs to impede economic cooperation between owners of various resources, then ownership will not affect production, although it presumably will affect how the profits from the production are divided. That theorem, along with earlier work of Ronald Coase and many others, has led to the massive study of transaction costs.

We have a rich understanding of the problems of rational choice value theories just because those theories have been a major focus in the development and articulation of the entire discipline of economics. The theories are a product of centuries of determined and often brilliant debate with dozens of major contributions. Alternative value theories have had far too few advocates and critics to yield much understanding at all. Indeed, value claims commonly seem to be ad hoc and not systematically generalizable. Such considerations are no argument for the superiority or rightness of any value theory. But they may be a tonic for those who wonder how the only well-articulated class of value theories is so easy to criticize: It has enough content to be subject to extensive and varied criticism.

See also: Decision Theory: Bayesian; Economics and Ethics; Economics, Philosophy of; Game Theory: Noncooperative Games; Intentionality and Rationality: A Continental-European Perspective; Intentionality and Rationality: An Analytic Perspective; Irrationality: Philosophical Aspects; Practical Reasoning: Philosophical Aspects; Prisoner's Dilemma, One-shot and Iterated

Bibliography

Arrow K J 1963 Social Choice and Individual Values, 2nd edn. Wiley, New York

- Barry B, Hardin R (eds.) 1982 Rational Man and Irrational Society? Sage, Beverly Hills, CA
- Coase R H 1988 The problem of social cost. In: Coase R H The Firm, the Market and the Law. University of Chicago Press, Chicago, pp. 95–156
- Downs A 1957 An Economic Theory of Democracy. Harper, New York
- Hardin R 1982 Collective Action. Johns Hopkins University Press, Baltimore, MD
- Hardin R 1988 Morality within the Limits of Reason. University of Chicago Press, Chicago
- Hardin R 1995 One for All: The Logic of Group Conflict. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Hardin R 1999 Liberalism, Constitutionalism, and Democracy. Oxford University Press, Oxford, UK
- Hobbes T 1968 Leviathan. Penguin, London
- Hume D 1978 A Treatise of Human Nature, 2nd edn. Oxford University Press, Oxford, UK
- Mill J S 1977 On Liberty. In: Robson J M (ed.) Collected Works of John Stuart Mill. University of Toronto Press, Toronto, Vol. 18, pp. 213–310
- Mill J S 1969 Utilitarianism. In: Robson J M (ed.) Collected Works of John Stuart Mill. University of Toronto Press, Toronto, Vol. 10, pp. 203–59
- Olson M Jr 1965 The Logic of Collective Action. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Ramsey F P 1931 Truth and probability. In: Braithwaite R B (ed.) The Foundations of Mathematics and Other Logical Essays by F. P. Ramsey. Harcourt Brace, New York
- Schumpeter J A 1950 Capitalism, Socialism and Democracy, 3rd edn. Harper, New York
- Ullmann-Margalit E 1977 The Emergence of Norms. Clarendon, Oxford, UK
- Von Neumann J, Morgenstern O 1953 Theory of Games and Economic Behavior, 3rd edn. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ

R. Hardin

Rational Choice in Politics

‘Rational choice’ (henceforth RC) is one of the principal approaches to political science as practiced in the USA. The approach has generated important insights relevant to a wide range of political phenomena, but it has also generated controversy as it moved into each of the various subfields. Much of the controversy arises from misunderstandings, as well as a failure to appreciate that RC is not a monolithic enterprise.

1. The Rational Choice Approach

The central premise uniting the various schools of RC is that behavior is purposive. Political behavior is not the product of psychological drives, childhood socialization, organizational norms, or other a-rational influences stressed by the various schools of behaviorists. Such influences certainly shape individual preferences, but rational choice further posits that individuals pursue their goals as rationally as their knowledge, their resources, and the context permit. For example, much congressional scholarship of the 1950s and 1960s treated members of Congress as acting primarily in response to role expectations and norms established and enforced by other members. Rational choice scholars in the 1970s suggested that a more fundamental starting point would be the presumption that, first and foremost, members of Congress wanted to be re-elected—and acted accordingly. That premise would not describe all members all the time of course, but it would fit more members more of the time than any other assumption, and thus was the most appropriate starting point.

1.1 Origins of RC

Although RC shares with economics the maintained hypothesis of purposive behavior, RC is not a direct import from economics, as implied by critics who level charges of ‘economic imperialism.’ Some schools of RC owe much to economics, but others have independent roots. Many of the modeling tools first utilized in RC research were borrowed from operations research and other branches of applied mathematics. In particular, political scientists saw potential in game theory earlier than did economists, who continued to use mechanistic maximizing models for some years after RC practitioners in political science had gravitated toward strategic models. The non-cooperative game theoretical revolution brought the two groups closer together, but present convergence should not mask the eclectic origins of the approach. Consider that the membership of the Committee on Nonmarket Decision Making (the forerunner of the Public Choice Society) included William Riker, William Mitchell, and Vincent Ostrom (political science), Kenneth Arrow, James Buchanan, and John Harsanyi, (economics), Herbert Simon (then public administration), Gordon Tullock (law), John Rawls (philosophy), and James Coleman (sociology).

1.2 Schools of RC

There are at least four recognizable schools of RC, although as the approach has spread into the mainstream of political science the distinctions have eroded. The most influential school within political science is the Rochester school, founded by Riker. A product of one of the country’s most traditional political science programs (Harvard); Riker had both dissatisfaction with the state of political science in the middle of the twentieth century and a clear vision of the direction in which it should go. His program at the University of Rochester began producing graduates in the late 1960s and within a decade they had established thriving groups at Carnegie-Mellon, Washington University, and Caltech. Within another decade Rochester graduates and their students had accepted positions at the country’s top political science departments.

In contrast, the Virginia School is based on economics. Led by Buchanan and Tullock this school is most closely identified with the Public Choice Society in particular, and the term ‘public choice’ in general. From the beginning the Virginians emphasized empirical work and especially policy relevant work. Virginians tend to be less abstract in their methods and more focused on outcomes than their Rochester counterparts. And more than Rochester the Virginia School is associated with distinct normative point-of-view, advocating markets as a better means of allocating resources than governments.

The Chicago School is associated most closely with George Stigler and Gary Becker. Reflecting their roots in economics, Chicagoans generally assume that actors’ goals are egoistic and material. This view of humans as selfish wealth maximizers strikes many political scientists as too narrow and has colored non-rational choice political scientists’ views of the larger RC enterprise. In addition, the Chicago School discounts the importance of institutions, believing that rational actors easily find ways to get around institutional constraints. Virginians and Rochesterians, in contrast, take institutions seriously. Virginians focus heavily on constitutional choice and Rochesterians are at the forefront of the ‘new institutionalism.’ Thus Americanists and comparativists working in rich institutional contexts have found Chicago’s emphasis on freewheeling interest groups less useful than international relations scholars who study an anarchic arena populated by weak institutions.

Finally, the Indiana School is smaller and more specialized. Founded by Vincent and Elinor Ostrom, the Indiana School takes as its special focus collective action problems in their various manifestations. Like Rochesterians, Indianans are more of a homegrown school of thought that attaches considerable importance to institutions. They are also more comparative in their orientation, tracking the operation of general principles across space and time.

2. Evolution of the RC Approach in Political Science

The RC approach first became widespread in the subfield of American politics. Probably this reflects the interests of several of its founders in democratic politics, as well as the fact that the American subfield was the most methodologically advanced and thus the most receptive to the sophisticated modeling tools that RC practitioners brought to the table. The main source of criticism within the subfield was theoretically and conceptually based. In the 1960s the subfield was dominated by behaviorists, who had tried to construct a scientific political science by borrowing concepts and theories from sociology and psychology. From their studies of presidential elections, for example, behaviorists had concluded that the most important determinant of vote choice was party identification, then viewed as largely apolitical—a product of childhood socialization. The RC emphasis on rational, goal-oriented behavior seemed highly inconsistent with much of the behavioral literature.

The disruptions of the late 1960s undercut that judgment. As demonstrations raged outside, as an insurgent third candidate—George Wallace—contended for the Presidency, and as long-time Democratic identifiers defected from their party, it became increasingly untenable to assert that people voted on the basis of immutable, apolitical party identifications. RC scholars joined others in refocusing attention on the importance of issues and government performance and re-examined party identification, finding a political component within it.

By the 1980s RC had moved into the subfield of international relations. This was a natural development for the portion of the subfield focused on international economic relations, but natural as well for the international security side of the subfield, for whom coalitions, strategy, rational deterrence, and similar concepts had long been part of their stock in trade. Indeed, much of the early work on game theory and other operations research methods was done at the Rand Corporation with funding from the Department of Defense.

Most recently, RC has been moving into the subfield of comparative politics where its reception has perhaps been more controversial than in the other subfields. Some possible reasons for this contentious debate are offered.

2.1 Criticisms of RC

A common criticism of RC is that it is a hegemonic research program, not content to coexist with other programs but intent on replacing them. There is some truth to this charge, but it does not apply uniquely to RC—traditionalists leveled the same charge at behaviorists. Emphasizing the volitional element of politics does not require that the non-rational and emotional be ignored. But applying an approach to every possible research question helps scholars to determine its limits.

For example, it seems clear that RC is most directly applicable to the behavior of the elite, whose individual decisions make a difference, than to the behavior of the masses, whose individual decisions are submerged in those of millions of others. Attempts to behave rationally are most likely where the stakes are relatively high and the number of players relatively low—making a careful decision is not worth the effort if the consequences are trivial or your decision makes no difference to the outcome, or both. Thus, RC fails to provide a compelling explanation of why millions of ordinary citizens vote in a presidential elections, but that does not imply that the two presidential candidates do not make every effort to behave rationally!

Others quarrel with the RC approach because it is assertively social scientific. Formalization and generalization are social science ideals, and RC is closely associated with both, although nothing requires that all RC research be expressed in terms of mathematical symbols. Understandably, those who prize detailed narratives of particular cases feel uncomfortable with RC, as do those who believe that a country's unique history or culture determines the operation of its institutions and political processes. In both cases the critics' quarrel is as much with social science as with RC.

Of course, even some card-carrying social scientists have qualms about the RC approach. Not everyone views human behavior as purposive. Moreover, RC is more self-consciously theoretical than other approaches. Practitioners engage in model-building, making simplifying assumptions and drawing logical consequences using the classic deductive method. Scholars whose research commitments are inductive and empirical sometimes feel that RC models omit much of the rich detail they have painstakingly compiled.

Finally, some part of the criticism of RC is undoubtedly ideological. Scholars have political commitments, and it is natural, although regrettable, that these commitments sometimes influence their work. As noted, rational choice is associated with a free-market viewpoint. There is nothing inherent in RC that logically requires such a point-of-view. Indeed, there are rational choice scholars who are Democrats, Liberal Democrats even! But the perception exists, and scholars who position themselves more on the social democratic side of the spectrum may criticize the approach because of its perceived ideological associations.

The acrimonious nature of the debates that have accompanied the movement of RC into comparative politics probably reflects the fact that many comparative politics scholars are on the same side of several, if not all, of the preceding divisions. Some comparativists believe in thick description, not parsimonious formal models, and many of these same scholars believe that unique cultural and historical conditions are the key elements of political systems, not timeless underlying principles common to all systems. Some comparativists emphasize the non-rational nature of cultural and historical practices, not rational calculations about means to ends. And finally, some comparativists, especially those who specialize in the developing areas, are personally farther to the left on the political spectrum than Americanists steeped in the liberal tradition and international relations scholars comfortable with discussions of realism and the national interest.

2.2 The Evolution of RC

In the years to come the controversies surrounding the RC enterprise are likely to diminish. The principal reason is the convergence generated by attempts to explain real world behavior. As noted, RC forced Americanists to reconsider the attempt to explain politics primarily in sociological or psychological terms. But just as clearly, the attempt to explain mass behavior such as political participation indicates that recourse to sociology and psychology will be necessary. Similarly, RC researchers recognize that there are phenomena underlying labels such as 'cultures' and 'norms,' and provocative current research seeks to explain such phenomena as 'equilibria' or 'focal points' of human interaction that evolve over time through processes of trial and error, learning, selection, or what-not, and persist if their consequences continue to benefit the community. Trends suggest movement toward a richer RC approach, but also toward political sociology and political psychology with a firmer grounding in first principles of human behavior.

See also: Rational Choice and Organization Theory; Rational Choice Explanation: Philosophical Aspects; Rational Choice Theory: Cultural Concerns; Rational Choice Theory in Sociology

Bibliography

- Amadae S M, Bueno de Mesquita B 1999 The Rochester school: The origins of positive political theory. Annual Review of Political Science 2: 269–95
- Fiorina M P 1995 Rational choice, empirical contributions, and the scientific enterprise. Critical Review 9: 85–94
- Hardin R 1987 Rational choice theories. In: Ball T (eds.) Idioms of Inquiry. State University of New York Press, Albany, NY, pp. 67–91.
- Mitchell W C 1988 Virginia, Rochester, and Bloomington: Twenty-five years of public choice and political science. Public Choice 56: 101–19
- Mueller D C 1997 Perspectives on Public Choice: A Handbook. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Stigler G (ed.) 1988 Chicago Studies in Political Economy. University of Chicago Press, Chicago

M. P. Fiorina

Rational Choice Theory: Cultural Concerns

The notions of rationality, rational choice, and rational beliefs have a central place in many of the social sciences. Although originally deployed mainly in economics, they are increasingly being incorporated into sociology and political science. (They have not gained the same importance in social anthropology.) Some scholars argue that by virtue of its simplicity, universality and explanatory power the theory of rational choice is, or should be, the unifying framework for all the social sciences. As an explanatory theory it harbors formal and empirical problems that suggest a need for alternative approaches. At the same time, whatever its explanatory flaws, the notion of rationality retains a normative privilege, because we want to be rational (Føllesdal 1982). Rational choice theory is primarily prescriptive: it tells agents what to do to achieve their ends as well as possible. Social scientists may then try to explain their behavior by assuming that they do what the theory tells them to do.

1. The Development of Rational Choice Theory

The modern notion of rationality did not emerge until this century. Earlier references to rationality were to ratio, or 'reason,' understood as the faculty of calm and deliberative choice, as opposed to emotion. In the words of David Hume (1960, p. 415), 'Reason is, and ought only to be, the slave of the passions.' Some writers opposed reason both to interest and emotion: 'Nothing is easier for passion than to overcome reason; its greatest triumph is to conquer interest' (De La Bruyère 1990, IV.77). In this tradition, reason implies not only a dispassionate but also a disinterested and impartial attitude.

1.1 The Economic Meaning of Rationality

The modern concept of rationality as, essentially, means–end efficiency owes much to the marginalist revolution in economics in the last third of the nineteenth century. By conceptualizing the consumer's choice and the producer's choice as involving trade-offs among different consumption goods or different factors of production, the marginalists made it possible to think more systematically about the optimal choice of means for a given end. A profit-maximizing employer, for instance, would react to a wage increase by using more nonlabor inputs and less labor.

1.2 Max Weber

In Economy and Society, Weber (1968, p. 24) offered an influential definition of instrumentally rational (zweckrational) action: it is 'determined by expectations as to the behavior of objects in the environment and of other human beings; these expectations are used as "conditions" or "means" for the attainment of the actor's own rationally pursued and calculated ends.' Although Weber's professed aim was to offer a purely subjective notion of rationality as coherence among action, ends, and beliefs, some of his analyses point to a more objective definition in terms of successful adaptation to the environment (Elster 2000). The closing pages of the Protestant Ethic (Weber 1958) suggest that he was influenced by the fact that market competition generates objectively successful behavior by eliminating those who fail.

1.3 The Emergence of Game Theory

Weber (1968) writes that 'in attempting to explain the campaign of 1866, it is indispensable in the case of [the two main generals] to attempt to construct imaginatively how each, given fully adequate knowledge both of his own situation and of that of his opponent, would have acted.' Weber does not seem to be aware of the need to 'construct imaginatively' how each general would try to 'construct imaginatively' what the other would be doing, including their further constructive imaginings, and so on. The modern theory of interdependent decisions, or (in somewhat misleading language) 'game theory,' emerged only after Weber's death. Neumann and Morgenstern (1944) and Nash (1950) showed how one can avoid the infinite regress lurking in the phrase 'and so on' by the notion of 'equilibrium', defined as a set of individual choices each of which is optimal, given the others.

1.4 The Emergence of Decision Theory

In much of rational choice theory, the intuitive notions of desire and belief are replaced by those of preference (or utility) and subjective probability. In a pioneering work, Ramsey (1931) showed how one can elicit utilities and subjective probabilities by asking subjects to respond to various hypothetical bets. Later, Savage (1954) offered an alternative demonstration. The key conclusion of these and later works in the same tradition is that rational actors maximize expected utility. The agent is assumed to face a well-defined set of feasible courses of action, each of which can with definite probabilities result in various outcomes, each of which has a definite utility for the agent. A rational agent will then choose the action that maximizes the average (or expected) utility of the outcomes associated with it.

2. The Structure of Rational Choice

In defining rationality, one can emphasize rational choice or rational action. In the latter approach, one can define rational action as action that results from rational choice or more objectively as success or adaptation to the environment. Even if social agents do not make rational choices, they may be constrained by their environment to act rationally. As noted above, this outcome may be produced by competition. In a population of firms, we may observe profit-maximizing behavior even if none of the decision-makers have profit-maximizing intentions, simply because firms that do not maximize profit are eliminated (Alchian 1950). As noted by Nelson and Winter (1982), the argument assumes that the environment is sufficiently stable for the process of elimination to have time to do its work. With a rapidly changing environment, the selection process is tracking a moving target and may not bring about optimal behavior.

Figure 1
Rational action

2.1 A Basic Model

A widely used model of rational choice (and rational action) is captured in Fig. 1. In this diagram, the arrows represent three optimality relations. To be rational, an action has to be the best means to realize the agent's desire, given his or her beliefs. The beliefs must be well-grounded in the evidence available to the agent. The information must reflect an optimal investment in the acquisition of new information. (Because investing in information-gathering is an action, we may think of it as a shadow action that accompanies the primary action.) A rational choice is the choice of a rational action because it is the rational thing to do, excluding cases in which the agent makes the rational choice by fluke.

2.2 The Model is Subjective Through and Through

A choice and the subsequent action are rational only by virtue of the optimality relations among elements of the agent's mental set. A rational action may fail, if the agent has false (but well-grounded) beliefs. The relation between beliefs and evidence must not be confused with the relation between beliefs and the world. In inferring beliefs from the evidence a rational agent would use the procedures which in the long run yield the largest number of true beliefs, weighed by their subjective importance to the agent. Yet on any given occasion this procedure may lead to the formation of a false belief.

In the model, the desire is the 'unmoved mover.' The agent's desires allow us to assess the optimality of actions, beliefs, and information-gathering, but they are not themselves subject to rationality or optimality assessments. In some cases, this may seem counterintuitive. In the case of the agent's time preferences (a subset of the desires), we might want to say that an agent who discounts the future very heavily is irrational. The life of somebody who pays very little attention to the future consequences of present behavior is likely to be nasty, brutish, and short. Yet for the purposes of explaining the agent's behavior, this fact is irrelevant. Similarly, it may be tempting to say that a belief which (to us) is obviously false is irrational. Yet if it is part of the belief that the costs of testing it are very high, the agent may be caught in a belief trap (Mackie 1996) in which it is rational to hold on to the false belief. In applying rational choice theory, one has to adopt the point of view of the agent and recognize that the eye cannot see beyond its horizon.

2.3 Belief-Desire Interactions

As shown in Fig. 1 the model explicitly excludes a direct influence of desires on beliefs, as in wishful thinking. The converse possibility is that desires might be shaped by the beliefs, as when the belief that something is inaccessible stifles the desire for it ('sour grapes') or enhances it ('the grass is greener'). The general principle that desires cannot be assessed as more or less rational precludes us from qualifying desires shaped in these ways as irrational, however undesirable they might be on other grounds.

Rationality is, however, compatible with an indirect influence of desires on beliefs. As indicated in Fig. 1, the optimal amount of investment in evidence-gathering is shaped not only by beliefs (about the expected costs and benefits of gathering information), but also by desires. As beliefs are rationally shaped by evidence, it follows that beliefs may be rationally sensitive to desires. Consider two doctors who have to diagnose two identical patients with severe injuries. One is a GP who wants to save the patient's life and who knows that spending too much time on the correct diagnosis might undermine that goal. The other is a Nazi doctor in a concentration camp, who is unconcerned about the patient's survival and thus of the opportunity costs of information-gathering. Because of the different desires, the latter is more likely to form a correct belief.

2.4 Some Common Misunderstandings

Rational choice theory is often criticized, sometimes with good arguments, and sometimes with bad. Although some of the bad arguments may apply to bad versions of the theory, critics ought to address the best versions. The most common misunderstanding is that the theory assumes agents to have selfish motivations. Rationality is consistent with selfishness, but also with altruism, as when someone is trying to select the charity where a donation can do the most good.

Rational choice theory is also sometimes confused with the principle of methodological individualism.

True, the theory presupposes that principle. Talk about beliefs and desires of supra-individual entities, such as a class or a nation, is in general meaningless. The converse does not hold, however. Some of the alternatives to rational choice theory also presuppose methodological individualism.

Furthermore, it is sometimes asserted that the theory is atomistic and that it ignores social interactions. Almost the exact opposite is true. Game theory is superbly equipped to handle three important interdependencies: (a) the welfare of each depends on the decisions of all; (b) the welfare of each depends on the welfare of all; and (c) the decision of each depends on the decisions of all. It is also sometimes asserted that the theory assumes human beings to be like powerful computers, which can instantly work out the most complex ramifications of all conceivable options. In principle, rational choice theory can incorporate cognitive constraints on a par with physical or financial constraints. In practice, the critics often have a valid point.

Finally, it is sometimes asserted that the theory is culturally biased, reflecting (and perhaps describing) modern, Western societies or their subcultures. However, the minimal model set out above is transhistorically and transculturally valid. This statement does not imply that people always and everywhere act rationally, nor that they have the same desires and beliefs. It means that the normative ideal of rationality embodied in the model is one that is explicitly or implicitly shared by all human beings. People are instrumentally rational because they adopt the principle of least effort. 'Do not cross the river to fetch water,' says a Norwegian proverb. Also, as people know that acting on false beliefs undermines the pursuit of their ends, they want to use cognitive procedures that reduce the risk of getting it wrong when getting it right matters. That they often fail to adopt the right procedures does not undermine the normative ideal.

3. Some Problems

As an explanatory approach, rational choice theory faces two objections. The first is formal: under certain circumstances the notions of rationality or optimality are not uniquely defined or not defined at all. This is the problem of indeterminacy. The other is empirical: sometimes the social agents do not behave as the theory predicts they will. This is the problem of irrationality.

3.1 Indeterminacy

The problems of non-unicity or non-existence of an optimal solution arises at each of the three levels in Fig. 1

At the level of action, indeterminacy can arise if the agent's preference ordering is incomplete, i.e., for a pair of options a and b, the agent neither prefers a to b, nor b to a, nor is indifferent between them. This case can arise if the options are very different from each other and from what the agent has experienced in the past, as in choosing a career or a spouse.

At the level of beliefs, indeterminacy—meaning that the agent has no reliable grounds for assigning probabilities to the possible outcomes—can take the form either of raw uncertainty or of strategic uncertainty. The former is illustrated by natural disasters or by the process of technical innovation. The latter is illustrated by games in which there are several equilibria none of which can be unambiguously singled out as ‘superior’ or ‘natural’ (in the sense of Schelling 1960). An example involving both forms of uncertainty involves investment by firms in research and development (Dasgupta and Stiglitz 1980).

At the level of information-gathering, indeterminacy arises through an infinite regress. To decide how much information to gather, one must first form beliefs about the expected costs and benefits of information. The formation of these beliefs also requires the acquisition of information, and so on (Winter 1964). Although the regress can be avoided in repeated and stereotyped situations such as many medical diagnoses, it is unavoidable when, as in warfare, there is both an urgent need to act and no precedent to rely on.

3.2 Irrationality

In this case, too, irrationality arises at all three levels. The problems are of two kinds. ‘Cold’ problems are caused by cognitive malfunctioning without any motivational bias. ‘Hot’ problems arise through such bias.

At the level of action, cold problems arise in many ways. Choices are sensitive to how questions are framed—whether the glass is described as half empty or as half full (Tversky and Kahneman 1981). Many people are prone to the ‘sunk cost fallacy,’ i.e., to pursue a project simply because they have already invested much in it (Arkes and Blumer 1985). Hot problems can arise when people act under the influence of emotion, e.g., by wanting to take action immediately instead of taking time to maximize the chance of success. Under the influence of addictive cravings one may fail to carry out a decision to quit. (See Elster 1999 for both issues.)

At the level of belief formation, cold problems can arise because people fail to understand the nature of statistical inference. During World War II Londoners were persuaded that the Germans systematically concentrated their bombing in certain parts of their city, because the bombs fell in clusters. This invalid inference reflected a lack of understanding of the statistical principle that random processes usually generate clustering (Feller 1968, p. 161). Flight instructors who noticed that praise for an unusually smooth landing is typically followed by a poorer landing on the next try while criticism after a rough landing is followed by an improved performance, concluded that rewards are less effective than punishments. This invalid inference reflected a lack of understanding of the statistical principle of regression to the mean (Tversky and Kahneman 1974). Hot problems arise when ‘the wish is father to the thought,’ as in self-deception and wishful thinking. Coffee drinkers are less inclined to believe evidence of negative effects of caffeine (Kunda 1987). Those who work in risky occupations tend to believe the risks are less than they actually are (Akerlof and Dickens 1982).

Less is known about cold errors in information gathering. One might conjecture that people may invest too much in information because they underestimate opportunity costs compared to out-of-pocket expenses (Thaler 1980). A common hot mistake also involves overinvestment, when people have a strong desire to have sufficient reasons for their decisions even when cost–benefit analysis suggests that flipping a coin might be superior (Elster 1989a). Motivational biases can also, however, lead to underinvestment: ‘Marry in haste, repent at leisure.’

4. Alternatives

Problems such as those discussed above have stimulated the search for alternative theories. Some theories address the issue of indeterminacy as well as ‘cold’ deviations from rationality, others the ‘hot’ deviations.

4.1 Bounded Rationality and Behavioral Economics

Some alternatives try to identify the cognitive mechanisms that produce deviations from what rational choice theory predicts.

The research program on ‘bounded rationality’ stems from Herbert Simon (1954). Nelson and Winter (1982) is an outstanding application. The core assumption is that agents ‘satisfice,’ by choosing an option that is ‘good enough,’ rather than maximize. Agents do not look for better alternatives if the status quo is satisfactory. If it falls below the agent’s aspiration level, a search for new options is triggered until a new, satisfactory outcome is found. The theory has a good match to common sense (‘Never change a winning team’) and captures the heavy dependence of many choices on search procedures. By eschewing the maximizing assumption, it avoids problems of indeterminacy.

The research program on ‘behavioral economics’ or ‘quasi-rational economics’ (Thaler 1991) stems from the work of Kahneman and Tversky (Kahneman et al. 1982, Kahneman and Tversky 2000). In addition to identifying many of the ‘cold’ anomalies discussed above, these authors tried to account for them by means of 'prospect theory.' It deviates from rational choice theory by assuming that agents evaluate gains and losses by how much they deviate from a reference point rather than in absolute terms, and that they are more risk-averse for losses than for gains. These two assumptions explain, for instance, that people who refuse to use credit cards when they are said to carry a surcharge accept them when the charge is redescribed as a cash discount.

4.2 Emotions and Social Norms

Other theories try to identify the motivational mechanisms that generate anomalies.

Frijda (1986, pp. 118–21) argues that emotions cause deviations from rationality in many ways: (a) they affect 'probability and credibility estimates' concerning events outside one's control; (b) they 'cause some measure of belief in the efficacy of actions one would not believe in under other conditions'; (c) they induce fantasy behavior, as when a widow for many years after the death of her husband sets the table for two each day; (d) they induce various forms of 'painful fantasies that, however painful, are yet sought by the subject himself.'—Othello's jealousy is cited as an example; and (e) they cause irrational behavior, such as 'anger at some deed that cannot be undone by the angry aggression, nor its recurrence prevented.' In addition, as mentioned earlier, they induce suboptimal investment in information. Loewenstein (1996) generalizes these ideas, by appealing to a broad range of 'visceral factors' that interfere with rational choice and rational cognition. In addition to emotion, these include hunger, thirst, pain, and the euphoria or dysphoria created by addictive drugs or abstinence from them.

Rational choice theory is consequentialist, in that it enjoins people to act in certain ways because of the expected outcomes. Social norms typically prescribe acts for their own sake, not for their consequences. In their simplest form, they take the form of unconditional imperatives: 'always wear black at funerals.' They may be contrasted with conditional, outcome-oriented imperatives: 'always wear black in strong sunshine' (as do people in Mediterranean countries to maintain circulation of air between the clothes and the body). Social norms regulate the use of money, how hard people work at their jobs, the occasions for and modalities of revenge, sexual behavior, and many other matters (Elster 1989b). They are sustained largely by the emotions of contempt and shame.

5. Conclusion

Many rational choice theorists will respond either that some of the alleged problems are empirically insignificant or that the alternative explanations can be restated within the rational choice framework. These are ongoing debates with many unresolved questions. Overall, however, it is increasingly hard to deny that rational choice theory has serious limitations. Empirical research increasingly shows that human beings are severely limited in their cognitive functioning, and, when under the influence of emotion and other strong feelings, liable to act in ways that undermine their ends. Paraphrasing Veyne (1976, p. 676), beliefs born of passion serve passion badly. At the same time, there is no single rival or contender that could replace rational choice theory. For one thing, most people are rational much of the time. For another, the various alternatives to the theory have not been integrated with one another, and are unlikely to be so. There is no other theory that explains as much of human behavior, although the jury is still out on how much it explains.

See also: Bounded and Costly Rationality; Bounded Rationality; Intentionality and Rationality: A Continental-European Perspective; Rational Choice and Organization Theory; Rational Choice Explanation: Philosophical Aspects; Rational Choice Theory in Sociology; Rational Theory of Cognition in Psychology; Rationality and Feminist Thought; Rationality in Society

Bibliography

- Akerlof G A, Dickens W T 1982 The economic consequences of cognitive dissonance. American Economic Review 72: 307–19
- Alchian H 1950 Uncertainty, evolution, and economic theory. Journal of Political Economy 58: 211–21
- Arkes H R, Blumer C 1985 The psychology of sunk costs. Organization Behavior and Human Decision Processes 35: 124–40
- Dasgupta P, Stiglitz J 1980 Uncertainty, industrial structure, and the speed of R&D. Bell Journal of Economics 11: 1–28
- De la Bruyère J 1990 Les Caractères. Garnier-Flammarion, Paris
- Elster J 1989a Solomonic Judgements. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Elster J 1989b The Cement of Society. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Elster J 1999 Strong Feelings: Emotion, Addiction and Human Behavior. MIT Press, Cambridge, MA
- Elster J 2000 Rationality, economy and society. In: Turner S (ed.) The Cambridge Companion to Weber. Cambridge University Press, New York
- Feller W 1968 An Introduction to Probability Theory and its Applications, 3rd. edn. Wiley, New York, Vol. 1
- Frijda N H 1986 The Emotions. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Føllesdal D 1982 The status of rationality assumptions in interpretation and in the explanation of action. Dialectica 36: 301–16
- Hume D 1960 A Treatise of Human Nature. Oxford University Press, Oxford, UK

- Kahneman D, Slovic P, Tversky A (eds.) 1982 Judgment Under Uncertainty. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Kahneman D, Tversky A (eds.) 2000 Choices, Values, and Frames. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK
- Kunda Z 1987 Motivated inference: Self-serving generation and evaluation of causal theories. Journal of Personality and Social Psychology 53: 636–47
- Loewenstein G 1996 Out of control: Visceral influences on behavior. Organizational Behavior and Human Decision Processes 65: 272–92
- Mackie G 1996 Ending footbinding and infibulation: A convention account. American Sociological Review 61: 999–1017
- Nash J 1950 Equilibrium points in N-person games. Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences 36: 48–9
- Nelson R R, Winter G 1982 An Evolutionary Theory of Economic Change. Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Neumann J, Morgenstern O 1944 Theory of Games and Economic Behavior. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ
- Ramsey F P 1931 Truth and probability. In: Ramsey F P (ed.) The Foundations of Mathematics. Routledge and Kegan Paul, London
- Savage L J 1954 The Foundations of Statistics. Wiley, New York
- Schelling T C 1960 The Strategy of Conflict. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Simon H 1954 A behavioral theory of rational choice. Quarterly Journal of Economics 69: 99–118
- Thaler R H 1980 Towards a positive theory of consumer choice. Journal of Economic Behavior and Organization 1: 39–60
- Thaler R 1991 Quasi-rational Economics. Russell Sage, New York
- Tversky A, Kahneman D 1974 Judgment under uncertainty: Heuristics and biases. Science 185: 1124–31
- Tversky A, Kahneman D 1981 The framing of decisions and the psychology of choice. Science 211: 453–8
- Veyne P 1976 Le pain et le cirque. Seuil, Paris
- Weber M 1958 The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism. Scribner, New York
- Weber M 1968 Economy and Society. Bedminster, New York
- Winter S 1964 Economic 'natural selection' and the theory of the firm. Yale Economic Essays 4: 225–72

J. Elster

Rational Choice Theory in Sociology

Outside the confines of economics and closely related disciplines such as the decision sciences, where it is adhered to almost universally, rational choice theory (RCT) has not gained wide acceptance. Due to its relative success in economics and the limited achievements of other theoretical approaches adopted elsewhere, particularly in sociology and political science, rational choice theory gained significant support in the late twentieth century.

Use of RCT in sociology ranges from formulating mathematically deductive models assuming fully informed and flawlessly calculating actors, to a much broader approach, whence actors are seen as 'doing their best' (i.e., subjectively optimizing), given certain preferences/desires/affects/utilities, with only a limited understanding of their environment and partial reasoning or calculative ability. It is this flexibility which recommends RCT to many of its proponents, ranging from those for whom it comprises the hallmark of any acceptable social science to those for whom it is pragmatically the best framework currently available.

RCT may be used in two complementary ways. First, in a positive manner by proposing explanations of individual and collective actions (decisions) and consequently responding to the question—how (in context) do actors behave? Second, in a normative manner, responding to the question of how they (again in context) ought, given their preferences, to behave. While strong in economics, the normative approach is not widely embraced in sociology.

Rigorous applications of RCT are almost invariably based upon an assumption of the maximization of (often subjective (expected) utility). Actors are thus conceived as (a) capable, at any instant, of taking one of a series of feasible actions, (b) each of which leads to an estimable set of outcomes, with (c) a known (subjective/objective) probability. Further, each outcome carries affect for the actor. The actor can then form a preference ordering over the actions in terms of affects/utilities. Actions (decisions) under certainty, risk and uncertainty are thus special cases of the general model. Various axiomatic systems are available, though the one attributed to Savage is closest to sociological concerns. It is now recognized that actors do not always abide by the precepts of expected utility theory. Prospect theory and developments thereof, which introduce a wide range of 'biases,' are widely accepted as falling under the broad ambit of RCT, as are models based upon limited rationality (like satisficing).

Three related types of RCT modeling frameworks can be distinguished. First, independent decision-making (actions), where the actor's environment may be treated as fixed (i.e., parametric); second, where the environment involves other actors and where consequently decisions or actions are interactive (i.e., strategic), where one shot and (finitely and infinitely) repeated game theory and their associated Nash equilibria are appropriate. Third, evolutionary game theory, where strategies are selected by imitation of either the relatively frequent or relatively successful strategies of others. While the first two frameworks, analytically speaking, usually commence with the full assumption of well informed and rationally calculating individuals, the latter requires no such initial assumptions. It does, though, usually assume that evolutionary process is driven towards an evolutionary stable equilibrium (or some refinement thereof).

The assumptions of expected utility maximization (more generally RCT) in complex environments (parametric or strategic) prove demanding on both the reasoning power and knowledge (information) of the actors concerned, and are sometimes deemed by critics to be entirely unrealistic in a positive context. RCT is, however, strongly wedded to the idea of equilibrium, and in off-equilibrium adjustments all manner of trial and error may be allowed for. Equilibrium, in this view, is not necessarily arrived at (learned) because actors are rational, but rather because actors appear rational (i.e., discover rationality) once an equilibrium has been achieved. Evolutionary game-theoretic models derive the same conclusion by myopic processes of selection (emulation) eventuating in a evolutionary stable equilibrium.

All manner of RCT models may be said to rely initially upon three assumptions, each of which may be regarded as controversial in some sociological circles. They are:

Individualism. Only individual persons ultimately take actions.

Optimality. Individual actions are chosen optimally (at least at equilibrium).

Self-regard (or egoism). Individuals' actions are ultimately concerned with their own welfare (and nobody else's).

Though any one or more of these assumptions may be adjusted in a perspicacious manner (see below), rational choice theory may nevertheless be said to retain its paradigmatic privilege in the sense that it (with its standard assumptions) provides an analytical point of departure.

Despite its explicit individualism, system level or collective/macro relationships between variables are a perfectly acceptable currency for RCT as long as they are construed ultimately as 'shorthand' for the conjunction of relationships that ultimately run through individuals. Indeed, a theory about the connection between two system-level variables must ultimately imply a mechanism involving individual actions. The theoretical question is precisely this: How has the system level relationship been generated by the actions of individuals? The assumption of individualism in RCT implies no more than this about the explanation of system or collective level empirical generalizations.

No contradiction exists between RCT and a view which pictures individuals' actions as 'shaped' by their membership in a group (more generally a collectivity). If, as some 'structuralists' opine, individuals are often so circumscribed by internalized standards and external constraints upon their actions that they barely have any choice at all, then this may call into question optimality and self-regard, but it does not undermine the assumption of individualism in the sense that it is still the motor power behind individual actions (albeit 'programmed ones') that drive the social world.

Things happen in the social world because individuals do and do not (i.e., forbear) to do things, and they are the only things that do and do not do things. All statements that attribute 'doing' to other entities can, in principle if not in practice, be translated, without loss, into statements about individuals doing things.

Individuals choose optimally if no other action exists whose consequences are preferred to the chosen action. An actor's preference-driven action will in turn depend upon that person's (a) beliefs or reasoning about the consequences of the available actions, and (b) affect (desire for/against) the consequences (and perhaps for the action itself). It is thus possible by derivation to speak of optimal beliefs and affects. It is this broad assumption of optimality that gives RCT its paradigmatic privilege.

The major alternative assumptions to this viewpoint are:

(a) That individuals frequently do not act optimally in terms of their preferences.

(b) That although individuals may act optimally in terms of their preferences, senses exist in which their preferences are themselves not formed optimally (non-optimal beliefs and affects).

(c) That individuals do not act upon choices but are driven by forces entirely beyond their control (structuralism).

Cases are well documented in which 'weakness of will' may be said to prevent people from acting in the way they would 'really prefer.' Preferences may also be imprecise or unclear, actions entirely experimental or based upon wishful thinking, and more than one optimal choice may be available. All of this is acknowledged by RCT, although in practice most of the problems reduce to examples of nonoptimal preference formation.

Some take the view (particularly many economists) that preferences are not only stable (compared to constraints) but also are formed in ways that entirely resist the attentions of RCT. Their genesis is either uninteresting (changed constraints accounting for changed action) or beyond rationality. Sociologists reject the first view almost unanimously, but find some sympathy for the second. Not infrequently it is also claimed that the idea of optimality is so weak, when taken by itself, as to constitute an affront to serious understanding. It is observed that, if we are to be permitted any sort of utility arguments, then actions may (certainly ex-post facto) always be made to look as if they are optimal.

The accusation is that, under such circumstances, the assumption of optimality can be protected entirely against potential refutation. In this context, sociologists think in terms of a series of derivative optimality questions:

(a) Are preferences formed optimally with respect to beliefs and affects?

(b) Are beliefs formed optimally with respect to the information available?

(c) Is available information (collected/processed) optimal with respect to affects?

(d) Are affects optimal with respect to individual autonomy?

An action is objectively optimal when conditions (a) to (d) hold true. Such actions may take place under certainty, risk, or uncertainty, according to standard assumptions about the nature of beliefs. These assumptions are collectively very strong, and many social theorists maintain that it is only rarely, if ever, that actions will conform to the ideal pattern.

The issue at stake is whether we may assume that affective dispositions in some sense flow from a balanced or autonomous personality. No doubt forms of behaviour/actions exist that flow from affective dispositions that are 'irrational' or pathological. When this occurs, it usually implies that individuals resist all occasions to consider the opportunity costs of maintaining the disposition (e.g., constantly striving for what is beyond their grasp or manifestly damages them).

It is points (a), (b) and (c) that have attracted the most attention. It is often proposed that preferences cannot be formed optimally for a variety of reasons, prominent among which are the following:

Satisficing. Beliefs are not performed optimally with respect to information available.

Search. No adequate theory of optimal search exists; therefore, once again, beliefs are not optimal with respect to information, nor information with respect to affects.

Decision biases. Preferences are not optimal with respect to beliefs and affects.

Exclusions. Not all possible actions are considered.

Limited deliberation. Not all consequences of all actions are thought through.

Received styles of reasoning. These prevent optimal belief formation.

Ritual/routine/habit/copying. These systematically lead to exclusions and do not evolve optimally in an evolutionary sense.

In each case a conceptual understanding of the apparent limitations of RCT is established in terms of the departure from full optimality. This is one significant sense in which RCT can make a claim for paradigmatic privilege: It still serves, even in default, as a benchmark. Furthermore, many of the above factors are modelled in terms of limited information environments.

The standard version of RCT usually starts with the assumption that individuals act (optimally) in order ultimately to satisfy their self-regarding preferences (utilities). That is, optimal actions are taken in a way that is indifferent to the welfare/utility/consumption of others, considered either individually or collectively. Although nothing intrinsic to the theory mandates this assumption, it is frequently regarded as a natural analytical starting point, to be discarded only cautiously if and when the facts speak otherwise.

Furthermore, if other-regarding preferences are invoked eventually, not infrequently it is maintained that they must in some way be explained or accounted for, whereas self-regarding sentiments do not invite explanation, being in some way natural or self-explanatory. Thus many theorists adopt the practice of assuming that, if no evidence exists to the contrary, then postulate self-regarding utilities. If, however, independent evidence exists for other-regarding sentiments, it would be a mistake to ignore it and go on to ask for an explanation of the source. However, many RCT models interpret other regarding sentiments as instrumental to self-regard (enlightened self-interest). Such models are usually excluded before other regard is introduced into the utility function (affective orientation).

Evolutionary biologists (and evolutionary game theorists) continue to debate the issue as to whether altruistic motives can evolve at an evolving stable equilibrium. Sociologists are required increasingly to relate their own theories to those of colleagues working in these adjacent disciplines. This is particularly so when they adopt the view whereby it is the strategic interaction between two or more actors which constitutes much social interaction. These developments are bringing sociological theory increasingly into contact with game theory and evolutionary game theory. Although games of incomplete information currently play a limited role in sociology, we can expect this to change in the near future. Perfect Bayesian equilibria will thus come centre stage.

The paradigm of sociological investigation which is emerging from an RCT perspective takes the following form:

(a) Initially, assume the actors who are responsible for generating a collective outcome (which may not be intended but only a consequence of what is intentionally brought about) to be rationally self-interested, fully informed and endowed with calculative ability given their (exogenous) objective resources, and (exogenous) preferences/utilities.

(b) Model the structure of the actors interdependencies (social interaction) in the sense that the outcome depends jointly upon what each does. Thus each actor has to take account of what others do (will do, are likely to do, and, if appropriate, have done in the past). Such modeling will usually define a feasible set of actions strategies for each actor.

(c) In the light of (a) and (b), determine the course of action each actor will (rationally) pursue. If these are not unique, then specify their ranges of actions (i.e., multiple equilibria). If the interactions are repeated, adopt the appropriate repeated game theoretical framework.

(d) Thus predict the outcome(s) and test these against descriptions of the outcomes one wishes to explain. Of course, if the model possesses no unique outcome, then all one can require is that the event in question is among the set of possible outcomes predicted by the model (an envelope rather than point prediction). Specific cultural/historical occurrences may select one equilibrium (i.e., focal points) and suggests path-dependence on a particular outcome.

(e) If this simple model fails, construct further models which might involve one or more of the following possibilities:

(i) Relax assumptions of full information, probably following recognized procedure in game theory.

(ii) Relax the assumption of self-interest, introducing richer utility/preference functions (e.g., altruism, malice, indifference, envy, etc.).

(iii) Relax the assumption of objectively calculated resources introducing subjective beliefs about resources.

(iv) Relax the assumption of a set of feasible actions, calculated objectively, introducing subjective beliefs about what is feasible.

(v) Re-compute the structure of interdependencies.

When either (i), (ii), (iii), or (iv) are seen to hold, this will inevitably prompt a further question as to why it should be so. Answers to these questions might also be couched in terms of some of the RCT precepts outlined above (e.g., strategic limitations of information). It is only if this very general framework fails to provide the answers we seek that we should then reach for an alternative theoretical framework.

See also: Action, Theories of Social; Altruism and Self-interest; Bounded Rationality; Coleman, James Samuel (1926–95); Game Theory; Interests, Sociological Analysis of; Macrosociology–Microsociology; Methodological Individualism in Sociology; Rational Choice Explanation: Philosophical Aspects; Rational Choice in Politics; Rational Choice Theory: Cultural Concerns; Sociology: Overview; Theory: Sociological; Traditions in Sociology

Bibliography

- Abell P (ed.) 1991 Rational Choice Theory. Elgar, Aldershot, UK
 Abell P 1996 Sociological theory and rational choice theory. In: Turner B S (ed.) Social Theory. Blackwell, Oxford, UK
 Boudon R 1989 Subjective rationality and the exploration of social behaviour. Rationality and Society 12: 173–96
 Coleman J S, Fararo T J 1992 Rational Choice Theory: Advocacy and Critique. Sage, Newbury Park, CA
 Moser P K (ed.) 1990 Rationality in Action: Contemporary Approaches. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK

P. Abell

Rational Theory of Cognition in Psychology

1. People Appear Irrational in Cognitive Experiments

Michael Watkins has said that a cognitive theory 'is a bit like someone else's toothbrush—it is fine for that individual's use, but for the rest of us ... well, we would just rather not, thank you' (Watkins 1984, p. 86). To say whether people are behaving rationally requires a definition of what it means to behave rationally, and like a toothbrush everyone has their own. For the purposes of this article, rational behavior will be defined as follows: to behave rationally in some context is to display behavior that corresponds to a normative standard of behavior for that context. The choice of the normative standard determines what constitutes rational behavior. For the economist, behaving rationally involves maximizing utility; for the logician it is following the deductive rules of logic; and for the (Bayesian) statistician it is acting according to Bayes's rule. One need not look far to find that people do not reason rationally with respect to a variety of normative standards. There are entire literatures on how and why people violate the rules of deductive logic and statistical inference. In the Wason (1968) card task, central to one such literature, people are given a rule of the form 'if p, then q,' such as 'if there is a vowel printed on one side of a card, then an even number is printed on the other.' The participants are next presented with a set of cards, such as A, K, 2, 7. Their task is to choose only those cards that need to be flipped to check whether the rule holds. In this example, only the A-card (p) and the 7-card (~q) need to be checked. An odd number on the opposite side of the A-card would clearly violate the rule as would a vowel on the other side of the 7-card (~q). The rule says nothing about what is on the opposite side of a consonant, so flipping the K-card (~p) does not test the rule. Also, flipping the 2-card (q) cannot disconfirm the rule, because the rule does not restrict what is on the opposite side of an even-numbered card. In general people perform terribly on this task, or at least their performance does not appear to be rational with respect to the rules of deduction. Oaksford and Chater (1998) surveyed 13 studies, covering a variety of Wason tasks. The proportions of people who flip the p(A), ~p(K), q(2), ~q(7) cards were 89, 16, 62, and 25 percent respectively. That is, people rarely flip the ~q card, which they should flip, and frequently flip the q card, which they need not do.

People are similarly deficient in drawing inferences from statistical information. Consider the following example that requires people to interpret the results of a positive colon cancer test (Gigerenzer 1998). Suppose that 0.3 percent of people have colon cancer, there is a 50 percent chance that a colon cancer test will detect a cancer (a hit), and a 3 percent chance that it will indicate that there is cancer when there is none (a false positive). What is the probability that a person with a positive test has cancer? When Gigerenzer posed this problem to physicians their median estimate was 47 percent. The normative answer is more like 4.8 percent (see Table 1). This answer is obtained by applying Bayes's rule to the statistics given. Bayes's rule shows the correct way to make statistical inferences. Bayes's

Table 1

Bayes's rule applied to Gigerenzer's (1998) cancer example

This shows the probability of some hypothesis, H_j being true given some data, D . Bayes's rule takes the following form:

$$p(H_j|D) = \frac{p(H_j) p(D|H_j)}{\sum_i p(H_i) p(D|H_i)}$$

where $p(H_j)$ is the belief that the hypothesis H_j is true prior to observing the data, D , and $p(D|H_j)$ is the probability of observing the data, given the hypothesis is true. The denominator is the probability of observing the data. It assumes that there are i different hypotheses, one of which is true. We can apply Bayes's rule to Gigerenzer's (1998) cancer example. The two hypotheses are that the patient has cancer, or that he or she does not ($\sim$ cancer). The base rate, or prior, probability of having colon cancer is 0.3 percent. The hit rate of the test is 50 percent, and the false alarm rate is 3 percent. Applying Bayes's rule to this example yields an estimate of having cancer to be 4.8 percent, a much more reassuring estimate than given by the doctors.

$$p(\text{cancer} | + \text{test}) = \frac{p(\text{cancer}) * p(+ \text{test} | \text{cancer})}{p(\text{cancer}) * p(+ \text{test} | \text{cancer}) + p(\sim \text{cancer}) * p(+ \text{test} | \sim \text{cancer})} = \frac{.003 * .5}{.003 * .5 + .997 * .03} = .0477$$

rule implies that given the rarity of cancer, a positive test is more likely to follow a false positive than the actual detection of cancer. As with the Wason (1968) task, subjects' performance on statistical tasks like this clearly shows that they are behaving irrationally. The standard explanation for this is that people tend to ignore base rates; in this example they fail to take into account that cancer is uncommon. That is, only 0.3 percent of people have cancer.

2. People Employ Ecologically Valid Strategies in the Laboratory

Performance on Wason (1968) card tasks, Gigerenzer's (1998) statistical tasks, and other experiments demonstrate that people are, in fact, irrational, when measured against accepted standard inferential rules. There has been a number of proposals to describe what people are doing (e.g., Tversky and Kahneman 1974). The idea behind these approaches is that people are applying heuristics, rules of thumb that tend to be successful in their daily lives, to these laboratory situations where they do not apply. Anderson (1990) has taken this idea one step further, arguing that people are not just bringing real-world heuristics into the laboratory, but rather are employing optimal solutions to certain problems faced in their natural environments. However, behavior that is rational in natural environments may not necessarily be rational in the peculiar environments that experimental psychologists concoct. Some of the roots of this idea are discussed next.

3. David Marr's Levels of Explanation

Anderson's motivations closely follow the arguments that David Marr laid out in his influential book Vision.

Marr (1982) argues that fully understanding an information processing system requires considering the system from multiple levels. Marr was interested in the visual system, which he argues evolved to 'tell(s) us about shape and space and spatial arrangement' (Marr 1982, p. 36). The distinction that Marr makes among the levels of explanation can be more readily understood by referring to a far simpler information processing system than vision—a clock. What does a clock do? It indexes time. How does it do it? It achieves this goal by measuring the passage of time by incrementing counters at fixed intervals. Marr says that descriptions like this are at the computational level.

The next level down, called the representation and algorithm level, describes how the goals should be achieved. In the case of a clock it would map the cycles of an oscillator into seconds, minutes, and hours. Descriptions at this level of analysis require a specification of the representations and the algorithms that operate on them to achieve the goals specified at the computational level. Many combinations of representation and algorithms can achieve these goals; a 12 or 24 hour clock can index time. The choice of representation does constrain the choice of algorithm, such as how seconds are rolled over into minutes, and minutes into hours (e.g., what happens at 12:59). Further, not all representation and algorithms are equivalent; some computations may be simpler with one representation than another. Calculating the duration of a trip is simpler when the train leaves at 10:00 and arrives at 14:00 than when it leaves at 10:00 a.m. and arrives at 2:00 p.m.

The lowest level of description in Marr's hierarchy, the hardware implementation level, is concerned with describing the physical entities that carry out the computations of the representation and algorithm level. Here, the current time could be represented by the configuration of hands on a clock face, the coordination of seconds and minutes handled by brass wheels, the oscillator could be realized as a pendulum. Marr's point is that if you stumbled onto a morass of gears, you would be better able to make sense of these gears if you knew that they were part of a clock as opposed to a cash register, or a sewing machine. Similarly, one is going to be better able to understand people as information processing systems, if one understands what those systems are trying to accomplish. As Marr puts it, 'trying to understand perception by studying only neurons is like trying to understand bird flight by studying only feathers: it just cannot be done. In order to understand bird flight, we have to understand aerodynamics; only then do the structures of feathers and the different shapes of birds' wings make sense' (Marr 1982, p. 27).

4. John Anderson's Principle of Rationality

Marr (1982) demonstrated the utility of approaching the problem of vision from multiple levels, and particularly from the computational level. Based on Marr's success with vision, Anderson (1990) hypothesized that the approach might work well for higher-level cognitive processes. Anderson argued that most theorizing in cognitive psychology concerns representations and the processes that act on them, corresponding to Marr's representation and algorithm level. Cognitive neuroscience and neuroscience focus on the hardware implementation level. Relatively little theorizing, he points out, occurs at Marr's computational level. Anderson (1990) explored whether it would be useful to think about higher level cognition, such as categorization (Anderson and Matessa 1992) and memory (Anderson and Milson 1989, Anderson and Schooler 2000) at the rational level, analogous to Marr's computational level. His principle of rationality is that 'the cognitive system operates at all times to optimize the adaptation of the behavior of the organism' (Anderson 1990, p. 28). Anderson renamed Marr's computational level the rational level, because the computational level sounds like it should be describing the algorithm and representation level. His choice of the term rational also serves as an allusion to economic theorizing that often takes place at Marr's computational level. Economists focus more on the decisions agents make, rather than on the processes involved in coming to those decisions. In the economic realm, it is easy to appreciate that it is rational for firms to maximize profits (or, as in the case of Ben and Jerry's, the famous American premium ice-cream maker, to maximize a combination of profits and social good). For the cognitive system, the currency is less clear. Thus, the critical step in what Anderson calls a 'rational analysis' is to figure out what quantity the cognitive system might be optimizing, and to make predictions based on this about how people will behave in particular experimental tasks.

5. Oaksford and Chater's Rational Analysis of the Wason Card Task

There would seem to be a weak case for the rationality of the cognitive system in light of people's irrational behavior on the Wason (1968) card task and Gigerenzer's (1998) cancer problem. However, Oaksford and Chater's (1996) rational analysis of the Wason card task shows that typical performance on the Wason, while violating traditional notions of rationality, is indeed quite rational when seen in a broader context of how people seek information in the world.

Consider the following situations that parents may face. In one situation, hearing an utterance from the baby he was caring for, a young father might ask 'was that just babbling?' or if the baby says 'baba,' then the baby wants a bottle. If the mother found her husband giving the baby a bottle, and if she wanted to know whether 'baba' was serving as the baby's signal it wanted a bottle, would it be rational for the mother to ask whether the baby had said 'baba' before the feeding? Now imagine 16 years have passed, and the mother is teaching her son to drive. She wonders whether he knows that when the oil light is on, he should stop the car. Would it be rational for the mother to ask whether the oil light is on? It would seem quite natural for the young mother to ask about what the baby had said, and for the middle-aged mother to remain silent. Asking in the first case would be like flipping the 2-card, irrational with respect to deductive inference. Asking cannot disconfirm the hypothesis that the baby knows how to use the word, since logically many circumstances (e.g., fussing) can suggest an infant is hungry. In contrast, asking about the oil light would be like flipping the 7-card, rational with respect to the rules of logical inference. If the mother found that the oil light was on, this would be a violation of the rule. Our intuitions are at odds with logic.

Perhaps our intuitions are correct that the young mother is rational to ask about what the baby said, and the older mother is rational in remaining silent. The essential difference between the two situations is the amount of information the answer to the question is likely to yield. Though asking whether the baby said 'baba' could not provide a definitive answer, knowing what the baby said tells something about whether the baby knows the word. In contrast, asking about the oil light, though potentially highly informative in the unlikely event that the oil light is on, will tell nothing in the more likely event that the oil light is off.

Oaksford and Chater's (1996) analysis of the Wason task formalizes these intuitions. They assume that people apply experimental, information-seeking strategies to deductive tasks like the Wason. Though the details of their mathematical analysis are beyond the scope of this article, the flavor of it can be given here. As is true for nearly all rational analyses, they assume that people are behaving as if they are following Bayes's rule. They suggest that people are not treating the task as a test of logic, but rather are attempting to gauge the causal relation between two events. More specifically, they assume what people are really trying to do in deductive tasks is decide between two hypotheses: when p occurs (e.g., baby says 'baba'), q must follow (e.g., baby wants a bottle), or the alternative hypothesis that event p is independent of event q . Sometimes the baby says 'baba,' and sometimes the baby is hungry, and it is only by chance that the baby says 'baba' when it is hungry. In the case of the Wason task described earlier, the competing hypotheses are that an even number depends on a vowel or the alternative that evens and vowels are independent of each other. The question, then, is which card will provide the most evidence in terms of discriminating between these two rival hypotheses. Since people do not know in advance how an experiment (i.e., flipping a card) is going to turn out, they make their decisions based on how much information they expect to gain.

A critical difference between the parenting examples and the Wason (1968) task is that people have experience with how children learn words, but relatively little experience with numbered and lettered cards. Lacking any relevant experience about the cards, Oaksford and Chater (1996) assume that people treat them as if they are typical of causal relations they have seen in the past. When their model of information-seeking is combined with the assumption that causally related events are relatively rare, it predicts the observed subject preferences for flipping cards, namely p (e.g., A-card) is chosen more than q (e.g., 2-card), q more than $\sim p$ (e.g., K-card), and $\sim p$ more than $\sim q$ (e.g., 7-card). So in the Wason task we have a situation where the behavior is irrational with respect to the laws of deduction, but can be understood to be rational in the context of how people seek information.

6. People are Rational When Ecologically Valid Strategies are Appropriate

Gigerenzer's (1998) colon cancer experiment demonstrated that people are irrational with respect to proper Bayesian inference. This result seems to be at odds with Anderson's rational hypothesis, as Bayesian analyses underlie nearly all rational analyses. Since the problem was laid out perfectly for Bayesian inference, we would expect people to perform well. Gigerenzer argues that people perform poorly, because the problem format is all wrong. People did not evolve, he argues, to process probabilities, but rather to draw inferences based on their direct experience. His prediction is that people should do well on statistical tasks when the data are presented more naturally in terms of raw frequencies. Consider again the colon cancer problem, but this time in raw frequencies. Thirty out of every 10,000 people have colon cancer. Of these 30, 15 will test positive. Of the remaining 9,970 people without cancer, 300 will still test positive. What proportion of people who test positive will actually have cancer? Now it is clear that only 15 of the 315 (or 4.45 percent) of those who test positive will have cancer. When the problem was presented this way to another group of doctors, 67 percent answered correctly, as compared to 4 percent when the data were presented in terms of probabilities. When the problem presentation is consistent with how we experience events in the world, people's behavior corresponds to the prescriptions of a normative standard, a Bayesian inference. As with the Wason task, people appear to be behaving irrationally, when the experimental task and conditions conflict with the natural environment.

7. In Practice, Rational Analyses are Bounded

The discussions of the Wason (1968) task and Gigerenzer's (1998) task were couched strictly at the rational (or computational) level. In practice, a rational analysis cannot focus strictly on the rational level, but must also consider the algorithm and representation level. The reason for this is that sometimes the rational solution requires calculations that would be physically impossible for any system to perform. In such circumstances a mapping needs to be made from the results of the rational level into algorithms and representations that approximate the computations called for by the rational analysis. It is at the algorithm and representation level that compromises have to be made. In particular, assumptions have to be made about processing limitations. This ties in with Simon's (1956) notion of bounded rationality. That is, people are rational within the constraints of their ability to process information. For example, Simon (1990) pointed out that ignoring processing limitations suggests that knowledge of the rules of chess should lead to perfect play. If a person or machine had an infinite amount of time to contemplate a chess move, and the potential countermove of the opponent to that move, and the countermove to all the opponent's potential countermove, ad infinitum, then the person could select an initial move that would inevitably lead them to check mate. The problem is that more board positions would have to be considered than there are molecules in the universe (Simon 1990). Instead, people and chess programs use heuristics to mimic the behavior of this rational strategy. Similarly, because of processing limitations, most rational analyses are approximations to the optimal solution.

There are some games, however, for which it is possible to know the game completely. For example, many adults know the moves and countermove in tic-tac-toe to guarantee that they will at least not lose. Like tic-tac-toe, the Wason (1968) task is atypical. Thus the number of potential hypotheses and experiments raised by Oaksford and Chater's (1996) analysis of the task is relatively small compared to the number raised by problems people often face in their daily and work lives. For example, consider again the problem of interpreting what the baby means when it says 'baba.' The potential number of hypotheses for what 'baba' means certainly exceeds the number of configurations of a chessboard. If Oaksford and Chater's information-seeking strategy were applied to the problem of vocabulary acquisition, where large numbers of hypotheses and experiments are potentially relevant, they would need to employ heuristics and build processing bounds into their system as well.

8. Whether People are Rational Depends on Your Perspective

This article demonstrated that there is no definitive answer to the question of whether people behave rationally. For example, the Wason (1968) task clearly demonstrates that people behave irrationally with respect to logic, while Oaksford and Chater's (1996) analysis shows that the behavior is rational when the context is broadened to encompass a person's "normal" life conditions' (Brunswick 1943, p. 259). In short, people can be seen to behave rationally with respect to the environment, but appear to be operating irrationally with respect to a particular task, especially when the task that subjects are performing differs from the one intended by the experimenter.

See also: Functionalism, History of

Bibliography

- Anderson J R, Matessa M 1992 Explorations of an incremental, Bayesian algorithm for categorization. Machine Learning 9: 275–308
- Anderson J R, Milson R 1989 Human memory: An adaptive perspective. Psychological Review 96: 703–19
- Anderson J R, Schooler L J 2000 The adaptive nature of memory. In: Tulving E, Craik F I M (eds.) Handbook of Memory. Oxford University Press, New York
- Brunswick E 1943 Organismic achievement and environmental probability. Psychological Review 50: 255–72
- Gigerenzer G 1998 Ecological intelligence: An adaptation for frequencies. In: Cummins D D, Allen C (eds.) The Evolution of Mind. Academic Press, San Diego, CA
- Gigerenzer G, Todd P M, the ABC Research Group 1999 Simple Heuristics that Make Us Smart. Oxford University Press, New York
- Manktelow K 1999 Reasoning and Thinking. Psychology Press, Hove, UK
- Marr D 1982 Vision. Freeman, San Francisco
- Oaksford M, Chater N 1996 Rational explanation of the selection task. Psychological Review 103: 381–91
- Oaksford M, Chater N 1998a Rationality in an Uncertain World. Psychology Press, Hove, UK
- Oaksford M, Chater N (eds.) 1998b Rational Models of Cognition. Oxford University Press, New York
- Simon H A 1956 Rational choice and the structure of the environment. Psychological Review 63: 129–38

- Simon H A 1990 Invariants of human behavior. In: Rozenweig M R, Porter L W (eds.) Annual Review of Psychology. Annual Reviews, Palo Alto, CA
- Tversky A, Kahneman D 1974 Judgement under uncertainty: Heuristics and biases. Science 185: 1124–31
- Wason P C 1968 Reasoning about a rule. Quarterly Journal of Experimental Psychology 20: 273–81
- Watkins M J 1984 Models as toothbrushes. The Behavioral and Brain Science 7: 86

L. Schooler

Rationalism

When philosophy consisted of set piece battles between grand schools of thought (such as realism, scepticism, or monism), 'rationalism' referred to the belief that human beings disposed of a faculty called 'reason' which gave them access to the structure of reality. Man, wrote Aristotle (384–322 BC), is a rational animal, but Aristotle recognized that reason had to be trained. In most human beings, the understanding was distorted by passion. Aristotle's teacher Plato (427–347 BC) had argued in The Republic and other dialogues that the world we experience was a confused copy of a world of forms or ideas which could be discovered by philosophical inquiry. His parable of the cave (Republic, Book VII) is the founding image of rationalism. In its classical Greek version, rationalism assumed that we might understand the structure of the universe by the power of reason, an assumption connected with the fact that rationalism began its philosophical career as a generalization of the procedures of mathematics. In his dialogue the Meno, Plato had argued that knowledge is accessible to rational inquiry independently of experience. Later, the Stoics argued that moral knowledge of the laws of nature is available to any rational creature who looks into himself.

Medieval philosophy revived Greek ideas and cross-fertilized them with Christian doctrine. St. Thomas Aquinas (1225–1274 AD) combined reason and revelation by taking his account of nature from Aristotle, and his account of higher things (or 'supernature') from Christian revelation. This synthesis, however, soon began to fall apart, and in modern times rationalism has commonly been taken to refer to rejection of Christian revelation because of rational criticism.

1. Modern Rationalism

This was not, however, the view taken by the great rationalist philosophers of the seventeenth century, for whom science was the model of understanding. Descartes invoked God's veracity as a foundation of his system, while Spinoza was a monist who argued that there was only one substance in the world, which he called 'God or nature'—Deus sive natura. Reason and logic alone could generate certain knowledge. Yet even at this point the idea that nature was to be understood as a result of observation was emerging in thinkers such as Francis Bacon who sought 'to put nature to the torture' of experiment. The reason in which seventeenth century thinkers put their faith was less and less the human faculty supposedly giving us access to ends and values than what later came to be called 'instrumental reason' which revealed causes and linked ends and means. Confusingly, reason and rationalism have commonly been used to cover both ideas.

Philosophers had seldom entirely lost sight of the fact that understanding of the world depended upon observation and the seventeenth century growth of science brought this idea to the fore. Its germ lay in the medieval doctrine that we can only fully understand what we can make ourselves—a class of things thought to include not only artefacts but also society and language. After Bacon, the observational basis of knowledge was developed in the Essay Concerning Human Understanding by John Locke (1632–1704). Locke was sceptical of syllogistic reasoning, and denied in particular the Cartesian doctrine that reason was innate in man. Locke described himself as an 'underlaborer' in a generation of giants, by which he particularly referred to Isaac Newton the great physicist. Although the founder of empiricism as a coherent alternative to rationalism, Locke's philosophy did not fully free itself from rationalism, particularly in his account of 'powers of the mind.' Empiricism was refined in the work of Bishop Berkeley (1685–1753) and particularly David Hume (1711–76), a line of philosophical development that for some purposes culminated in the synthesis of Immanuel Kant (1724–1804), who argued that we can understand the phenomenal world only in terms of the set of categories (substance, causality, etc.) built into the human mind.

Thomas Hobbes (1588–1679) had used instrumental reason to generate the principles on which the state might be based. In Leviathan (1651), he attempted to demonstrate that civil order could be based only on obedience to a sovereign power. The Sovereign guaranteed laws of nature which are rationally derivable as axioms of prudence from the human propensity to avoid death. Hobbes's work was philosophical in that it analyzed the concept of a Commonwealth, but like most political philosophy, it contained some programmatic elements for practical life—positions clearly revealed in his Behemoth (written in 1668). In the next century, many thinkers of the French Enlightenment turned reason into an instrument for criticizing society. Writers such as Condillac and Helvetius adopted the empiricism of Locke, but by their emphasis on ideas, and their hostility to Catholicism and the ancient regime, they turned it into a form of rationalism. Reason led these philosophers to reject Christian revelation because of its conflict with logic (in the case of the Trinity) or science (in the case of miracles for example). Reason was also invoked against monarchy in favor of a revival of the classical idea of citizenship. These powerful movements of thought exploded in 1789 into the French Revolution, in which reason as the generator of natural rights was pitted not only against experience in epistemology, and against revelation in theology, but against tradition in politics. Reason was now a revolutionary principle seeking to reform everything in social and political life.

2. Rationalism in History

In the nineteenth century, rationalism invaded history by schematizing, as the doctrine of progress, the evolution of mankind from stone age life to the advanced condition of modern Europe. In rationalist terms, the progress of mankind led from superstition and prejudice towards forms of mutual understanding. Each such theory generally located the present as the hour before the dawn of a new era. Auguste Comte the positivist (1798–1857) thought mankind had moved from a theological stage through a metaphysical period and was now moving into a positivist era. The most famous of these adventures of ideas was that of Karl Marx (1818–88), who incorporated his account of human progress into a lossely connected narrative which was passed off as history. The drive to new rationalist accounts of society was inspired by technological optimism. Given that human beings had learned how to control nature, ought they not also to learn how to control society in the interests of human happiness? Rationalism thus became the vehicle of active programs of social reform, while those who took a more pessimistic view of human possibility were stigmatized as reactionary, or even irrational.

Such activist movements often collided with each other, and liberal and socialist programs for the inclusive improvement of the human condition competed for support with exclusivist movements such as those of the Fascists and the Nazis. In terms of the progress of human beings towards universal betterment, the oppression of totalitarian movements seemed not merely irrational, but actually irrationalist. Such irrationalism was often taken to be a form of nihilism, symbolised by the Francoist general whose cry was Viva la muerte ('Long live death'). Rationalism thus developed a contrast with irrationalism, understood as any general rejection of the liberal program of rights and the liberal search for universal happiness.

Rational understanding seeks to grasp the universal structure of whatever it studies, and is therefore more at home with theory and universal principles—with science and philosophy—than with history. Science and philosophy are thus pre-eminently rational in a sense in which history, as explanation in terms of event and circumstance, is not. Further, philosophy assembles in a coherent manner whatever is known about an activity. If knowledge is power, then theoretical knowledge ought to give us power over the world. The most powerful rationalist impulse in recent centuries has been to create an understanding of human life which will allow us to build what is conceived to be a better world.

The problem is that theory and practice seem not to be related in this way. Plato's Republic is a masterpiece of political philosophy, but Plato's attempt to improve the politics of Syracuse was a failure. Nevertheless, the belief that successful practice could be encapsulated in a doctrine of a more or less philosophical kind has powerfully influenced the character of modern Western societies. The fusion of a philosophical method with practical ambitions is one of the central meanings of the elusive idea of ideology. Marx along with Friedrich Engels (1820–95), for example, directed their theory towards a new class of political actor, which they called the 'proletariat,' which was instructed in how to take over political power. Niccolo Machiavelli (1469–1527) was a pioneering exponent of this kind of rationalism, and Locke's Two Treatises of Government and Jeremy Bentham's (1748–1832) doctrine of utilitarianism might also be understood in this way as handbooks of political skill designed for new actors on the political stage.

3. Critics of Rationalism

The central principle of rationalism in politics, as analyzed by Michael Oakeshott (1901–90), is the sovereignty of technique. The skill of politics (which Lenin (1870–1924) and others thought remarkably easy once mystifications had been shed) can be learned from a book containing basic principles. Politics in this sense is thus no longer the conduct of public business by a small set of rulers, but a universal activity, not basically affected by the particularities of any given political culture. This is why for example Bentham's ignorance of Latin American politics was thought an actual qualification for the project of writing constitutions for that area.

The most common rationalist image of politics is that of a building program, in which abstract foundations logically generate a good society. Such projects are often based on abstractions such as democracy, justice, rights, or community. Rationalist programs focus on only one such desirable foundation, for the danger (as Plato had already recognized) is that two principles might come into conflict. The aim is to solve the problem of conflict, and both rulers and ruled need instruction from theoreticians (called 'education') in the philosophical foundations of the proposed good society.

Contemporary normative political philosophy is rationalist in its concern to analyze some basic norm of current liberal societies, commonly with an eye to improving practice. In the analysis of a just society advanced by John Rawls in A Theory of Justice, the future members of the society guarantee the rationality of the rules of justice because the rules have been agreed behind the famous 'veil of ignorance' in order to avoid the contamination of any particular knowledge. The equality of the Rawlesian citizens is thus matched by their vacuity.

The practical aspects of this form of rationalism are driven by instrumental reason in the sense that thinking takes off from whatever is construed as a problem (usually, indeed, a 'social problem') and the aim is to achieve a solution. Rationalism is sometimes criticized as assuming that all human beings are basically good, and only made bad by bad institutions, but the more fundamental assumption is that human beings are plastic entities who can be made into whatever type of social being is desired through the power of ideas. Politics thus becomes not so much social as attitudinal engineering; it requires removing the wrong ideas (racism, sexism, etc.) from society and restocking it with the right ideas. The general project of improving the world by 'modernizing' it is one of the most powerful of current rationalist projects.

In the second half of the twentieth century, rationalism as the search for the right foundations of society was challenged by people who said that the search was futile. There were no rational foundations, merely the changing responses of different sets of people. The derivation of this form of rationalism was from Heidegger (1889–1976) and Wittgenstein (1889–1951) but it was popularized in the United States by disciples of John Dewey such as Richard Rorty in Philosophy and the Mirror of Nature (1980). Radical critics charged that the whole rationalist project was designed to establish the hegemony of some specific group—capitalists, white males, commissars, and the like. Ethical opinions such as 'political correctness' and political projects such as multiculturalism were juxtaposed against rationalism. These revived forms of scepticism look like what rationalists would see as an irrationalist challenge to Western life, but, as is common in forms of scepticism, there are discernible traces of rationalist dogmatism in the egalitarian morality and communitarian politics taken for granted in the practices of the challengers.

See also: Aristotle (384–322 BC); Comte, Auguste (1798–1857); Hobbes, Thomas (1588–1679); Justice: Philosophical Aspects; Justice: Political; Locke, John (1632–1704); Marx, Karl (1818–89); Progress: History of the Concept; Rational Choice Explanation: Philosophical Aspects; Rationality in Society; Social Justice

Bibliography

Berlin I 1998 The Proper Study of Mankind. Farrar, Straus and Giroux, New York

- Gellner F 1992 Reason and Culture. Basil Blackwell, Oxford, UK
- Oakeshott M 1991 Rationalism in Politics and Other Essays. Liberty Press, Indianapolis, IN
- Popper K R 1966 The Open Society and its Enemies, 5th edn., Routledge, London
- Rorty R 1980 Philosophy and the Mirror of Nature. Basil Blackwell, Oxford, UK

K. Minogue

Rationality and Feminist Thought

One of the most profound reorganizations of the twentieth century has been a thorough re-evaluation of concepts of rationality as they have evolved in Western culture for the past three or so millennia (Gigerenzer et al. 1999, Labouvie-Vief 1994). This reorganization has been of profound interest to women, who have actively participated in the many lively debates about the nature of rationality. Models of rationality are, in large part, aimed at specifying the nature of humans and their desirable and less desirable characteristics, and, since these characteristics often were thought to find their most prototypical expression in men rather than in women, the issue of gender occupies a central place in this profound metatheoretical shift.

In response to traditional dualistic notions of rationality and the implied devaluation of women's rationality, some women have pointed to the fact that women traditionally were prevented from cultivating rationality (Hollingsworth 1926). Others have suggested that the traditional masculinist concept of rationality does not apply to women who utilize uniquely 'feminine' ways of knowing (Belenky et al. 1986, Gilligan 1992). Neither of these alternatives, however, transcends the traditional dualistic concept of rationality. Thus, a further suggestion has been that we move away from dualistic concepts of rationality altogether. Accordingly, concepts of reason are being transformed and new models are emerging that acknowledge that rational and nonrational processes mutually enhance each other and contribute in the process of knowing (Labouvie-Vief 1994).

1. Rationality and Women's Mind in History

Concepts of rationality have been central to definitions of human nature. Often couched explicitly in terms of the mind and its relationship to emotions, social context, and culture, rationality was defined dualistically—as that which transcends these categories, i.e., as conscious thought, abstract thinking, and universal laws of truth (Labouvie-Vief 1994). Its relation to gender often was more implicit, but the rational being was a 'man of reason' (Lloyd 1993).

This association of reason with masculinity—and of femininity as a lack of reason—widely pervaded Western intellectual history and is visible not only in philosophy and science, but also in art and literature, myth and religion, and ultimately, the social structures and social regulation processes that have supported these representations.

1.1 The Gendered Mind in Philosophy

The dualistic theory of rationality and the mind became institutionalized when Greek philosophers began to speculate about human nature. These efforts culminated in the work of Plato, who proposed a two-layer view of human nature and reality to supplant more ancient views (Labouvie-Vief 1994). For more ancient views of the self as a collection of motor actions, bodily processes, or mythic-divine injunctions, Plato substituted a language of a self no longer identified primarily with its bodily processes and concrete actions, but of a mental agent different from its bodily manifestations. The new language was that of a self who was the author of those actions, of a psychological causal agent who was at their center and who was responsible for them.

Plato's dualistic, two-layered conception of the individual contrasted a layer of mind, abstract thought, soul, spirit, or ideals to a layer of body, matter, and enslavement to concrete sensory and organismic happenings. These layers were arranged hierarchically, with mind-spirit forming the superior pole, body, and senses the inferior one. That hierarchical worldview also became associated with gender. Thus, in the Symposium, Plato argued that the spiritual love between men who create ideas is more valuable than the physical and material love with women, since women's creativity is merely one of bodily procreation rather than the creation of universal ideas in which men participate (Labouvie-Vief 1994).

1.2 Women's Mind in Western Science

The association of the masculine with mind and spirit, and of the feminine with body and matter, widely came to characterize thinking about and representations of women. It has characterized not only the view of most philosophers but has also remained basic to other theoretical accounts of human nature. For example, Aristotle (De Generatione Animalium) thought that women's contribution to fertilization consisted of a passive and material principle rather than an active and spiritual masculine one (Lerner 1986). Freud proposed that women's lack of phallic sexuality made their sexual and psychological orientations more passive and masochistic (Freud 1925). Others taught that the anatomy of women's brains made them less capable of conscious, rational thought and of extraordinary creativity or achievement (Bem 1993, Labouvie-Vief 1994). Even in the twentieth century, the notion became popularized by de Beauvoir (1952), who argued that woman is closer to nature because physiology makes her so: Her mode of creating is by submitting to a natural bodily function, by remaining enslaved to her biological fate, while the man creates by 'acts that transcend his animal nature.' By creating culture, the man is thought to be involved in a new, freer form of creation, one that transcends what is given organismically and shapes the future rather than passively suffering it.

This gendered dualistic notion of mind has been influential in shaping theoretical notions of development. Traditionally, development has been construed as an onward rush, a heroic and energetic striving for mental ideals and control, a triumph of conscious, abstract forms of thinking, a victory of rationality over emotions and the body. Since these features of the mind also are identified with masculinity, femininity was represented as an inferior and less developed state of being—a form, as it were, of mental and physical castration. Freud (1925) was most explicit in equating development of mind and identity with a progression from the domain of the castrated mother to the potent and genital father, but most major theories of development of the past followed this same pattern of the devaluation of the emotive, imaginative, and sensory aspects of the self (Labouvie-Vief 1994).

1.3 Women's Mind in Myth, Art, and Religion

The notion of the masculine as identified with mind, spirit, and transcendence is also pervasive in mythology and religion, literature, and art (Labouvie-Vief 1994, Ortner and Whitehead 1981, Rosaldo and Lamphere 1974). In all of those, one polarity of human functioning tends to be idealized and even inflated as 'masculine': it is based on an imagery of rise, light, and sun, and it symbolizes such psychological qualities as leadership, rational self-control, self-assertiveness, individuality, and willfulness. The other polarity, in turn, is degraded and devalued: its imagery is based on falling, being conquered and surrendering, and engulfment in dark spaces, and it symbolizes suffering, powerlessness, and entrapment in unconscious processes. In mythology and religion, such imagery often occurs as the theme of the overthrow of original female divine figures by the male godheads or heroes who came to be the original creators, creating the world not organically but conceptually, by pronouncing a word (Lerner 1986). A well known example of this process of the replacement of the feminine principle is offered by the great Greek tragedies by Aeschylus and Euripides centering on the myths of Agamemnon and Orestes. These myths address the question of which of two murders was a more heinous act. Was it Klytemnestra's killing her husband Agamemnon to revenge his sacrificing their daughter Iphigenia to the gods so as to secure a good wind for his war ships. Or was it their son Orestes's killing of his mother to avenge the murder of his father? The answer was that Orestes could be forgiven because he represented a new masculine order that superseded an earlier feminine order—a new paradigm in which fatherhood was said to have replaced motherhood as a principle of creation (Labouvie-Vief 1994).

2. Explanations of Dualistic Theories of Mind

How universal is the equation of masculinity with mind and rationality, and of femininity with an 'older' emotional and organic order of being? Much writing has suggested that such patriarchal ideologies in actuality came to replace more women-focused ones of previous times. Originally proposed by Bachofen in 1861 (Duby and Perrot 1992/93), this 'matriarchy' thesis holds that there must have been, in prehistoric times and before the rise of the major patriarchal societies, the reign of a maternal principle. However, the historical accuracy of this thesis has recently been doubted. Instead, a number of anthropological, sociological, and psychological explanations have been proposed.

2.1 Anthropological Evidence

Most historical and anthropological evidence (Duby and Perrot 1992/94, Ortner and Whitehead 1981, Rosaldo and Lamphere 1974) does not support the view that earlier and/or less civilized societies granted women more power universally. On the contrary, strong patriarchal systems in which women are devalued along a mind-nature dimension exist worldwide in preliterate societies. Often such societies also have myths of early matriarchies that eventually were superseded by the rule of man. However, such matriarchy myths can be part of an ideology that devalues women (Rosaldo and Lamphere 1974). Around the world, such myths often tell of the past bad behavior and evil of women that eventually was ended only when men overturned the power of women and took control. In this way, matriarchy myths can be used to justify the male order. They form part of a cultural code distinguishing men from women in terms of morality and authority, they incorporate the values that grant men more power in social life. Thus, even though they talk about a time before the current social order, they fix that order as legitimate and invariant.

2.2 Sociological Mechanisms

Although there is considerable variation in women's behavior and activities across cultures and historical times, there are nearly universal differences in what is believed to constitute the nature of women (Brown and Gilligan 1992, Labouvie-Vief 1994, Rosaldo and Lamphere 1974)—and, correspondingly, the nature of men (Gilmore 1990). In many cultures, women are held to be nurturers, to be gentle and concerned with caring for others rather than self-expression, they are considered passive and unaggressive and to readily subordinate themselves to those in power. They are felt to be closer to children—more emotional and expressive, less capable of rational decision-making and abstract thought. They are also believed to be poorly suited for positions of leadership and power (Bem 1993, Gutmann 1987, Ortner and Whitehead 1981, Rosaldo and Lamphere 1974). Sometimes these beliefs are attributed to biological bases of gender, but many think they root in the social roles and realities of women's lives.

In most societies women are subordinated socially or, at least, they do not hold publicly recognized power and authority surpassing that of men (Ortner and Whitehead 1981, Rosaldo and Lamphere 1974). In some societies, individual women may have achieved considerable power and recognition, but in general all societies tend to exclude women from certain crucial economic, political, and intellectual activities. Even in societies where women exert considerable power by doing much productive work and controlling resources, their activities are not associated with the same social status as those of men. Their roles as wives and mothers are associated with fewer powers and prerogatives than are the roles of men (Bernard 1987, Duby and Perrot 1992/93, Ortner and Whitehead 1981, Rosaldo and Lamphere 1974). In turn, this social devaluation is often attributed to some major biological deficiencies (Bem 1993, Labouvie-Vief 1994). These same 'lacks' also were thought to make women eminently suitable to take on positions subservient to men.

2.3 Psychological Mechanisms

The near universality of the devaluation of women's mind also has suggested that the construal of women as mentally inferior and nonrational may be rooted in psychological processes through which gender is defined. Psychoanalyst Stoller (Herdt and Stoller 1990) and sociologist Chodorow (1978) suggested that these processes render the gender development of boys particularly vulnerable. This vulnerability results from the mother's role in early development. For both boys and girls, the mother defines an early core of identity, which in the case of the boy's development becomes problematic. He, unlike the girl, needs to change his core identity from 'feminine' to 'masculine', a change that leaves a life-long vulnerability of self. As a result, men may defensively devalue women as shown in cultural practices (usually, related to initiation rites) aimed at defining the unique nature of the 'masculine' as a way of creation unique to men and 'better' than the 'feminine.' Complementary to the definition of manhood, womanhood in many cultures is defined by practices aimed at creating a sexual and social object to the action of men—whether it is direct genital mutilation or isolation from participation in public life through withholding education and high status work (de Beauvoir 1952, Labouvie-Vief 1994, Ortner and Whitehead 1981).

However, such mechanisms may be themselves relative to the family structure that operates in a society strongly divided along gender lines and devaluing women (Bem 1993, Labouvie-Vief 1994). But with family structure and gender roles changing to create more shared and equitable activities among men and women, these domains are becoming less clearly related to gender, per se.

3. Rationality and Women's Minds

Traditional dualistic theories of rationality, with their devaluation of femininity and inflation of masculinity, have influenced deeply women's process of growing up. Whereas masculine development is associated with increases in abstract thought, in individuality, independence, and self-confidence, women often have experienced their development as renunciation, surrender, and victimization—a loss of voice, a blunting of mind, a process of silencing (Bem 1993, Brown and Gilligan 1992, Labouvie-Vief 1994). Such struggles of women with their own sense of creativity is expressed very poignantly in the lives of many writers of the twentieth century, such as Sylvia Plath or Virginia Woolf.

As educational and employment opportunities have opened up for women and as women have begun to participate in defining themselves, research has upheld few objective differences in intellectual status between men and women. Although women tend to score somewhat higher on verbal and men on mathematical abilities, these differences are overall small (Linn and Hyde 1989). Moreover, since Hollingsworth's (1926) pioneering work showing that gender differences in intellectual can be explained usually in terms of differences in educational opportunities, research has documented that over time, as disparities of opportunity are declining, gender differences in intellectual functioning are becoming smaller, too (Linn and Hyde 1989).

Yet despite evidence that female intellectual endowment does not lag behind that of men, women on average continue to lag in achievement behind men. Moreover, this gender lag increases in the course of development. Indeed, in early childhood, girls surpass boys on most measures of school achievement. However, as they grow older, girls often are found to retreat from achievement-related challenges; standing out for women becomes a source of conflict and shame, and they attempt to hide their excellence (Brown and Gilligan 1992, Labouvie-Vief 1994). Thus, women's feelings of shame and discounting of their achievement persist well into the present day. However, in many cultures women's transition into later life is often characterized by a degree of freeing from the cultural constraints of 'womanhood.' No longer defined as sexual objects, women often move from a world of confinement to one of daring openness, of a release from their earlier interiority. Thus, from young adulthood to midlife, women have been found to become less traditionally 'feminine' but more dominant, independent, objective, and intellectually oriented. In many societies this figure of the older woman emerges as the woman of power who holds authority over the family and who can control healing, magic, witchcraft, and other powerful (and often dangerous) resources (Gutmann 1987, Rosaldo and Lamphere 1974).

4. Transforming Concepts of Mind and Gender

This review has shown that traditional concepts of rationality have implied a strong gender bias, one that has corresponded with the stereotyping of women as nonrational and more closely bound to nature and their bodies. Such a feminist critique ultimately does more than restore to women the claim to be rational, or to claim for them a unique form of knowing that is different from the rationality of men. Rather, the intricate association of traditional concepts of gender and rationality reveals that the very claim that women lack rationality is problematic, since it was on a narrow concept of rationality in the first place. Thus, the association of mind and gender indicates the need to reorganize the very meaning of 'rationality' in theories of mind and knowledge. A transformation of the concept of rationality is not just a feminist enterprise. Criticisms of traditional views of rationality have been a mainstay of the intellectual history of this century, which systematically has eroded beliefs in dualistic concepts of rationality (Baynes et al. 1987). The mind and knowledge are no longer believed to stand secure above nature and human foible. Instead, we are witnessing a growing belief that the dimensions of the mind and self that were abandoned in the classical view must in fact be included in a viable theory of mind and knowledge. Emotion and intuition, time and process, variability and disorder—all the elements previously devalued as feminine have taken a forefront place in philosophical discussions, and are being incorporated into new theories of the mind. Thus, reason also has an immanent pole and must be explained through the emotional propensities, cultural scenarios, linguistic practices, and narrative and symbolic structures of meaning.

Freud's (1925) original proposal that rational processes are built upon nonrational processes was one early voice warning that rationality ultimately must include a balance between our biological nature and our strivings for transcendent realities. It was he who pointed out the paradox that 'rationality,' when one-sided and unbalanced, in fact is a sign of the defensive break through of 'irrational' processes. However, Freud's very concept of 'irrational' processes still implied remnants of a dualistic and oppositional view, since it relegated these processes to a problematic status. Instead of such dualism, notions of balance and exchange have been carried forward into modern theories of the mind. In those theories, a tremendous part of knowledge is, in fact, based on processes that are profoundly adaptive, yet nonrational. Such theories follow Darwin's insight that biology provides the basis for the behavioral patterns—such as emotions—that are of the most urgent adaptive significance. More generally, we are realizing that an important contributor to knowledge are other non-rational decision systems or 'heuristics' that allow us to deal with information processing in situations where time and resources are limited (Gigerenzer et al. 1999, Labouvie-Vief 1994).

Sometimes the revaluation of the nonrational is taken as a dethroning and destructive critique of rationality. Instead, calling for a transformation of the concept of rationality implies that it merely constitutes one important pole or function of the mind. Thus body, nature, emotions, and concrete existence vs. mind, culture, reason, and necessary, deductive law no longer are considered in hierarchical terms. Instead, the mind becomes a cooperative interplay of these two sets of processes, rational and nonrational. Such dual processing theories of the mind are, in fact, proliferating and becoming the standard in theories of the mind (Chaiken and Torpe 1999, Gigerenzer et al. 1999, Labouvie-Vief 1994).

Such a reorganization of theories of the mind inevitably also involves a reexamination of the role of gender in the order of things. Indeed, such a reevaluation is visible in many strata of contemporary thought and life, visible not only philosophy and scientific theory, but also religion, literature, and art. These efforts allow us to acknowledge that rationality and non-rationality are processes of a mind that is, at last—and at least theoretically—part of nature and independent of gender.

See also: Androgyny; Child Care and Child Development; Deconstruction: Cultural Concerns; Feminist Economics; Feminist Epistemology; Feminist Ethics; Feminist Legal Theory; Feminist Theology; Feminist Theory; Feminist Theory and Women of Color; Feminist Theory: Ecofeminist and Cultural Feminist; Feminist Theory: Liberal; Feminist Theory: Marxist and Socialist; Feminist Theory: Postmodern; Feminist Theory: Psychoanalytic; Feminist Theory: Radical Lesbian; Foucault, Michel (1926–84); Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Youth; Gay/Lesbian Movements; Gender and School Learning; Mathematics and Science; Gender and the Law; Gender, Feminism, and Sexuality in Archaeological Studies; Gender-related

Development; Heterosexism and Homophobia; Homosexuality and Psychiatry; Irrationality: Philosophical Aspects; Lesbians: Historical Perspectives; Lesbians: Social and Economic Situation; Love and Intimacy, Psychology of; Mind–Body Dualism; Post-modernism: Philosophical Aspects; Queer Theory; Rationalism; Rationality in Society; Regulation: Sexual Behavior; Sex-role Development and Education; Sexual Behavior: Sociological Perspective; Sexual Orientation and the Law; Sexuality and Gender; Theory: Sociological; Transsexuality, Transvestism, and Transgender

Bibliography

- Baynes K, Bohman J, McCarthy T T (eds.) 1987 Philosophy: End or Transformation. MIT Press, Cambridge, MA
- de Beauvoir S 1952 The Second Sex. Knopf, New York
- Belenky M F, Clinchy B M, Goldberger N R, Tarule J M 1986 Women's Ways of Knowing. Basic Books, New York
- Bem S L 1993 The Lenses of Gender. Yale University Press, New Haven, CT
- Bernard J S 1987 The Female World from a Global Perspective. Indiana University Press, Bloomington, IN
- Bettelheim B 1962 Symbolic Wounds: Puberty Rites and the Envious Male (rev. edn.). Collier Books, New York
- Brown L M, Gilligan C 1992 Meeting at the Crossroads: Women's Psychology and Girls' Development. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Chaiken S, Trope Y (eds.) 1999 Dual-process Theories in Social Psychology. Guilford Press, New York
- Chodorow N 1978 The Reproduction of Mothering. University of California Press, Berkeley, CA
- Duby G, Perrot M (eds.) 1992/94 A History of Women in the West, Vols. 1–4. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
- Linn M C, Hyde J S 1989 Gender, Mathematics, and Science. Educational Researcher 18(8): 17–27
- Freud S 1925 Some psychological consequences of the anatomical differences between the sexes. In: Rieff P (ed.) 1963 Sexuality and the Psychology of Love. Macmillan, New York pp. 183–93
- Gigerenzer G, Todd P M, ABC Research Group 1999 Simple Heuristics that Make Us Smart. Oxford University Press, New York
- Gilmore D D 1990 Manhood in the Making: Cultural Concepts of Masculinity. Yale University Press, New Haven, CT
- Gutmann D 1987 Reclaimed Powers: Toward a New Psychology of Men and Women in Later Life. Basic Books, New York
- Herd G H, Stoller R J 1990 Intimate Communications: Erotics and the Study of Culture. Columbia University Press, New York
- Labouvie-Vief G 1994 Psyche and Eros: Mind and Gender in the Life Course. Cambridge University Press, New York
- Lerner G 1986 The Creation of Patriarchy. Oxford University Press, New York
- Lloyd G 1993 The Man of Reason: 'Male' and 'Female' in Western Philosophy 2nd edn. University of Minnesota Press, Minneapolis, MN
- Ortner S B, Whitehead H (eds.) 1981 Sexual Meanings: The Cultural Construction of Gender and Sexuality. Cambridge University Press, New York

- Rosaldo M Z, Lamphere L 1974 Women Culture and Society. Stanford University Press, Stanford, CA
- Schott R M (ed.) 1997 Feminist Interpretations of Immanuel Kant. Pennsylvania State University Press, University Park, PA

G. Labouvie-Vief

Rationality in Society

Human behavior is rational when appropriate to its goals. The brain provides the biological foundation for human rationality; it accepts sensory stimuli from both the natural and social environments and stores knowledge, beliefs, and values that guide the thought processes leading to action. This article focuses upon the social environment of human rationality.

Rationality has been an object of scholarly analysis since Greek times, but largely as part of ethics, in its concern with goals, sound reasoning and logic. Empirical study of human rational behavior is mostly quite recent, although we find such significant precursors as Machiavelli. Even Adam Smith provides no explicit theory of rationality in his Wealth of Nations, and such theories begin to appear only in the nineteenth century (e.g., Cournot 1838), initially in economics and, much later, in sociology (Parsons 1937, see also Action, Theories of Social). In the twentieth century, utility theory took shape in economics, while more realistic but less formal theories of rationality developed in the other social sciences.

1. Theories of Rationality

The social context molds behavior in three main ways. First, it largely determines what actions are available. Second, choice must try to anticipate the reactions of others to contemplated actions. Third, people's society is the major source and shaper of the knowledge, skills, and goals they use in choosing actions.

Hence, although a large part of today's understanding of rationality derives from psychological experiments with individuals, most of the contents of individuals' knowledge and beliefs, and their cognitive processes derive from social sources. Moreover, experimental stimuli themselves often are stated in language that has rich social content. Thus, even 'individual' psychology is the study of highly socialized beings (Simon 1992). The entrepreneur and consumer of economics, the voter and legislator of political science, the husband and delinquent, and soldier of sociology and anthropology are deeply social.

1.1 The Rationality of Experts

Cognitive psychology has acquired substantial knowledge about the decision-making of experts and novices in such professional domains as medical diagnosis, chess-playing, and scientific discovery, and has successfully simulated these behaviors on computers (Anderson 1999, Newell and Simon 1962, Shrager and Langley 1990; see also Expert Memory, Psychology of; Scientific Reasoning and Discovery, Cognitive Psychology of; Chess Expertise, Cognitive Psychology of; Medical Expertise, Cognitive Psychology of). Within the professional domain, an expert employs two main procedures: (a) recognizing familiar situations and patterns that give access to knowledge in memory about handling these situations; and (b) searching selectively for satisfactory problem solutions, guided by learned rules of thumb, or heuristics. The same procedures are used to find better problem definitions and representations, instruments and tools for observing or reasoning, experimental designs, and search strategies. They even account for the problem solving that is called 'intuitive,' 'insightful,' or 'creative.'

1.2 Rationality as Utility Maximization

Utility maximization, the best developed formal theory of rationality, which forms the core of neoclassical economics, does not refer to the social context of action (see also Decision Theory: Classical). It postulates a utility function, which measures the degree to which an individual's (aggregate) goals are achieved as a result of their actions. The rational actor chooses the action, from among those given, which maximizes utility. If the actor's goals are food and sleep, then rationality calls for choosing the attainable combination of food and sleep that yields the greatest utility. The core theory does not specify the content of the utility function (Simon 1983).

Without a concrete meaning for utility, the theory has few refutable consequences; its relevance to real situations depends mainly on adding auxiliary assumptions. This is not wholly true, for the theory does assume constancy of the utility function over sequences of choices. Many experiments have shown that this implication is testable—and frequently false (Tversky and Kahneman 1974). Human actors often make sequences of choices that are incompatible with any consistent utility function.

In order to predict more than consistency in any particular situation, additional strong assumptions must be added. Economic applications usually add the vastly oversimplified assumption that utility is measured by total income or wealth, which, in turn, may be expressed in terms of goods possessed. Additional assumptions introduce markets, in which goods can be exchanged (for each other or for money), and firms, which consume goods to produce other goods.

Without auxiliary assumptions, the theory is also silent about the range of available alternatives and the processes used to find the optimal action. It says nothing about how to select auxiliary assumptions, or what empirical support they should require. As a result, assumptions are often introduced in order to preserve or enhance mathematical tractability.

To produce an empirically sound theory, a much richer set of empirically based auxiliary assumptions must be provided, to take account of the actual limits on human thinking, and the influences of its social context (Green and Shapiro 1994).

1.3 Forms of Rationality

An action may be regarded as rational because of the way it was chosen (procedural rationality), or because of its outcomes (substantive rationality) (see also Decision Research: Behavioral; Bounded Rationality; Decision and Choice: Economic Psychology; Heuristics for Decision and Choice).

Attributions of rationality may or may not respect the limits of actors' abilities to adapt actions to goals. Utility-maximizing behavior, as discussed previously, selects an action that is among those objectively available, attains a real-world optimum, and is of a comprehensive function of wants and needs (utility function).

As an alternative, bounded rational behavior selects some action among those that memory, observation, and thought bring to attention. It is aimed at attaining outcomes that satisfy (attain aspirations) for the wants and needs that have been evoked (Conlisk 1996). The expert behavior described in Sect. 1.1 is an example of bounded rationality.

There is a close affinity between optimizing and substantive rationality, and an affinity between bounded and procedural rationality. The utility-maximizing optimum is independent of the choice process; the outcome is all that counts. In bounded rationality, the choice depends upon the process leading up to it. The social sciences, other than neoclassical economics, usually explicitly incorporate human cognitive limitations and social influences into their theories, using some version (seldom highly formalized) of bounded rationality. Bounded and procedural rationality require generating courses of action, assessing their possible outcomes under different futures and estimating how much satisfaction they will attain. They postulate procedures that respect human limits on knowledge of present and future, on abilities to calculate the implications of knowledge, and on abilities to evoke relevant goals (Simon 1983).

1.4 Habits, Emotion, and Motivation

Although dictionaries often define rational action narrowly, as the action chosen by reasoning, numerous actions that are rational (i.e., appropriate to goals) are taken without conscious deliberation or any deliberation at all. Rather, these rely on heredity responses, or prior knowledge and belief (e.g., see also Perception without Awareness, Psychology of Emotion in Cognition). Evolution has seen to it that eyes blink when something comes flying at them. Similarly, but as a result of learning and experience, when a car suddenly stops, the driver in the car behind applies brakes without deliberation. These goal-oriented, but unreflective actions make up much of the activity of everyday life, and greatly expand the capacity for (boundedly) rational response. Rationality is inextricably interwoven with emotion and motivation. Action is directed toward goals by such motivators as hunger, sexual drive, anger, fear, pride, and others. These are represented by the aspirations of bounded rationality. Evoked into consciousness, or activating 'automatic' responses, they provide the goals for rational choice. Additionally, cognitive processes cannot handle large quantities of information simultaneously. Deliberative and conscious thoughts have to pass through the narrow straits of short-term memory, which hold only a few symbols (approximately six), and can attend to only one thing at a time (or perhaps two or three, by alternation of attention over intervals of 1–2 seconds). Recent research using functional molecular resonance imaging to record neuronal activity has shown that even simple acts (reading a short sentence) employ a sequence of neural processes (see also Short-term Memory, Cognitive Psychology of Working Memory, Psychology of).

Because human beings must satisfy many drives, rationality fixes attention on particular goals, usually until these are satisfied, but shifts attention to other goals when they become more pressing. Interruption is triggered both by sensory processes, such as peripheral vision, and by emotions and inner drives, such as fear and hunger. So rationality, is not just a cognitive function, but depends on motivation and emotion to control attention.

2. Rationality in Social Context

The social context of action that plays such an enormous role in determining choices will now be examined more closely.

2.1 The Sources of Knowledge

Most of the knowledge that enters into either habitual responses or deliberate choice is received from other persons, beginning at birth. Direct experience of the nonhuman world contributes only a small fraction of what people know and believe. Language, a major tool of thought, is a social artifact (Simon 1992).

Of course, what people know is also strongly influenced by the natural environment, some of it sensed directly. Nonetheless, much of one's knowledge of this environment is acquired by social processes, not direct sensation; sensory stimuli are interpreted by social information. People believe that cholesterol is bad for them, but their belief derives from doctors, the media, and friends, not their own laboratory experiments. The same rains fall on humankind around the world, wetting anyone it strikes. It enters into each person's beliefs and knowledge in many ways, and social processes have created a wide range of different expedients for mitigating its discomforts and using its waters. The range of available actions and the criteria and procedures for choosing among them are largely circumscribed by the actions, criteria, and procedures discovered and propagated by each society.

2.2 The Social Sciences are Historical Sciences

Because of the social origin of knowledge, the social and behavioral sciences are, essentially, historical, for the behavior of each person changes with the enveloping society's states of belief and knowledge. Functionalism in anthropology and sociology has pointed out the common functions shared by all societies, but also the variety of ways in which these functions are performed in particular societies, depending on their values, beliefs, and knowledge.

Of course, dependence on history is not peculiar to the social sciences. Historical laws are found throughout natural science: in modern astrophysics, the Big Bang and its sequelae; in geology and oceanography, mountain formation and continental drift; evolutionary biology is wholly historical.

Today, the social sciences differ greatly in the extent to which their theories attend to history. Historical change in basic laws has played only a small role in utility-maximizing economic theory. The central theoretical structure in economics today, as in Adam Smith's day, is an idealized set of markets with vestigial business firms (each characterized by a production function). Perhaps these roughly match Adam Smith's world, but they are a far cry from the economy of large international business corporations throughout today's world; and this model does not explain the growth (or even the possibility) of these large organizations.

On recognizing its historical dependence, a science must reexamine the meaning of natural law. It must seek to find invariant underlying relations that account for continuing change as well as equilibrium in dynamic systems. In the social sciences, temporal structural change is still absent from most formal theory.

2.3 Social Determinants of Motives

Social modification of motives and actions is usually dealt with in contemporary social science by introducing evolutionary mechanisms (Nelson and Winter 1982). In most current versions of Darwinism, the sole effective motive is to increase fitness (essentially rate of population growth); altruism will not compete. This has often been interpreted as implying that only selfish human motives survive, and that, consequently, maximization of utility means maximization of income or wealth, profit of the business firm, or power (the latter in Public Choice Theory in political science and sociology). In this view, only the special genetics of ants and bees, and some other social insects, allow nonpropagating offspring to exhibit altruism to close kin.

However, it has been shown (Simon 1997) that, in the presence of bounded rationality, altruism may increase the fitness of altruists, and, hence, may survive and grow within a society. If bounded rationality admits a large capability for social learning, persons willing and able to learn (docile), will have a large fitness advantage over others. By natural selection the society will help individuals acquire knowledge and beliefs that usually enhance their individual fitness, but are sometimes advantageous to the society's fitness at the individual's expense (e.g., volunteering for military service). As long as social influence, on balance, increases individual fitness, altruism can also thrive, contributing to the fitness and growth of the society (see also Altruism and Self-interest).

2.4 Altruism and Group Identification

Perhaps the most important human expression of altruism is identification with, and loyalty to, groups ranging from the family, through ethnic or religious groups, to whole societies or nations. Group identification is a major determinant both of goals (defining the 'we') and of knowledge and beliefs, for both are formed in the groups that people associate with in work and leisure. Identification is the primary basis for the intense within-group collaboration and between-group conflict that is an enduring characteristic of human interaction. It is also one of the bases for the ability of large organizations to coordinate human efforts efficiently (see also Identity: Social).

2.5 Organizations

In a modern society, formal work organizations—companies, government agencies, schools—provide environments for a large fraction of human waking hours (Simon 1997). This has presumably come about because organizations can, through appropriate specialization and coordination of activities, enormously increase individual productivity. Effective specialization requires dividing up activities in such a way that each specialty calls on only a small part of the knowledge and skill that is required for the whole, and each component is mainly concerned with the initial inputs and final outputs of the others, and need not be involved with their internal processes.

At the same time, it is rarely possible to obtain complete independence among components, so that some provision, often involving the exercise of authority, must be made for securing coordination where it is required (the axles that one department makes must fit the wheels made by another). The theory of organizations, in business and public administration, is concerned with the architectural arrangements that secure a good balance of specialization and coordination, and the means of using authority, organizational identification and rewards to secure acceptance of the structure by those who inhabit it. Because of the difficulty of measuring the precise contributions of individuals' work efforts to an organization's product and success, economic incentives cannot account for the high level of support for organization goals that is often observed (for example, in the behavior of employees who do not share in profits or bonuses). Much of this support can be attributed to organizational identification, and it is one of the novelties of the modern world (with perhaps some precedents in armies, even of the distant past) that strong loyalties can be evoked by formal organizations as well as by more traditional social groups. Human attachment to organizational goals has been a major force in converting the market economy of Adam Smith's time into the very different organizations-cum-markets society of the present (Simon 1997).

Recent developments in the formal theory of complex organizations also suggest that a delicate balance between specialization and coordination is essential if large systems are to innovate and continue to evolve successfully. Excessive need for coordination prevents one unit from evolving without damaging the efficiency of others; excessive independence of components limits the sophistication of the products of the whole organization.

2.6 Social Structure

Although more nebulous than formal organizations, the framework of laws and customs of a whole society also provides an important object of identification for members, and in particular a stable cognitive framework within which a creature of bounded rationality can operate with some probability of predicting correctly the consequences of action. An important component of the structure of most societies is a system of markets and social practices that maintain them. Every modern industrial society is a composite system of organizations-cum-markets, where the markets permit a considerable degree of decentralization and independence of action of the individual organizations. The division of labor in the social sciences between organization theorists, on the one hand and economists on the other has left something of a lacuna in our understanding of the interactions between these two prominent kinds of social structure.

2.7 Mutual Expectations: Game Theory

What concept of rationality suits situations where several or many actors have competitive but highly interdependent goals? Cournot raised the problem in 1838 of two or more firms competing in an imperfectly competitive market, and threatening market instability by trying to outguess each other. Although von Neumann and Morgenstern (1944), in their Theory of Games and Evolution, proposed a solution to the problem, they defined rationality in a rather implausible way that did not guarantee unique choices or equilibria (Aumann and Sergiu 1992). Although their work has had a large impact, especially in economics and international relations theory, its most important result has been to show the near-impossibility of framing a univocal 'logical' definition of rationality in conditions of mutual uncertainty and interdependence. The ambiguities can sometimes be resolved by retreating from utility maximizing to bounded rationality, and by determining empirically which of their many options humans in fact employ in these situations (Axelrod 1980).

Political revolutions provide excellent demonstrations of the importance of stability of mutual expectations to the operation of a society. Revolutions dissolve expectations about what reactions actions will evoke from opposing groups. This 'gaseous' dissolution of social structure is ultimately reversed by the ascendance to power of new groups with internal identifications strong enough to remove the uncertainties (see also Revolutions, Sociology of).

3. Conclusion

Today, considerable effort is going into reexamining the concept of rationality, questioning the assumptions of utility maximization theory and seeking foundations for an empirically grounded theory of bounded rationality that gives proper attention to the social environment of choice. There is considerable new experimental work, particularly experiments with markets and games where 'outguessing' is important, but much more empirical study, in the field as well as the laboratory, will be needed to arrive at a theory that takes full account of the limits on human cognitive capabilities, and the social context which informs human reasoning.

Bibliography

- Anderson J R 1999 Cognitive Psychology and its Implications, 5th edn. WH Freeman, New York
 Aumann R J, Sergiu H (eds.) 1992 Handbook of Game Theory. North-Holland, Amsterdam
 Axelrod R 1980 The Evolution of Cooperation. Basic Books, New York
 Conlisk J 1996 Why bounded rationality? Journal of Economic Literature 34: 669–700

- Cournot A 1838 Researches into the Mathematical Principles of the Theory of Wealth. Reprinted 1960, Augustus M. Kelley, New York
 Green D P, Shapiro I 1994 Pathologies of Rational Choice Theory. Yale University Press, New Haven, CT
 Nelson R R, Winter S G 1982 Evolutionary Theory of Economic Change. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, MA
 Newell A, Simon H A 1962 Human Problem Solving. Prentice-Hall, Englewood Cliffs, NJ
 Parsons T 1937 The Structure of Social Action. McGraw-Hill, New York
 Rapoport A, Chammah A M 1965 Prisoner's Dilemma. University of Michigan Press, Ann Arbor, MI
 Shrager J, Langley P 1990 Computer Models of Scientific Discovery. Morgan Kaufman, San Mateo, CA
 Simon H A 1947 Administrative Behavior, 4th edn. The Free Press, New York
 Simon H A 1983 Reason in Human Affairs. Stanford University Press, Stanford, CA
 Simon H A 1992 What is an 'explanation' of behavior? Psychological Science 3: 150–161
 Simon H A 1997 Models of Bounded Rationality Vol 3: Empirically Grounded Economic Reason. MIT Press, Cambridge, MA
 Tversky A, Kahnemann D 1974 Judgment under uncertainty: heuristics and biases. Science 185: 1124–31 von Neumann J, Morgenstern O 1944 The Theory of Games and Economic Behavior. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ

H. A. Simon

Reactance, Psychology of

The theory of psychological reactance (Brehm 1966) pertains to the reactive human tendency to protect or defend threatened freedoms. Unlike most conceptions about motivation, reactance theory does not speak of the human as arriving at a particular goal, achieving clarity in ambiguous stimulus fields, reducing conflict, or preserving self-worth. On the contrary, the reactance process is one of remaining open, of preserving one's freedom of movement, in the face of pressures to firm up or narrow the direction of movement.

1. Freedom: The Starting Point

The theory can best be introduced by considering single behavior realms in which freedom for the individual is conceivable. For instance, while shopping a person expects the freedom to choose from a vast array of breakfast cereals or brands of coffee. In more important matters, the person has a choice among numerous kinds of automobiles. In commerce with others, the person can potentially choose between being overtly friendly vs. taking a more distanced stance toward others. Even in such affective realms as emotions there is the potential—as in a setting that would normally set off sadness or grief—to react appropriately or to begin laughing.

In short, the theory addresses the freedoms associated with segments of human existence. These usually entail concrete behavioral scenarios in which a decision is eventually possible, or in which the person senses that several different solutions or directions can be chosen or tried out. In the context of the theory one does not speak of 'the free person' vs. 'the unfree person.' Freedom here is defined by the concrete endeavor of interest, such as finding oneself in a coffee bar and having to choose between espresso and normal coffee.

By no means does the theory assure that people automatically feel free across all such settings. On the contrary, Brehm (1966, 1968, 1993) postulates that, in each behavioral setting, the person will have a strong (or less strong, ranging down to zero) sense of freedom as a function of one of two factors. (a) Prior experience in the setting will be a guide as to expectations of freedom, as in, for instance, the case of a child who has always been entrusted with the freedom to select any of the breakfast cereals in the grocery store. This case may be contrasted with the child who has always been instructed to pick only the one brand of cereal that contains no sugar, preservatives, or coloring. (b) The other factor underlying the person's sense of being free, or less free, in a particular setting has to do with culturally-defined expectations. For example, pedestrians may (or may not) expect the freedom to cross against the red light, depending on local customs.

In practice, this all-important starting point for the theory—the person's expecting to be free or not—has been handled in an experimental manner. In some studies research subjects are told that they can expect to select freely from among several available consumer alternatives. For other participants, the expectation is created that they will receive one or more of the consumer items on a random basis, or at the whim of the person who controls the situation. People in this latter case thus find themselves expecting to gain something, such as a CD, pen, or article of clothing, but there is no person-freedom associated with their gaining that end.

With this illustration the reader can see that the theory is highly specific in its treatment of freedom, choice, and the free person. Setting-by-setting, individuals expect to be able to move about and choose freely, or not. One child expects to choose freely among cereals; another does not. Students in one culture might expect to choose which textbook to read for an exam; students in another culture may have no such expectation.

2. Reactance Arousal

Given that a person expects freedom of movement in a setting, infringements on that freedom will instigate a motivational force of reactance. The state of reactance, going into gear as a function of the strength of threat to freedom and the importance of the freedom, brings the person to resist and counter the shrinking of the pertinent freedom. This is manifested in a direct behavioral fashion and also in terms of affective reactions.

Take the instance of the child who expects freedom of choice among breakfast cereals. If the child is standing before the array of breakfast products, pondering what to choose, reactance will come about by another person's picking a box of cornflakes from the top shelf and dropping it into the child's grocery basket. This unequivocal social influence will set up reactance in the child, resulting in the tendency to remove the cornflakes from the basket and to select a different variety. Further, the motivational state will show up in terms of affective changes; as an outcome of the social interference with freedom, the child will become relatively unattracted to the cornflakes and increasingly attracted to other salient, interesting brands.

3. Frustration

Reactance is not about attaining the goal that is top-ranked in the person's need or preference hierarchy. If the child had initially ranked Swiss muesli as No. 1, and cornflakes as No. 4, then the adult's placing the cornflakes in the child's grocery basket would have been directly frustrating. Perhaps obviously, the child would have reacted negatively to the frustration of a simple need to select the top-ranked item. However, the deciding quality of reactance theory is in its addressing freedom per se, and not the issue of the person's attaining the most-preferred goal object. The implications of this statement are far reaching; as long as the child's freedom to choose any of the considered alternatives is interfered with, reactance will be engendered. Quite aside from whether the muesli is No. 1 and the cornflakes No. 4, or vice versa, the adult's constraining the choice will produce reactance and the consequent behavioral/affective effects.

The point regarding frustration is similar when reactance is brought about in areas such as freedom of values, attitudes, or emotions. There is a sense in which it is frustrating to be pressured to take a certain opinion position, particularly one at variance with one's usual opinions. When a member of the American Civil Liberties Union is confronted with others who authoritatively argue in favor of restricting certain rights, the felt pressure to succumb to such pressure toward change is in a sense frustrating. But for reactance theory, the actual direction of such social pressure is not a terribly critical factor. If the member of the ACLU feels free to hold any of several positions along the human rights continuum, then this person will also experience reactance when a forceful communicator insists that the only correct opinion is a totally liberal one. Reactance, in the case of pressure to change an opinion, value, or emotion, is manifested in terms of 'boomerang' effects, i.e. switching the opinion to a direction opposing the communication.

4. Areas of Application

Given the breadth of the theory, it seems reasonable that it should be applied to such diverse realms as choices among products, among people (e.g., choosing a partner), and to numerous social realms such as whether or not to help another person and whether or not to abide by another's advice or efforts to influence. The research evidence addressing these topics is largely experimental, and follows the formula given by the theory. First the investigator must know whether or not the person to be studied expects freedom of choice in the given context, and second, the strength of the threat to that freedom is varied. Within these general methodological guidelines, research participants have been shown to resist persuasive attempts, refuse to help, and frequently to upgrade their attraction to potential choice objects or people whose availability has been threatened. Reviews of these many effects can be found in Brehm (1966, 1968, 1993), Brehm and Brehm (1981), Wicklund (1974, 1997), and Wortman and Brehm (1975).

5. The Longer-range Dynamics

These dynamics can best be depicted in three phases, with the assistance of an expanded theory by Wortman and Brehm (1975). The first two phases, as described above, are (a) the instigation of an expectation of acting freely in a domain, and (b) infringements on that freedom, producing reactance. The issue raised by Wortman and Brehm—implying a third phase—has to do with the effect of repeated restrictions on freedom. A person may be accustomed to choosing freely between espresso and normal coffee in a certain coffee bar. When the management announces one day that normal coffee is not available, the reactance-produced response is one of increased attraction to normal coffee and a corresponding downgrading of espresso. But what transpires upon repeated, continued instances of this restriction? Will the person continue to express reactance on the second, third, fourth, and fifth days of the freedom restriction?

In alternative theoretical language, such repeated restrictions are called helplessness inducing (Seligman 1975), and in the Wortman and Brehm model, the idea is that repeated violation of the freedom will eventually bring the person to no longer expect freedom of action within that domain, as in the particular coffee shop. The expectation of free choice is altered into the expectation of espresso, and nothing more. This adaptation to the repeated restriction is thus the third phase of the longer-term reactance process, and as such, describes the ebb and flow of reactance in numerous situations over the course of a child's development, as well as the ebb and flow of reactance in diverse areas as a result of cultural change.

6. Individual Differences

Brehm (1993) differentiates sharply between the chronic need to expand areas of freedom and control, and the defense of a specific area of freedom or control. The former, normally associated with such concepts as control need or competence striving, addresses a human who is, across time and place, chronically interested in enlarging the scope of freedom, thus in maximizing personal control in a general sense. Such a chronic personal striving can be operationalized in terms of certain individual differences, such as Rotter's Internal/external control scale and, to be sure, researchers have introduced these very individual differences into a variety of reactance paradigms. The research suggests that those with a high chronic need for control appear to evidence stronger responses in reactance-creating situations (see Brehm and Brehm 1981).

On the other hand, there is little theoretical reason to expect that general human tendencies will be pertinent to the reactance process as described in detail in the numerous experiments. This is because the question of whether a person will evidence the counter-behaviors, the boomerang effect attitude changes, and other freedom-restoring maneuvers, is a highly concrete issue. The parameters of each behavioral scenario, combined with the individual's expectation of freedom within those confines, determines the momentary predilection to protect and regain freedom.

7. Future Directions

A salient direction to take in future development of the theory involves the social circumstances which give rise to expectations of freedom. While the original theory refers to such expectations as stemming from (a) direct, personal experience and (b) societal conventions regarding specific classes of actions, there is a further possibility: a person who is raised in a community in which a variety of points of view are acknowledged will stand to gain a sense of freedom to express those many points of view. This should apply no matter whether they are expressed in discussions of opinions and values, or even in solutions to problems. In contrast, a person coming from an environment in which there is 'one correct opinion,' or solution, will be less likely to incorporate the idea that multiple opinions or solutions are possible or desirable (Wicklund 1999). Accordingly, we may be able to speak of a person's more general sense of freedom of opinions and values, as long as the person's socialization experiences are in a setting that fosters such multiple values systems, or even multiple personality traits. The direction for corresponding research lies both in developmental psychology and in the detailed descriptions of cultural settings allowed by cultural anthropology.

See also: Control Behavior: Psychological Perspectives; Control: Social; Freedom/Liberty: Impact on the Social Sciences

Bibliography

- Brehm J W 1966 A Theory of Psychological Reactance. Academic Press, New York
- Brehm J W 1968 Attitude change from threat to attitudinal freedom. In: Greenwald A G, Brock T C, Ostrom T M (eds.) Psychological Foundations of Attitudes. Academic Press, New York
- Brehm J W 1993 Control, its loss, and psychological reactance. In: Weary G, Gleicher F, Marsh K L (eds.) Control Motivation and Social Cognition. Springer, New York, pp. 3–30
- Brehm S S, Brehm J W 1981 Psychological Reactance: A Theory of Freedom and Control. Academic Press, New York
- Seligman M E P 1975 Helplessness: On Depression, Development, and Death. Freeman, San Francisco
- Wicklund R A 1974 Freedom and Reactance. Erlbaum, Hillsdale, NJ
- Wicklund R A 1997 The theory of psychological reactance: a reliably revolutionary perspective. Contemporary Psychology 42: 679–81
- Wicklund R A 1999 Multiple perspectives in person perception. Theory and Psychology 9: 667–78
- Wortman C B, Brehm J W 1975 Responses to uncontrollable outcomes: An integration of reactance theory and the learned helplessness model. In: Berkowitz L (ed.) Advances in Experimental Social Psychology. Academic Press, New York, Vol. 8, pp. 277–336

R. A. Wicklund

Readability, Applied Psychology of Almost since the beginning of research into the process of text comprehension, researchers and educators have attempted to find accurate, meaningful, and simple methods to assess readability. Early researchers such as Quantz, Cattell, Huey, and Dearborn—most of their research was performed around the turn of the twentieth century—focused on differences among readers' abilities, offering what might now be considered 'process models,' albeit simple ones. The factors they studied, however, were more perceptual in nature, such as the effects of saccadic eye movements and eye-voice spans in reading aloud. Despite some important insights, their work waned in influence during the period from 1910 until 1970, or so. Not coincidentally, this decline in the interest of process models mirrored the rise in influence of behaviorism in American psychology. Behaviorists tended to focus on observable, easily measured factors. Reading researchers directed their attention to properties of the texts, rather than how a text might induce changes in the processing of the text by the reader.

During the middle portion of the twentieth century, the first readability formulas were developed. Consistent with the underlying philosophy of behaviorism, these formulas considered readability to be a property of the stimulus—that is, the text itself. Most of the commonly used readability formulas, such as the Gunning Fog index and the Flesch Readability scales, were developed during this time.

The so-called cognitive revolution of the 1960s renewed interest in natural language. In the last 25 years, especially, the psychological process of language comprehension has received considerable attention. A number of wide-reaching theories of text comprehension have been developed (Gernsbacher 1990, Just and Carpenter 1980, Kintsch 1988, Kintsch and van Dijk 1978). These models do not assume the text to be a static entity; instead, they emphasize the process of reading, or more specifically, the interaction between the text and the reader. Ironically, contemporary researchers have essentially returned to the same philosophical positions that drove researchers such as Huey and Dearborn a century before.

1. Early Readability Research

The challenge facing educational psychologists in the 1930s and 1940s was rather pragmatic, and is still one of the goals of contemporary researchers and educators: to evaluate and compare readability of texts used in a variety of school settings. In theory, this would allow teachers to select age- (or ability-) appropriate materials for use in the classroom. In addition, educators were looking for a way to assess the readability of various books students might read on their own.

Understandably, these formulas tended to follow from behaviorally oriented research: identify the objective (although generally superficial), easily measured properties in the stimuli—the texts. Early work tended to focus primarily on such simple ideas as vocabulary difficulty, word frequency, and sentence length (e.g., Gray and Leary 1935). It is important to note that the question of why these variables were related to readability was considered largely irrelevant. An understanding that sentence length was important because it provided an estimate of the demands placed on working memory was decades away.

Within a few years, readability formulas were developed that could be applied virtually to any text (Dale and Chall 1948a, 1948b, Flesch 1948, Klare 1963, 1974/5, 1984, Vogel and Washburne 1928).

Though each of these differed in some respect, in truth they were remarkably similar. Most of these scales used some combination of word length (presumably related to word frequency or word difficulty), number of sentences per paragraph (a crude measure of complexity), sentence length, and/or number of syllables per word. They soon became widely adopted in academic, educational, and other applied settings. Standardized testing procedures also made wide use of these formulas. Some governmental agencies even specified readability levels for things such as insurance policies; in order to be 'approved,' for example, an insurance policy must have a readability grade level of 9 or below.

Despite the sophistication of contemporary reading research, most of the readability formulas in wide use today continue to use the same key variables. For example, recent versions of Microsoft Word provide an assessment of readability using the Flesch Reading Ease scale, as well as a normed score using the Flesch-Kincaid Grade Level scale (which scales readability relative to US public school grade levels). Cassady and Greene's program Grammarians also provides an assessment of readability using the Gunning Fog index. (The Gunning Fog index uses the number of 'long words': those of three or more syllables.) These formulas are somewhat successful, at least to a point, and provide a reference from which texts can be compared.

Perhaps such widespread use of these simple formulas is not warranted. After all, these formulas analyze only a few variables, and cases where the formulas fail are abundant. However, the limitations of the formulas (the fact that they analyzed only a few components) were also their most attractive feature—they were easy to use. Thus, these criticisms, even when recognized by the researchers, have not attenuated the popularity of readability formulas.

Do revisions intended to improve the readability of a text actually produce more easily understood texts? One of the most thorough investigations in rewriting and readability was performed by Britton and Gulgoz (1991). They used a text of roughly a thousand words long, detailing the success and failure of the air bombing 'Operation Rolling Thunder' offensive in the Vietnam war (Greene 1985). They compared the original text (which had a grade level equivalent of about 13.5 years, as measured by the Flesch-Kincaid Index) to one of three revisions: a readability revision, which used shorter sentences and more frequently used words, improving the readability level to 12 years; a principle revision, which modified the text according to the comprehension model of Kintsch and van Dijk (1978) and had a readability level the same as the original text (13.5 years); and a heuristic revision, performed by an expert in text revision (Britton himself), designed to make the text as understandable as possible. The reading level of the latter version was lowered to grade 12. The only revision which actually improved comprehension was this final revision. Lowering the readability score itself produced no significant improvement—simply using shorter sentences and more frequent words was not sufficient to make a text more understandable.

Improving readability has one other benefit—texts written at a level consistent with a reader's ability are monitored more accurately while reading. Simply put, comprehension monitoring refers to the accuracy with which individuals can assess their comprehension. After reading a passage, individuals are asked to predict later performance on a test. The correlation between predicted and actual performance provides a measure of comprehension monitoring accuracy.

Weaver and Bryant (1995) examined the effect of readability on comprehension monitoring. They had college students read texts that were either easy (reading level below grade 8), standard (reading level around grade 12), or difficult (reading level around grade 16). Comprehension performance was related to readability: recognition performance increased as reading material became easier (more readable). Comprehension monitoring, in contrast, showed an inverted U-shaped function. The greatest metamemory accuracy occurred not for the easiest materials, but for those materials best matching the readers' ability (standard readability, approximately 12th grade).

2. Summary

The theoretical case against readability formulas has been argued many times (e.g., from the present perspective by Kintsch and Vipond 1979). Their merits are clear, and center on their ease of use. But the drawbacks are equally clear. At best these formulas provide an oversimplification, too often a serious distortion. Nevertheless, they continue to be used, and will be as long as comprehension research does not provide viable alternatives.

Great progress into the reading process has been made in the past 30 years. But why have these advances not led to the development of viable alternatives to readability formulas?

The answer to this question has three parts. First of all, most of the research discussed above has dealt with the construction of internal representations, often called textbases. A great deal is now known about how to construct comprehensible, recallable, and summarizable texts for given populations. However, while this knowledge is quite adequate for laboratory research on discourse processing, simple, easy-to-use procedures for practical applications have not yet been developed.

The second part of the answer involves a fundamental change in the nature of readability. Readability has typically been considered as a property of the text alone. Clearly, true readability is more complicated than that and is probably best considered as an interaction between the text itself and the readers' ability and knowledge. Unfortunately, a simple readability formula incorporating readers' abilities has yet to be developed.

The final part of the answer is purely pragmatic. When using a text in an experiment—often a relatively brief text—it does not matter whether the procedures for text analysis are time-consuming, require expertise, and so on. For the applied settings in which most readability formulas are used, though, ease of use matters a great deal. What is needed is a large-scale effort directed toward the development of practical methods of text analysis that allow non-experts to do with relatively little effort what only experts can do today with considerable effort. While such an enterprise would be nontrivial, it is certainly feasible. For the moment, however, readability measures have little connection to the cognitive science research on text comprehension.

In light of this fact, Bruce et al. (1981; see also Weaver and Kintsch 1991) have proposed that readability formulas be used only when the following criteria are met:

(a) The material will be freely read, and reading time will not be determined by 'external factors' such as experimental control or (in their example) captions that are presented along with television programs (for the hearing impaired).

(b) The text is 'honestly written': that is, not directly written in such a way to satisfy the criteria of readability formulas.

(c) The higher-level features of a text, such as organization and intention, correlate with the sentence and word features. As current formulas make little use of the top-level information, such material is otherwise ignored.

(d) The purpose of the reading is similar to that of the readers in the validation studies. If the two groups are reading with different strategies, then the formula may not be valid across the situations.

(e) The formulas are applied across a large number of texts, and individual texts are not singled out. Bruce et al. (1981) emphasize that readability scores are composite averages and may not apply to specific texts.

(f) The population of readers is the same in the 'real-world' setting as it was in the validation studies. If a text is to be used as a remedial text, it should not be validated on a group of average readers.

See also: Comprehension, Cognitive Psychology of; Eye Movements in Reading; Inferences in Discourse, Psychology of; Knowledge Activation in Text Comprehension and Problem Solving, Psychology of; Learning from Text; Literary Texts: Comprehension and Memory; Macrostructure in Discourse Comprehension, Psychology of; Memory for Text; Narrative Comprehension, Psychology of; Reading,

Neural Basis of; Reading Skills; Sentence Comprehension, Psychology of; Speed Reading; Text Comprehension: Models in Psychology; Textbooks

Bibliography

- Britton B K, Gulgoz S 1991 Using Kintsch's computational model to improve instructional text: Effects of repairing inference calls on recall and cognitive structures. Journal of Educational Psychology 83: 329–45
- Bruce B, Rubin A, Starr K 1981 Why Readability Formulas Fail. Center for the Study of Reading, Champaign, IL
- Dale E, Chall J S 1948a A formula for predicting readability. Educational Research Bulletin 27(January): 11–12
- Dale E, Chall J S 1948b A formula for predicting readability. Educational Research Bulletin 27(February): 37–54
- Flesch R F 1948 A new readability yardstick. Journal of Applied Psychology 32: 221–33
- Gernsbacher M A 1990 Language Comprehension as Structure Building. Erlbaum, Hillsdale, NJ
- Gray W S, Leary B E 1935 What Makes a Book Readable? University of Chicago Press, Chicago
- Greene M P 1985 US Air Power: Key to Deterrence. Maxwell Air Force Base
- Just M A, Carpenter P A 1980 A theory of reading: From eye fixations to comprehension. Psychological Review 87: 329–54
- Kintsch W 1988 The role of knowledge in discourse comprehension: A constructive-integration model. Psychological Review 95: 163–82
- Kintsch W, van Dijk T A 1978 Toward a model of text comprehension and production. Psychological Review 85: 363–94
- Kintsch W, Vipond D 1979 Reading comprehension and readability in educational practice and psychological theory. In: Nilsson L G (ed.) Perspectives on Memory Research. L. Erlbaum Associates, Hillsdale, NJ, pp. 329–65
- Klare G R 1963 The Measurement of Readability. Iowa State University Press, Ames, IA
- Klare G R 1974/5 Assessing readability. Reading Research Quarterly 10: 62–102
- Klare G R 1976 A second look at the validity of readability formulas. Journal of Reading Behavior 8: 129–52
- Klare G R 1984 Readability. In: Pearson P D, Barr R, Kamil M L, Mosenthal P (eds.) Handbook of Reading Research. Vol. I. Longman, New York, pp. 681–744
- Vogel M, Washburne C 1928 An objective method of determining grade placement of children's reading material. Elementary School Journal 28
- Weaver C A III, Bryant D S 1995 Monitoring of comprehension: The role of text difficulty in metamemory for narrative and expository text. Memory & Cognition 23: 12–22
- Weaver C A, III, Kintsch W 1991 Expository text. In: Barr R, Kamil M, Mosenthal P, Pearson P D (eds.) The Handbook of Reading Research. Longman, White Plains, NY, Vol. 2, pp. 230–45

C. A. Weaver, III and A. Renken

Reading, Neural Basis of

Psychologists and brain researchers who investigate reading usually focus on the basic cognitive processes and brain regions that are necessary to recognize and pronounce a printed word. More complex aspects of reading, such as the ability to understand the grammatical roles played by each word in a written or spoken sentence, typically are assumed to rely upon general language functions that are not specific to reading (see Syntactic Aspects of Language, Neural Basis of). This chapter will focus on three components of skilled reading, and the brain regions that support them: a) the representation of visual word forms (orthography), b) the use of orthographic information to access information about word sounds (phonology), and c) the use of orthographic information to access information about meaning (semantics).

Claims about the neural bases of component processes associated with reading are based upon three primary methods. Studies of subjects with brain damage (neuropsychological studies) are used to understand how different aspects of reading performance are impaired and preserved following brain injury or degeneration (see Dyslexia (Acquired) and Aphasia). Studies of brain blood-flow changes (functional neuroimaging studies) use either PET (Positron emission tomography) or fMRI (functional magnetic resonance imaging) to localize and understand the functional contributions of brain regions associated with reading. ERP (see Event-related/ Evoked Potentials) and MEG (see Magnetoencephalography) studies measure brain electromagnetic changes, and provide information about the temporal sequence of brain processing during reading, as well as some information about the location of brain regions associated with reading.

1. An Overview of the Brain Regions Involved in Reading

An overview of the brain regions that support reading can be obtained by using neuroimaging to compare the pattern of brain activation associated with reading aloud a single word, versus merely looking at a small cross or dot. Some of the areas identified in this task comparison support relatively general sensory and motor functions. For instance, the primary motor cortex, which is located in the precentral gyrus (Fig. 1), is usually active during any task that incorporates movement. The identification of the motor cortex in the reading versus fixation comparison reflects the fact that a task that involves mouth movements is being compared to a task that does not. One approach for identifying regions that are more specifically involved in reading is to compare reading aloud to a control task that has similar sensory and motor components, but which minimizes orthographic, phonological, or semantic processing. For example, reading aloud has been compared to a task in which subjects say a simple utterance in response to a random string of letters. This type of contrast subtracts out basic visual,

Figure 1

Brain areas associated with reading. Brain regions involved in higher-level aspects of reading can be identified through comparisons of reading to simpler tasks that contain similar sensory and motor components. Three broad areas identified through such task comparisons have attracted a significant amount of attention. A left inferior frontal area (1a) is centered on the inferior frontal gyrus. A left temporoparietal area (1a) is centered on the junction of the posterior superior temporal cortex and the supramarginal and angular gyri of the inferior parietal lobe. A left basal temporal area is centered within the fusiform gyrus, which lies between temporal and occipital cortex. This area is best viewed from the underside of the brain (Fig. 1b) auditory, and motor areas, and reveals a more restricted set of regions that support higher-order aspects of reading (Fiez and Petersen 1998).

The exact number and location of the brain regions that support higher-order aspects of reading is a matter of active investigation, but three broad areas have attracted the most attention (Fiez and Petersen 1998; Price 1998). As illustrated in Fig. 1, these areas are centered in the left inferior frontal cortex, the left temporoparietal cortex, and the left basal temporal cortex (primarily the fusiform gyrus). Most of the remainder of this article will focus on the potential relationships between these brain areas and the basic components of skilled reading outlined in the introduction. It is important to note, as will become clearer in the discussion of the basal temporal area, that a more precise mapping of the brain regions that contribute to reading is still needed. It is likely that each of the broad areas focused on in this article contains multiple functionally distinct subregions. Furthermore, it is likely that other areas that are not discussed, such as the left middle temporal gyrus (Fig. 1), make some contribution to reading.

2. The Representation of Orthography

The organization of the visual system has been a topic of longstanding interest in the neuroscience and cognitive neuroscience research communities. One question that is highly relevant for studies of reading is whether different regions of the visual object recognition system (located in the ventral occipital and temporal cortex) are specialized for processing different types of stimuli, such as faces or text. In the domain of reading, the search for a region that selectively processes text has generally involved two types of comparisons. The first has been comparisons of words and nameable pictures. This allows regions that are specifically involved in orthographic processing to be teased apart from regions that are more generally involved in the naming of meaningful stimuli. The second approach has been comparisons between different types of orthographic stimuli. Most often, words and pseudowords (pronounceable nonwords, such as 'floop') have been compared to nonword stimuli that are visually similar to words (e.g., stimuli composed of artificial letters, or 'false fonts,' or random consonant strings). This allows regions that are specifically involved in the representation of words to be dissociated from regions that are involved in lower-level processes, such as letter recognition and the detection of line segments.

Several regions that may mediate orthographically specific processing have been proposed. The most promising 'word form area' is in the left middle fusiform gyrus, near the border between the temporal and occipital cortex. Activation in the fusiform gyrus is found reliably when subjects read words aloud (Fig. 1), and one reason to suspect that it may be involved in orthographic processing is the fact that it lies near areas associated with simple visual processing and visual object recognition. More direct evidence comes from studies that have found responses in the fusiform to words and pseudowords, but not visually similar nonword stimuli, such as random letter strings (Fiez and Petersen 1998). Evidence that this area is influenced by the degree to which an orthographic stimulus functions as a whole word (lexical) unit comes from studies in Japanese readers. The Japanese writing system contains two types of characters: Kana characters represent syllables, while Kanji characters represent entire words. Significant activation in the fusiform is found when subjects read words aloud written with Kanji versus Kana characters, and when subjects are given a task that requires them to access the orthographic form of a Kanji character, such as writing the Kanji equivalent of a word written in Kana (Nakamura et al. 2000, Sakurai et al. 2000).

Data from neuropsychology also point toward the important role of occipitotemporal areas, such as the fusiform gyrus, in orthographic processing. Subjects with brain damage in this area can exhibit the syndrome of pure alexia (Patterson and Lambon-Ralph 1999). In pure alexia, the ability rapidly to access or represent the orthographic form of an entire word, or the ability to use orthographic information to access phonological and semantic information, is lost. As a result, subjects use a laborious letter-by-letter strategy to identify and read aloud a word. Subjects with pure alexia generally are able to perform simple visual perceptual tasks, recognize and name visual objects, and write words normally. Japanese subjects can also exhibit alexia following damage to the fusiform, but long-lasting impairments are typically limited to the reading and writing of Kanji characters (Iwata 1984).

Results from ERP and MEG studies indicate that there are differences in the electromagnetic current evoked by words and wordlike stimuli, as compared to nonword stimuli such as letter strings (Cohen et al. 2000; Tarkiainen et al. 2000). The temporal information gained from these studies indicates that orthographically specific processing at the word level begins 100–200 milliseconds (ms) after the onset of a stimulus. Attempts to localize the source of the waveform differences have generally implicated the left basal temporal cortex. More specific localization has come from a study in which recordings were done using an electrode placed in the fusiform gyrus of patients prior to brain surgery. This study found neurons that selectively responded to orthographic stimuli (Nobre et al. 1994).

While there is a significant amount of accumulated evidence across multiple methodologies that points towards a role for the fusiform gyrus in orthographic processing, the precise function of this area remains a point of debate. One issue is whether domain-specific regions—'face areas' or 'word form areas'—exist in the visual system. Since reading is a skill acquired very recently on the evolutionary time-scale, it is unlikely that any brain region would be innately specified to represent word forms. Rather, any specialization is most likely to occur as a result of extensive experience with a relatively unique class of visual stimuli. An alternative point of view is that the analysis of orthography places heavy demands on particular types of visual analysis, such as the ability to resolve input with high-frequency spatial information, or to represent a set of distinct objects that are perceptually very similar. Portions of the fusiform may be particularly suited for these types of analysis (either innately or through experience), and thus may be used to a greater extent for processing orthographic versus non-orthographic stimuli.

A second issue is the level of information that may be represented in the fusiform. Recent evidence indicates that letter-by-letter reading is typically accompanied by visual-perceptual difficulties below the level of the whole word. Deficits in lower-level processing could impair the access to or generation of higher-level orthographic representations (Behrmann et al. 1998). Conversely, imaging evidence reviewed more extensively below indicates that portions of the fusiform are active during linguistic tasks that are not thought to require access to orthographic information. Activation associated with orthographic processing may thus reflect more abstract lexical (whole word) or semantic information that can be accessed through either printed words or speech.

3. The Transformation Between Orthography and Phonology

In order to read a word aloud, it is essential that information about the printed form of the word is transformed into information about the corresponding sound, or pronunciation, of the word. Two general brain regions have been identified which appear to play a major role in phonological (word sound) representation and processing. One region is located in the left inferior frontal lobe, and the other is in the temporoparietal cortex.

Much of the neuropsychological evidence that these regions are important for reading stems from studies of patients with damage to either or both of these regions. These patients often exhibit the syndrome of phonological dyslexia, which is characterized by great difficulty reading aloud pseudowords (Fiez and Petersen 1998; Patterson and Lambon-Ralph 1999). The ability to read aloud pseudowords is considered to be a marker of phonological processing, because the pronunciation of pseudowords cannot be specified by stored lexical (whole word) or semantic knowledge. Instead, pronunciation is thought to rely upon some type of sublexical procedure for deriving a phonological representation. Subjects with phonological dyslexia can read real words relatively well. This is thought to reflect their ability to take advantage of stored lexical and semantic information using brain regions that are not damaged. Interestingly, when direct electrical stimulation is applied to the temporoparietal region during a reading task, subjects appear to exhibit a temporary phonological dyslexia: their ability to pronounce nonwords is temporarily disrupted, but their reading of real words is intact (Simos et al. 2000; see also Electrical Stimulation of the Brain).

Conclusions based upon neuropsychological data are supported by converging evidence from neuroimaging. Both the left frontal and temporoparietal regions are reliably active during normal word reading (Fig. 1), and during a wide variety of tasks that encourage phonological processing (Demonet et al. 1996). ERP and MEG evidence indicates that the activation of these areas occurs at least 300ms after the onset of a stimulus, which is after the temporal differences observed in the basal temporal cortex (Simos et al. 2000). The importance of these regions in reading is further demonstrated by comparisons of normal adults to adults who experienced difficulties learning to read as children (developmental dyslexics). Many investigators believe that subjects with developmental dyslexia have a core deficit in phonological processing that persists into adulthood. When subjects with developmental dyslexia read words aloud, neuroimaging and MEG studies have revealed abnormally low levels of activity in the temporoparietal area (Shaywitz et al. 1998, Rumsey et al. 1999, Simos et al. 2000). The relative reductions in temporoparietal activation can be paralleled by above-normal levels of activity in the left frontal region. The left frontal increases may reflect use of a compensatory strategy for reading that normally plays a secondary role in pronunciation for skilled readers (except under more challenging conditions, such as when a stimulus is a nonword).

Several broad schemes that might distinguish the contributions of the frontal and temporoparietal regions to reading and phonological processing exist. One potential distinction is whether the phonological information and processes supported by a particular brain region are related to the acoustics of speech sounds (input phonology), or the articulation of speech sounds (output phonology). The proximity of the temporoparietal region to basic auditory areas, coupled with the fact that lesions to this area produce deficits in speech comprehension, indicates that it may support input phonology. Conversely, the proximity of the left frontal region to general motor-related areas, coupled with the fact that lesions to this area produce deficits in speech production, indicates that it may support output phonology.

A second potential distinction comes from broad differences between the roles of the frontal and posterior brain regions in cognition. Frontal regions are recruited most often by tasks that require conscious and effortful processing, or controlled processing. When a task is well learned and relatively automatic, activation in the frontal cortex is generally minimal. The frontal cortex may thus represent an area used for controlled phonological processing, whereas the temporoparietal region may represent an area used for automatic phonological processing. This could explain why subjects with developmental dyslexia, who do not develop the normal level of reading skills and automaticity, show less activation in the temporoparietal area and more in more frontal areas. It is also possible that different subregions within the inferior frontal cortex are responsible for different aspects of speech production (e.g., output phonology, grammatical analysis, etc.).

A third potential distinction comes from theoretical models of reading, which have outlined different types of mechanisms that could support orthographic to phonological transformation. Two broad classes of models have been proposed, dual-route (Coltheart et al. 1993) and connectionist models of reading (Plaut et al. 1996). In both types of models, access to the pronunciation of a word is mediated by two different 'routes,' though the routes function in different ways. In the dual-route models, a lexical route functions to associate orthographic information with stored representational information about the pronunciation of the whole word. A sublexical route functions to break a word or pseudoword into smaller parts, such as individual letters or letter clusters (graphemes), that can be associated with corresponding sounds (phonemes); the sounds can then be put together to yield a pronunciation for the entire item.

In connectionist models, direct mappings between orthography and phonology are used to capture statistical regularities between orthography and phonology at both the lexical (or whole word) and the sublexical (e.g., the 'b' in 'back' and 'bear' has the same sound) levels. The pronunciation of a written stimulus is represented as a distributed pattern of activity across a set of interconnected phonological units. Indirect mappings between orthography and phonology via semantics can also be used to support the pronunciation of a word. That is, you could represent the meaning of the word 'dog,' and also represent the fact that this meaning is associated with the pronunciation/dog/. As in the direct mappings between orthography and phonology, these mappings are represented as a distributed pattern of activity, but unlike the direct mappings the mappings should be relatively insensitive to sublexical information (since there is little relationship between parts of words and word meanings, at least for simple 'mono-morphemic' words like 'dog' and 'table').

Simple assumptions have been used to suggest potential mappings between theoretical components in models of reading and specific brain regions (Fiez and Petersen 1998, Price 1998). For instance, it has been suggested that the left frontal area contributes to a sublexical phonological process. This mapping is based upon the fact that in models of reading the pronunciation of pseudowords is primarily based upon output from a sublexical phonological procedure, and in the brain greater activation is seen in the left frontal area when subjects read pseudowords as compared to words. Even this potential correspondence, however, falls short of identifying whether the left frontal region functions according to dual-route or connectionist principles (or some alternative process), and it fails to acknowledge puzzling differences between words and pseudowords in other brain regions. In order to reach more complete levels of description, it will be essential to develop more rigorous methods for relating computational modeling and neuroimaging results.

4. The Transformation Between Orthography and Lexical Semantics

In addition to lexical procedures that facilitate direct associations between an orthographic and a phonological form of a word, it is also possible that other types of stored representational information can be used to support pronunciation. This could include lexical information about the word itself, the meaning of the word, or the concept denoted by the word. Once such lexical-semantic information has been accessed, it could be used to access information about the pronunciation of the word or concept, as suggested in connectionist models of reading. Importantly, access to most lexical-semantic information is expected to be modality and task independent. Either a written word or a picture, for instance, can be used to represent a word name or a semantic concept, and individuals can produce a spoken word in response to a written word, picture, or their own internal thoughts.

Of the three general areas that are commonly active during word reading (Fig. 1), the basal temporal region is the best candidate for an area that contributes to lexical-semantic processing. This is the same general region that has been implicated in orthographic representation, and the potential overlap between orthographic and lexical-semantic processing is discussed at the end of this section. Assertions that the basal temporal region contributes to lexical-semantic processing are based upon evidence that the region responds to a variety of stimuli and task conditions that emphasize the retrieval of word names or concepts. For instance, neuroimaging studies have found overlapping activation during picture naming and word naming tasks (Moore and Price 1999). Outside the domain of reading, basal temporal activation is commonly associated with tasks that emphasize semantic processing or word retrieval, such as deciding whether a pair of words belongs to the same semantic category (Price 1998; see also Semantic Knowledge: Neural Basis of).

Neuropsychological studies also point towards the role of the inferior temporal area in lexical-semantic processing. With respect to reading, the most critical information comes from studies of patients with acquired surface dyslexia. In the purest forms of surface dyslexia, subjects tend to mispronounce inconsistent words, which are words with unusual spelling-to-sound correspondences. For instance, the word 'pint' is not pronounced like 'mint,' 'lint,' or 'hint.' Theoretical models of reading have postulated that the pronunciation of inconsistent words, especially those that occur infrequently in print, is heavily dependent upon access to stored lexical-semantic information. Most reported subjects with surface dyslexia have large regions of damage or degeneration affecting the left middle and inferior temporal lobe, and the deficits of these subjects typically extend beyond the domain of reading (Patterson and Lambon-Ralph 1999). For instance, they often have difficulty accurately naming pictures of objects. Surface dyslexics are generally able to read aloud most words with consistent spelling-to-sound correspondences, and pseudowords. This preserved ability may reflect the use of sublexical orthographic to phonological procedures that are supported by intact brain regions, such as the left frontal area.

An issue that is not well understood is whether the reading-related area discussed in Sect. 2 is the same as the lexical-semantic area discussed in this section. One reason to believe that they may be the same is the fact that in many neuroimaging studies of reading, only a single region of activation is identified in the fusiform gyrus. If they do overlap, future research will need to reconcile the orthographic and lexical-semantic points of view to provide a unified interpretation of the role of the inferior temporal area in reading. However, there is some evidence that there may be more than one functional region within the basal temporal area. A neuroimaging study of word versus picture naming, for example, identified multiple regions within the fusiform that had different patterns of activation (Moore and Price 1999). This is consistent with converging data from animal and human studies of visual object recognition. Such studies indicate that modality and domain specific visual processing, such as that involved in orthographic representation of lexical information, may be located in the posterior fusiform. In contrast, the anterior portions of the fusiform may be associated with increasingly conceptual and modality-independent processing. This could include the conceptual representation of objects and ideas that are denoted by pictures, and by written and spoken words (Ricci et al. 1999).

5. The 'Tuning' of Brain Regions that Support Reading

Neuropsychological and neuroimaging studies of Chinese, Japanese, Italian, German, and English-speaking subjects have reached similar conclusions about the basic cognitive processes and brain regions involved in reading. This consistency reinforces the conclusion that the network of brain areas summarized in Fig. 1 is somehow specialized to support reading and other language processes. However, it should not be taken as evidence that the neural network that underlies reading is inflexible. Quite the contrary, there is growing evidence that a number of factors can have a profound impact on how the network is tuned to most effectively support reading.

Some of the tuning of the reading system may reflect differences in experience or training. For instance, in Italian the mapping between how words look and how they sound is much more consistent than it is in English. Italian-speaking subjects take advantage of this consistency to read aloud words and pseudowords more quickly than English-speaking subjects. Furthermore, when they read words aloud, they produce more brain activation in the left temporoparietal region than do English-speaking subjects; the converse is true in the left inferior temporal region (Paulesu et al. 2000).

Other differences may reflect the use of compensatory or alternative strategies. For instance, as noted above, subjects with developmental dyslexia show a hyperactivation of the left frontal region, and a hypoactivation of the left temporoparietal region. More subtle differences in the activation of brain areas associated with phonology are even apparent in readers at different ends of the normal distribution of reading skill (Rumsey et al. 1999). In subjects with acquired brain damage, neuroimaging studies indicate that right hemisphere brain regions, typically similar in location to sites of damage in the left hemisphere, may begin to play a more substantial role in language tasks (Buckner et al. 1996).

See also: Lexical Processes (Word Knowledge): Psychological and Neural Aspects

Bibliography

- Behrmann M, Plaut D C, Nelson J 1998 A literature review and new data supporting an interactive account of postlexical effects in letter-by-letter reading. Cognitive Neuropsychology 15: 7–52
- Buckner R L, Corbetta M, Schatz J, Raichle M E, Petersen S E 1996 Preserved speech abilities and compensation following prefrontal damage. Proceedings of the National Academy of Science USA 93: 1249–53
- Cohen L, Dehaene S, Naccache L, Lehericy S, Dehaene-Lamberg G, Henaff M A, Michel F 2000 The visual word form area. Spatial and temporal characterization of an initial stage of reading in normal subjects and posterior split-brain patients. Brain 123: 291–307
- Coltheart M, Curtis B, Atkins P, Haller M 1993 Models of reading aloud: Dual-route and parallel-distributed-processing approaches. Psychological Review 100: 589–608
- Demonet J F, Fiez J A, Paulesu E, Petersen S E, Zatorre R 1996 PET studies of phonological processing: A critical reply to Poeppel. Brain and Language 55: 352–79

- Fiez J A, Petersen S E 1998 Neuroimaging studies of word reading. Proceedings of the National Academy of Science USA 95: 914–21
- Iwata M 1984 Kanji versus Kana: Neuropsychological correlates of the Japanese writing system. Trends in Neuroscience 7: 290–3
- Moore C J, Price C J 1999 Three distinct ventral occipito-temporal regions for reading and object naming. Neuroimage 10: 181–92
- Nakamura K, Honda M, Okada T 2000 Participation of the left posterior inferior temporal cortex in writing and mental recall of kanji orthography. A functional MRI study. Brain 123: 954–67
- Nobre A C, Allison T, McCarthy G 1994 Word recognition in the human inferior temporal lobe. Nature 372: 260–3
- Patterson K, Lambon-Ralph M A 1999 Selective disorders of reading? Current Opinion in Neurobiology 9: 235–9
- Paulesu E, McCrory E, Fazio F, Menoncello L, Brunswick N, Cappa S F, Cotelli M, Cossu G, Corte F, Lorusso M, Pesenti S, Gallagher A, Perani D, Price C, Frith C D, Frith U 2000 A cultural effect on brain function. Nature Neuroscience 3: 91–6
- Plaut D C, McClelland J F, Seidenberg M S, Patterson K 1996 Understanding normal and impaired word reading: Computational principles in quasi-regular domains. Psychological Review 103: 56–115
- Price C J 1998 The functional anatomy of word comprehension and production. Trends in Cognitive Sciences 2: 281–8
- Ricci P T, Zelkowitz B J, Nebes R D, Meltzer C C, Mintun M A, Becker J T 1999 Functional neuroanatomy of semantic memory: Recognition of semantic associates. Neuroimage 9: 88–96
- Rumsey J M, Horwitz B, Donohue B C, Nace K L, Maisog J M, Andreason P 1999 A functional lesion in developmental dyslexia: Left angular gyral blood flow predicts severity. Brain and Language 70: 187–204
- Sakurai Y, Momose T, Iwata M, Sudo Y, Ohtomo K, Kanazawa I 2000 Different cortical activity in reading of Kanji words, Kana words and Kana nonwords. Cognitive Brain Research 9: 111–15
- Shaywitz S E, Shaywitz B A, Pugh K R, Fulbright R K, Constable R T, Mencl W E, Shankweiler D P, Liberman A M, Skudlarski P, Fletcher J M, Katz L, Marchione K E, Lacadie C, Gatenby C, Gore J C 1998 Functional disruption in the organization of the brain for reading in dyslexia. Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences USA 95: 2636–41
- Simos P G, Papanicolaou A C, Breier J I, Fletcher J M, Wheless J W, Maggio W W, Gormley W, Constantinou J E C, Kramer L 2000 Insights into brain function and neural plasticity using magnetic source imaging. Journal of Clinical Neurophysiology 17: 143–62
- Tarkiainen A, Helenius P, Hansen P C, Cornelissen P L, Salmelin R 2000 Dynamics of letter string perception in the human occipitotemporal cortex. Brain 122: 2119–213

J. A. Fiez

Reading Nonalphabetic Scripts

1. The Japanese Language

Linguistically, Japanese does not relate to Chinese, Korean, or English, though it is similar to Korean in syntax, but not in speech sounds or vocabulary.

However, Japanese has borrowed many words and characters, mainly from Chinese. Almost all indigenous people living in Japan speak Japanese, and ethnic Japanese living outside of Japan also do so. There are about 130 million Japanese speakers, and the language ranks sixth among the languages of the world after Chinese, English, Russian, Hindi, and Spanish.

The Japanese language employs five vowels and 16 consonants. Compared to other languages such as English, the Japanese sound system contains few sounds. The Japanese sound system uses a unit called a 'mora,' which is a short beat, the time taken to pronounce a short syllable. The mora is the main unit in the Japanese language, and is also the unit of Japanese phonetic script—hiragana (or hirakana) and katakana. Each Japanese syllabary sign is based on a mora. There are 110 different moras, or syllables, in Japanese. It is one of the smallest inventories of any major languages. For example, there are 400 syllables in Chinese and several thousand in English. The small inventory of Japanese sounds gives rise to many homophones, but it is easy to represent the language by a simple syllabary.

The Japanese vocabulary consists of four word types: Japanese origin (47.5 percent), Sino-Japanese (36.7 percent; long ago adopted from China), foreign loan words (9.8 percent; mostly European adopted in modern times), and hybrids (6 percent; Sino-Japanese or foreign word stems with Japanese endings).

2. The Japanese Writing System

The Japanese writing system consists of five kinds of script—kanji, hiragana, katakana, roman alphabet, and arabic numerals. Among these, the first three script types are employed most frequently in writing Japanese. Japanese text is therefore written using these five kinds of script, and it is also true that both the traditional vertical (tategaki) from top to bottom, and the horizontal (yokogaki), from left to right, styles are used depending on the kind of being written. For example, newspapers are printed in tategaki style, whereas academic journals are printed in yokogaki style.

3. Kanji Script and Reading

As a result of waves of Chinese and Korean emigration to Japan during the fourth and seventh centuries AD, Chinese-based culture, mainly in the form of Confucian classics, medicine, and Buddhism, came to Japan. A writing system with Chinese characters was, therefore, the only script until two forms of syllabary, hiragana and katakana were created from kanji during the ninth century AD. 'Kan-on' kanji readings were borrowings from Confucian scholarship. Chinese 'hanzi,' associated with the Han Dynasty period, became Japanese 'kanji,' which remains the backbone of the Japanese writing system. As Japanese kanji borrowed Chinese hanzi in distinct historical periods, different pronunciations were adopted for these kanji, and makes reading complicated in modern writing systems. This feature of having multiple readings for many kanji characters in Japanese is different from those of Chinese and Korean, which have only a single reading.

The Japanese language uses not only Chinese and native readings of the logographic characters, but also several varieties of each type of reading, which makes the oral reading of characters complicated. For example, Mandarin Chinese read the simple character for 'ten' 十 as one sound 'shi,' while the Korean reading is 'sip' (no tone or soundless). Both languages use only one reading, but Japanese speakers read the character as 'to,' 'toh,' 'so,' 'jyu,' 'jutt-,' all without tone (Taylor and Taylor 1995). The first three sounds are examples of Kun readings (Japanese native readings), while the others are 'On' readings (Chinese readings). The Kun reading is quite different from the Chinese because the two languages are unrelated. Besides the Kun reading, most kanji have one or more On readings which are not identical with Chinese sounds. Depending upon when and where the Chinese characters were borrowed, four different types of On reading (go-on, kan-on, toh-soh-on, and the habitual one) were agreed. Most Japanese kanji are given only one of the four types of On reading.

The number of kanji is enormous. Kanji dictionaries contain between 12,000 and 50,000 entries. In 1981, the Japanese Ministry of Education attempted to restrict the number of kanji as 'joyo kanji' to be used in the educational system. This contains 1945 kanji, but because almost all kanji possess both On and Kun readings, Japanese people therefore learn a total of 4084 kanji readings during their first 9 years of education. Generally, each kanji consists of a combination of radicals. There are 250 kinds of radical, each consisting of between one and 17 components (strokes). Most radicals consist of two to nine strokes (Ueda et al. 1993). As the number of kanji is so huge, this reduces any difficulty in understanding homophones. However, there is a clear asymmetry between reading and writing ability, and it is true that some adult Japanese fail to read even joyo kanji.

Cognitive psychologists once suggested that the processing route of reading depended on the type of orthography—that is, kanji has a single route from orthography to semantics, bypassing the contribution of phonological information, while the kana travel a phonological route to access semantics. But this is too simple an explanation. Recent reviews of kanji studies suggest that it is reasonable to conclude that, depending upon the task settings, familiarity, frequency, and complexity of kanji, one of the most efficient processing routes of phonology-based or grapheme-based routes (or both routes) is employed to access semantics (Kess and Miyamoto 1999). However, in the case of high-frequency and high-familiarity kanji,

Table 1
Samples of radicals

Radicals	Examples
Hen	波(wave)	河(river)
Tsukuri	清(clear water)	晴(clear weather)
Kanmuri	草(grass)	花(flower)
Ashi	熊(bear)	馬(horse)
Kamae	国(state)	園(to enclose)
Tare	庭(garden)	店(shop)
Nyo	返(to return)	逃(to escape)

semantic access is achieved only through the grapheme-based route, and this is not specific to Japanese. There are examples in alphabetic systems where the cognitive route is also direct from grapheme to semantics.

As shown in Table 1, complex kanji consist of semantic and phonetic radicals, hen (left hand), tsukuri (right hand), kanmuri (top), ashi (bottom), kamae (enclosure), tare (top-left), and nyo (bottom-left). Each acts differentially in reading. That is, generally, semantic radicals give clues to meanings, whereas phonetic radicals give clues to pronunciation. Research findings also suggest that the right hand radical is more informative than the left.

Many words in Japanese are represented not only by individual kanji but also by a compound which is a polysyllabic composite of between two and four kanji, usually carrying an On reading. More than 50 percent of the words in most Japanese dictionaries are compound kanji. Research findings also suggest that the reading processes of kanji compound words constitute another grouping. In addition to the frequency of the compound word itself, the first kanji of a compound is important, because the first kanji defines the range of possible collocations in the cohort of potential kanji compounds.

There is strong evidence that the individual kanji are processed as a recognition unit and kanji compounds themselves are also recognition units. A case has been that one agraphic patient was able to read the single kanji 手 'hand' and 紙 'paper' but failed to read their coupling as 手紙 'letter,' while another patient had less difficulty in reading a compound word, but could not read the single kanji which constituted the compound word (Hatta et al. 1998). This double dissociation suggests that single and compound kanji words are stored with different addresses in the mental lexicon.

4. Kana Scripts and Reading

In addition to kanji, there are two syllabary types of script in Japanese—hiragana and katakana (see Table 2). The kana unit represents a sound unit, which corresponds roughly to a syllable. Both scripts contain

Table 2

Hiragana, katakana, and kanji descriptions of the words 'firefly' and 'dreams'

	Firefly	Dream
Hiragana	ほたる	ゆめ
Katakana	ホタル	ユメ
Kanji	螢	夢

46 basic symbols and 25 additional symbols with diacritic marks. Hiragana and katakana share the same syllabic reference points, therefore the same syllable can be written by either system. Hiragana is cursive, as shown in Table 2, and used mainly for some content words, morphological endings, function words, and the rest of the grammatical scaffoldings of sentences. In contrast, katakana is angular in shape and is used for writing foreign loan words.

Kana developed gradually out of Chinese characters in the following order—kanji, kanji as phonetic signs, simplified kanji shapes, and kana. During this development, mainly female authors used hiragana to write letters, poems, diaries, and stories; this is because hiragana is a graceful, cursive form of its original kanji. For a long time, it has been the convention that a cursively simplified hiragana is used for grammatical morphemes, and the angular simplified katakana is used for foreign loan words and onomatopoeia. However, an explanation for the use of both types of script because of differing roles in syntax cannot be the only reason why the Japanese have kept three kinds of script usage irrespective of high cost. Japanese people might have found it useful or convenient to express semantic emotional information by employing different types of script.

Conventionally, there is a connection between orthography type and the words used. This has a strong effect on Japanese word readings. Japanese people possess a strong, emotional semantic image for each type of script—kanji is seen as masculine, hiragana feminine, and katakana exotic. Japanese people sometimes employ this emotional image of a script when writing, irrespective of the conventional usage of scripts and words. For example, reading experiments suggested that when Japanese people see the kanji word for chair 椅子, an image of an old-fashioned, strongly-built chair is generated; when they see the katakana word for chair イス, they imagine a modern and elegant chair; and in the case of the hiragana word for chair いす, they may imagine a simple wooden chair (Ukita et al. 1996).

5. Summary of Research Findings in Cognitive and Neuropsychological Studies

The results of earlier cognitive psychological experiments suggest that orthographic configurations can be used to access directly phonological form, meaning, or both, depending on the processing task requirement. Although the role and the importance of these factors may differ for each orthography in respect to the processing strategy favored and the processing times required, Japanese seems not to be an exceptional writing system, but possesses idiosyncratic requirements of the world's writing systems.

However, neuropsychological studies have suggested that kanji and kana are processed differentially and stress the importance of orthography difference in reading (Iwata 1984, Yamadori 1975). In alexia with agraphia due to angular gyrus lesions, kana reading is impaired more severely than kanji, whereas left posterior–inferior temporal lesions impair kanji reading (Iwata 1984, Kawamura et al. 1987). These findings support the hypothesis that there are two pathways of reading in Japanese: one is the ventral pathway from the visual area in the occipital cortex via the posterior part of the inferior and middle temporal gyli of the left hemisphere, which is used in semantic reading of kanji; the other is the dorsal route from the visual area via the angular gyrus to Wernicke's area, and is used for the phonological processing of kana reading.

Regarding the visual half field, several studies have revealed that the right hemisphere contributes more than the left in kanji recognition. For example, a tendency toward a right hemisphere advantage was reported in the case of single kanji (Hatta 1977), and in the case of two-kanji non-word pairs (Sasanuma et al. 1977). On the other hand, a left hemisphere advantage was reported in the case of two-kanji compound words (Hatta 1978). By employing a very recent new research method (MEG), Koyama et al. (1998) revealed that not only the left but also the right hemisphere is activated in reading kanji words, and support the view of the right hemisphere engagement in kanji reading. These studies suggest that hemisphere function in kanji reading is not the same as in the reading of English and kana words.

The discrepancy between cognitive psychological and neuropsychological research findings in Japanese reading leaves us to conclude that there is a language non-specific cognitive processing in reading. Further studies concerning non-alphabetical scripts are necessary to answer this question.

See also: Dyslexia (Acquired) and Agraphia; Dyslexia, Developmental; Letter and Character Recognition, Cognitive Psychology of; Reading, Neural Basis of; Reading Skills; Writing, Evolution of; Writing Systems

Bibliography

- Hatta T 1977 Recognition of Japanese kanji in the left and right visual fields. Neuropsychology 15: 685–88
Hatta T 1978 Recognition of Japanese kanji and Hiragana in the left and right visual fields. Japanese Psychological Research 20: 51–9

- Hatta T, Kawakami A, Tamaoka K 1998 Writing errors in Japanese kanji. Reading and Writing 10: 457–70
- Iwata M 1984 Kanji versus kana: Neuropsychological correlates of the Japanese writing system. Trends in Neuroscience 7: 290–93
- Kawamura M, Hirayama K, Hasegawa K, Takahashi N, Yamaura A 1987 Alexia with agraphia of kanji (Japanese morphograms). Journal of Neurology, Neurosurgery and Psychiatry 50: 1125–29
- Kess J F, Miyamoto T 1999 The Japanese Mental Lexicon. Benjamins, Amsterdam
- Koyama S, Kakigi R, Hoshiyama M, Kitamura Y 1998 Reading of Japanese kanji (morphograms) and kana (syllabograms): A magneto-encephalographic study. Neuropsychology 36: 83–98
- Sasanuma S, Itoh K, Mori K, Kobayashi Y 1977 Tachistoscopic recognition of kana and kanji words. Neuropsychology 15: 547–53
- Taylor I, Taylor M M 1995 Writing and Literacy in Chinese, Korean, and Japanese. Benjamins, Amsterdam
- Ueda M, Okada M, Iijima T, Sakaeda T, Iida D 1993 Shin Daijiten. Kodansha, Tokyo
- Ukita J, Sugishima M, Minagawa M, Inoue M, Kashu K 1996 Psychological Research on Orthographic Forms in Japanese. Psychology Monographs 25, Japanese Psychological Association
- Yamadori A 1975 Ideogram reading in alexia. Brain 98: 231–8

T. Hatta

Reading Skills

The question of reading skill includes definitional and substantive components. The definitional question is answered as follows: reading skill is an individual's standing on some reading assessment. Skilled readers are those who score above some standard on this assessment; readers of low skill are those who score below some standard. The substantive question is this: What are the processes of reading that produce variation in assessed reading skill? This question is the focus here: given that two individuals differ in some global assessment of their reading, what differences in reading processes are candidates to explain this difference?

1. Normal and Special Variation in Reading Skill

Is a single analysis of reading skill sufficient to characterize both 'garden variety' variation and severe reading difficulties? Severe difficulties in reading in the absence of general intellectual problems is the standard definition of dyslexia, or specific reading disability. The discrepancy between achievement in reading and achievement in other domains is what sets dyslexia apart. However, there are reasons to blur the distinction between specific and nonspecific reading problems. Individuals in the two categories may differ only in their achievements in some other nonreading area. The processes that go wrong in a specific disability may not be much different from those that go wrong for an individual who also has a problem in some other area (Stanovich and Siegel 1994). For both groups, difficulties in reading must be understood in terms of the processes of reading. What are the processes that can go wrong?

2. A Process Analysis

Reading processes depend on the language of the reader and the writing system that encodes that language. The units of the writing system are converted into mental representations that include the units of the language system. Specifically important are (a) the identification of words and (b) the engagement of language and general cognitive mechanisms that assemble these words into messages.

It is visual word identification that is the process most distinctive to reading. Beginning with a visual input—a string of letters—perceptual processes produce the activation of the grapheme units (individual and multiple letters) that constitute words. In traditional models of human cognition, the words are represented in a lexicon, the reader's mental representation of word forms and meanings. Successful word reading occurs when there is a match between the input letter string and a word representation. As part of this process, phonological units, including individual phonemes associated with individual letters, are also activated. The joint contribution of graphemic and phonological units brings about the identification of a word. It is common to refer to the phonological contribution to this process as phonological mediation. It is also common to represent two pathways, one from graphemic units to meaning directly, and one from graphemic units to phonological units, and then to meaning (the mediation pathway). The issues of mediation and one-or-two routes are central to alternative theoretical models of the reading process.

The alternative models do not assume a representation system that stores words. In one class of nonrepresentational models, words emerge from patterns of parallel and distributed activation (Plaut et al. 1996). In resonance models, word identification results from the stabilization of dynamic patterns that are continuously modified by interactions among inputs and various dynamic states resulting from prior experience (Van Orden and Goldinger 1994). An interesting feature of this model is that patterns of graphic-phonological activation stabilize more rapidly than do patterns of graphic-semantic activation. In effect, a word form becomes identified primarily through the convergence of orthography and phonology. Meaning is slower to exert an influence on the identification process.

Figure 1

A schematic view of reading processes with candidate sources of reading problems. Adapted from Perfetti (1999)

In considering reading skill, it is possible to ignore differences among theoretical models to a certain extent. However, the theoretical models of reading processes actually make some commitments about the sources of reading problems. For example, a dual route model allows two very different sources of word reading difficulties: Either the direct (print-to-meaning) route or the indirect (print-to-phonology-to-meaning) route can be impaired (Coltheart et al. 1993). This provides a model for both developmental and acquired dyslexia. In acquired dyslexia, surface dyslexics are assumed to have selective damage to the direct route; phonological dyslexics are assumed to have selective damage to the phonological route. For developmental dyslexia, children may have a phonological deficit or an 'orthographic' (direct route) deficit. However, single mechanism models with learning procedures can give an alternative account of developmental dyslexia: only one type, phonological dyslexia, is the result of a processing defect; surface or orthographic dyslexia becomes a delay in the acquisition of word-specific knowledge (Harm and Seidenberg 1999). Such an example illustrates that understanding individual differences in reading is part of the same problem as theoretical understanding of reading processes.

Figure 1 schematizes an organization of the cognitive architecture for reading. Reading begins with (a) a visual input that, with immediate use of phonology, leads to word identification that (b) yields semantic information connected to the word as constrained by the current context. A word immediately is (c) integrated syntactically with an ongoing sentence parse and (d) semantically with an ongoing message interpretation (proposition). As sentences are read (e), an integrated text representation is developed, consisting of interrelated propositions. To establish a reasonably specific understanding of a text, (f) inferences establish a coherent referential model of what is being read.

Potential reading difficulties are seen in each component. At the word level, a reader could have trouble with processing letter strings or in selecting the required meaning of a word. A reader might have defective phonological processes, limiting word identification and memory for words. On the comprehension end, a reader could have syntactic difficulties or fail to generate inferences or to monitor comprehension. Because these processes can demand mental resources from a limited pool, a very general constraint is working memory limitations. Thus reading difficulty can arise from a general limit in functional working memory capacity or from the failure of some processes to escape this limit. The following sections consider some of these possibilities.

2.1 Lexical Orthographic-Phonological Processes

Readers who fail to read words accurately fail to comprehend. Thus, word-level problems are potentially the most important in creating reading failures, because they lead both to word reading problems themselves and to derivative comprehension problems. For example, verbal efficiency theory (Perfetti 1985) assumes that readers who lack efficient word identification procedures are at risk for comprehension failure.

A word identification problem is a failure of phonological and orthographic information to cohere onto a word identity (Fig. 1). Knowledge of letters and knowledge of phonemes that connect with letters in specific letter environments are necessary. Less skilled readers tend to have weaker knowledge of word spellings (orthography) and of word sounds (phonology), and especially weaker knowledge of orthography–phonology connections (decoding). Various measures assess phonological processes, but the ability to read legal nonwords (pseudowords) has become a benchmark for decoding ability. Both the phonological and orthographic components of word reading appear to have a significant heritable component (Olson et al. 1999).

The relationship between orthographic and phonological knowledge may be complex. As indicated in Fig. 1, an orthographic processing event is also a phonological processing event, perhaps implying that the two knowledge sources develop in tandem. However, the effects of reading experience may be a bit different for these two components. Early encounters with words may be crucial for establishing (phonological) decoding knowledge with orthographic knowledge acquired more gradually, as individual words are ‘practiced’ in reading situations. Stanovich and West (1989) found that reading experience accounts for variance in word reading skill beyond that accounted for by decoding. However, this does not mean that word knowledge gained through experience is independent of phonology. Indeed, early in reading experience, decoding unfamiliar words may be the primary mechanism for establishing orthographic representations of specific words (Share and Stanovich 1995). More generally, phonological processes that link graphic inputs to word identities may enable gains from further experience in reading, increasing the quality and quantity of word representations (Perfetti 1992).

Referring to ‘orthographic’ and ‘phonological’ as separate sources of knowledge does not entail a commitment to two separate routes in word identification. Whether as defects in the phonological component of single mechanism or as impairments of a distinct processing route, phonological problems may be the central deficiency for both specific reading disability and nonspecific low reading skill (Stanovich 1988). They can arise at many levels, including speech processing mechanisms and sensitivity to phonological structures, as well as written word identification. Becoming aware that spoken words consist of meaningless sound segments (phonemes) is important in learning to read, and children who do not become aware are at risk for failure (see Liberman and Shankweiler 1991). Moreover, phonological processing problems may have consequences throughout the reading process: learning to read words, remembering just-read words, and understanding phrases and sentences are all processes operating on partly phonological representations.

2.2 Processing Lexical Meaning

The ability to get context-appropriate meaning from words is central to reading skill. At one level, this is a question of vocabulary. The more words a reader knows, the better the comprehension. At another level, it is the ability to select the right meaning of a word in a given context. Although the description of lexical meaning selection has become complex, a still widely (not universally) shared conclusion is this: the selection of word meaning proceeds in two-stages: (a) a general activation stage in which a word is accessed and its associated meanings nonselectively activated, and (b) a selection stage in which the meaning appropriate for context is selected while meanings inappropriate for context are suppressed.

One hypothesis is that less skilled readers are less effective in selecting a contextually appropriate meaning. According to the structure building framework (Gernsbacher 1990), readers build a coherent framework for a text by enhancing concepts required by the text while suppressing those that are irrelevant. The suppression hypothesis is that less skilled readers have deficient suppression mechanisms. To illustrate, in the sentence, ‘He dug with the spade,’ the final word has two meanings, but only one fits the context of the sentence. However, when adult readers are immediately asked to decide whether a following word is related to the meaning of the sentence, their decisions are initially slow for the word ‘ace’ (related to the inappropriate meaning of spade). Both appropriate and inappropriate meanings may be activated at first. With more time before the appearance of ‘ace,’ skilled readers show no delay in rejecting it; i.e., they ‘suppress’ the irrelevant meaning. However, less skilled readers continue to react slowly to ‘ace,’ as if they have not completely suppressed the irrelevant meaning of ‘spade.’

Whether ineffective use of context is a source of reading problems has become a complex issue. Pre-scientific beliefs on this question seemed to be that poor readers failed to use context in reading words. However, research on children’s word identification led to the opposite result: less skilled readers use context in word identification at least as much and perhaps more than do skilled readers (Perfetti 1985, Stanovich 1980). Less skilled comprehenders are good users of context, which they use in compensation for weaker word identification skill to identify words. The suppression proposal adds to the poor reader’s basic word identification problem a specific suppression problem, the effect of which is a less productive use of context.

2.3 Processing Syntax

Less skilled readers often show a wide range of problems in syntax and morphology. The question is whether such problems, which are found across a wide age range, arise from some deficit in processing syntax or from some other source that affects performance on syntactic tasks. One possibility is that syntactic problems reflect a lag in the development of linguistic structures. An alternative hypothesis is that the syntactic problems reflect constraints of working memory or lexical processing limitations.

To illustrate one class of syntactic problem, consider two sentences with relative clauses below. (a) is the easier subject relative; (b) is the more difficult object relative.

(a) The girl that the boy believed understood the problem.

(b) The girl that believed the boy understood the problem.

The greater difficulty of (b) compared with (a) can arise from different degrees of interference they produce in the attempt to assigning a subject for 'understood.' For syntactic reasons, the interference produced by the object relative (b) is greater than the interference produced by the subject relative (a). Details aside, if syntactic deficits rest on lack of specific syntactic knowledge, then one might expect some qualitative differences between skilled and less skilled readers. However, in the relative clause example and in other syntactic examples, patterns of difficulty for skilled and less skilled young readers tend to be the same, suggesting quantitative rather than qualitative differences (Crain and Shankweiler 1988).

Research with adults suggests that both reading problems and spoken language problems (aphasia) may arise from processing limitations rather than structural deficits (Carpenter et al. 1994). In a study of subject and object relatives similar to those in (a) and (b), King and Just (1991) found that readers with low working memory have problems with object-relative sentences. More interesting, these problems (as seen in reading times for words) were most severe where the processing load was hypothesized to be the greatest—at the second verb in the object relative, i.e., 'understood' in (b). Comprehension difficulties may be localized at points of high processing demands—whether from syntax or something else. If this analysis is correct, then the problem is not intrinsic deficits in syntax, but the processing capacity to handle complexity.

Another perspective on this issue is the opportunity for practice. Because some syntactic structures are more typical of written language than spoken language, the opportunity for practice is limited by the ability to read. Thus, continuing development of reading skill as a result of initial success at reading—and the parallel increasing failure as a result of initial failure—is undoubtedly a major contributor to individual differences in reading.

2.4 Processing Text

The source of skill differences in text comprehension can lie in the lexical and working memory processes considered above or in higher-level processes specific to reading texts. In addition to identifying words, parsing sentences, and encoding context-sensitive meanings, readers must use knowledge from outside of the text and apply procedures that derive intended meanings. The overall complexity of text comprehension implies several possibilities for processing failure, any resulting in a less integrated or less coherent representation of the text.

One example is the processes of coreference, by which a reader maps a pronoun to an already established referent, as illustrated in (c).

(c) Jane saw Margaret shopping in the grocery store. She was buying bread.

When there are two possible referents for a pronoun, less skilled readers may take longer to assign the pronoun to the intended referent (Margaret in this case), at least when the referent is not the first noun in the preceding sentence (Frederiksen 1981). If this simple pronoun case is general, less skilled readers may be less adept at integrating referential information across sentences.

The text processing component that has received the most attention as a source of individual differences is making inferences. Oakhill and Garnham (1988) summarize evidence suggesting that less skilled readers fail to make a range inferences in comprehension. When skill differences are observed, an important question is whether they occur in the absence of problems in lexical skills, working memory, or other lower-level factors. The answer to this question remains unclear in much of the research. However, there has been some success in identifying a group of children whose problems can be considered comprehension-specific, although highly general across reading and spoken language (Stothard and Hulme 1996).

Another example is comprehension monitoring, the reader's implicit attempts to assure a consistent and meaningful understanding. Skilled readers can use the detection of a comprehension breakdown (e.g., an apparent inconsistency) as a signal for rereading and repair. Less skilled readers may fail to engage this monitoring process (Baker 1984, Garner 1980). Low skilled comprehenders seem especially poor at detecting higher level text inconsistencies that negate a coherent model of the text content—for example, whether successive paragraphs are on unrelated topics.

However, it is not clear whether these higher level differences are independent of the reader's ability to construct a simple understanding of the text. Some evidence suggests that less skilled comprehenders fail accurately to represent or weight the propositions in a text (Otero and Kintsch 1992). The general interpretive problem here is that comprehension monitoring, like inference making, both contributes to and results from reader's text representation. This makes it difficult to attribute comprehension problems uniquely to failures to monitor comprehension, as opposed to more basic comprehension failures.

Because no texts are fully explicit, the reader must import knowledge from outside the text. Thus, a powerful source of comprehension differences is the extent to which a reader has such knowledge for a given text (Anderson et al. 1977). However, readers of high skill can compensate for lack of knowledge to some extent (Adams et al. 1995). It is the reader who lacks both knowledge and reading skill who is assured failure. The deleterious effect of low reading skill (and its motivational consequences) on learning through reading creates readers who lack knowledge of all sorts.

3. Summary

With a focus on the component processes, individual differences in reading skill become a matter of understanding how these processes and their interactions contribute to successful reading outcomes. Where the successful outcome is reading individual words, the processes are localized in knowledge of word forms—both general and word-specific phonological and orthographic knowledge—and word meanings. Inadequate knowledge of word forms is the central obstacle to acquiring high levels of skill. Severe problems in word reading reflect severe problems in phonological knowledge. Where the successful outcome is comprehension, the critical processes continue to include word processes, and problems in comprehension are associated with problems in word processing. In addition, processes that contribute to basic sentence understanding and sentence integration become critical. Processes that provide basic propositional meaning, including word meaning selection and parsing, and those that establish coherent text representations (integration processes, inferences, monitoring, conceptual knowledge) become critical to success. Less skilled readers, as assessed by comprehension tests, often show difficulties in one or more of these processes. Less clear is how to understand the causes of observed failures. A processing model helps to see the relationships among component processes and to guide studies of skill differences. The candidate causes of skill variation cannot be equally probable, when the output of lower-level processes are needed by higher level processes. The identification of basic causes, as opposed to derivative symptoms that reflect the costs of low reading skill, requires research that can provide strong causal tests.

See also: Dyslexia (Acquired) and Agraphia; Dyslexia, Developmental; Dyslexia: Diagnosis and Training; Dyslexia, Genetics of; Eye Movements in Reading; Letter and Character Recognition, Cognitive Psychology of; Lexical Processes (Word Knowledge); Psychological and Neural Aspects; Reading, Neural Basis of; Reading Nonalphabetic Scripts; Speed Reading; Word Recognition, Cognitive Psychology of

Bibliography

- Adams B C, Bell L C, Perfetti C A 1995 A trading relationship between reading skill and domain knowledge in children's text comprehension. Discourse Processes 20: 807–23
- Anderson R C, Reynolds R E, Shallert D L, Goetz E T 1977 Frameworks for comprehending discourse. American Educational Research Journal 4: 367–81
- Baker L 1984 Spontaneous versus instructed use of multiple standards for evaluating comprehension: Effects of age, reading proficiency and type of standard. Journal of Experimental Child Psychology 38: 289–311
- Carpenter P A, Miyake A, Just M A 1994 Working memory constraints in comprehension: Evidence from individual differences, aphasia, and aging. In: Gernsbacher M A (ed.) Handbook of Psycholinguistics. Academic Press, San Diego, CA, pp. 1075–122
- Coltheart M, Curtis B, Atkins P, Haller M 1993 Models of reading aloud: Dualroute and parallel-distributed-processing approaches. Psychological Review 100: 589–608
- Crain S, Shankweiler D 1988 Syntactic complexity and reading acquisition. In: Davison A, Green G M (eds.) Linguistic Complexity and Text Comprehension: Readability Issues Reconsidered. Erlbaum, Hillsdale, NJ, pp. 167–92
- Frederiksen J R 1981 Sources of process interactions in reading. In: Lesgold A M, Perfetti C A (eds.) Interactive Processes in Reading. Erlbaum, Hillsdale, NJ, pp. 361–86
- Garner R 1980 Monitoring of understanding: An investigation of good and poor readers' awareness of induced miscomprehension of text. Journal of Reading Behaviour 12: 55–63
- Gernsbacher M A 1990 Language Comprehension as Structure Building. Erlbaum, Hillsdale, NJ
- Harm M W, Seidenberg M S 1999 Phonology, reading and dyslexia: Insights from connectionist models. Psychological Review 106: 491–528
- King J, Just M A 1991 Individual differences in syntactic processing. Journal of Memory and Language 30: 580–602
- Lieberman I Y, Shankweiler D 1991 Phonology and beginning reading: A tutorial. In: Rieben L, Perfetti C A (eds.) Learning to Read: Basic Research and its Implications. Erlbaum, Hillsdale, NJ, pp. 3–17
- Oakhill J, Garnham A 1988 Becoming a Skilled Reader. Blackwell, New York
- Olson R K, Forsberg H, Gayan J, Defries J C 1999 A behavioral-genetic analysis of reading disabilities and component processes. In: Klein R M, McMullen P A (eds.) Converging Methods for Understanding Dyslexia. MIT Press, Cambridge, MA, pp. 133–53

- Otero J, Kintsch W 1992 Failures to detect contradictions in a text: What readers believe versus what they read. Psychological Science 3(4): 229–35
- Perfetti C A 1985 Reading Ability. Oxford University Press, New York
- Perfetti C A 1992 The representation problem in reading acquisition. In: Gough P B, Ehri L C, Treiman R (eds.) Reading Acquisition. Erlbaum, Hillsdale, NJ, pp. 145–74
- Perfetti C A 1999 Comprehending written language. A blue print of the Re. In: Hagoort P, Brown C (eds.) Neurocognition of Language Processing. Oxford University Press, Oxford, pp. 167–208
- Plaut D C, McClelland J L, Seidenberg M S, Patterson K 1996 Understanding normal and impaired word reading: Computational principles in quasi-regular domains. Psychological Review 103: 56–115
- Share D L, Stanovich K E 1995 Cognitive processes in early reading development: Accommodating individual differences into a model of acquisition. Issues in Education 1: 1–57
- Stanovich K E 1980 Toward an interactive-compensatory model of individual differences in the development of reading fluency. Reading Research Quarterly 16: 32–71
- Stanovich K E 1988 Explaining the differences between the dyslexic and the garden-variety poor reader: The phonological-care variable-difference model. Journal of Learning Disabilities 21: 590–604
- Stanovich K E, Siegel L S 1994 Phenotypic performance profile of children with reading disabilities: A regression-based test of the phonological-core variable-difference model. Journal of Educational Psychology 86(1): 24–53
- Stanovich K E, West R F 1989 Exposure to print and orthographic processing. Reading Research Quarterly 24: 402–33
- Stothard S, Hulme C 1996 A comparison of reading comprehension and decoding difficulties in children. In: Cornoldi C, Oakhill J (eds.) Reading Comprehension Difficulties: Processes and Intervention. Erlbaum, Hillsdale, NJ, pp. 93–112
- Van Orden G C, Goldinger S D 1994 The interdependence of form and function in cognitive systems explains perception of printed words. Journal of Experimental Psychology: Human Perception and Performance 20: 1269–1291.

C. A. Perfetti

Real Estate Development

1. What is Development?

Real estate development is the process of adding value to real estate. While most people think of development in terms of new buildings and subdivisions, development refers to any situation where value is added to a property. Developers take ‘development risk’ which ranges from leasing-risk associated with buying buildings with high vacancy to buying raw land with no utilities or zoning, and undertaking all the risks associated with obtaining public approvals, financing, construction, leasing, and operations of a new development project.

Developers initiate, plan, and coordinate the entire development process—buying the land, designing the product, arranging financing, obtaining public approvals, constructing the building, leasing, managing, and ultimately selling the completed project. Development is distinguished from owning and managing property because it includes at least some element of adding value. While most developers also own and manage their buildings, many real estate investors and owners buy buildings that are completed and fully leased and which do not involve adding value through some form of development.

1.1 What Distinguishes Good Development From Bad?

While there is no absolute standard to distinguish good development from bad, the test is a simple one: Does the development enhance the social welfare of the community? (Peiser 1990). Providing new housing and office space enhances the community, but if it does so at the expense of environmentally precious resources, then on balance it may reduce the social welfare. Unfortunately social welfare is difficult to measure—especially the indirect costs and benefits of externalities associated with the development. Obtaining approvals for development is a political process that often is long and costly. One of the biggest challenges facing city planners and council members is to create an approval process that is unbiased and gives the various stakeholders appropriate voice in the outcome. At the same time, they must do their best to streamline the process and prevent unnecessary delays and costs.

1.2 Academic and Professional Antecedents

Real estate development relates to a number of academic fields including economics, urban planning, architecture, finance, law, political science, civil engineering, and geography. Urban economics provides the foundation for understanding real estate value and how cities change over time (Mills 1972). Real estate finance, public finance, land use, planning, and environmental law and economics, infrastructure, market analysis, demography, architecture, and landscape architecture all have significant bodies of research that contribute to our understanding of urban development and its impact on cities and countryside (see Brueggeman and Fisher 1997, DiPasquale and Wheaton 1996, Case and Shiller 1989).

Developers are generalists. They need to be conversant with many different disciplines. Because they are responsible for conceiving, planning, and executing the entire process, developers typically are strongest in finance and marketing. Because they determine what is built and how the urban landscape appears, they should be intimately familiar with cities—what works and what does not, both from a private development perspective and from a government perspective (see Garvin 1996).

Successful development requires knowledge of all of the real estate disciplines—brokerage, finance, law, political approvals, design, construction, and management. Developers usually have several years of real estate experience before they undertake their own projects, most often in brokerage or real estate finance and investment. Legal, architectural, planning, and construction backgrounds also provide excellent training.

2. Industry Structure

2.1 Ownership

The real estate development industry is an industry in transition. Historically, it consisted primarily of private entrepreneurs who operated in a single market. Today, large publicly held national companies are emerging as significant owners of property, although their role and competitive position as developers is still being defined.

The different segments of the real estate industry comprise almost 20 percent of the nation's gross domestic product (Urban Land Institute 1997). The real estate industry is composed of many different players (see Fig. 1). Developers are the entrepreneurs who create and produce real estate. They may continue to own and manage the completed buildings or they may sell them to other parties. While developers have traditionally come from the private sector in the USA, redevelopment agencies and public housing departments act as public developers, often through public-private partnerships. Many corporations and public agencies including the armed forces also develop property for their own use, which is later recycled into the inventory of space available for anyone.

Each of the players is involved in a different phase of producing or managing real estate. Developers, architects, lenders, planners, and city council workers are more involved at the front end. Owners, property

Developers Contractors
Lenders
Brokers
Property managers
Architects/Engineers
Planners/City council
Government agencies

Figure 1

Real estate industry players

Location	Property type
CBD	Residential
Inner city	Office
Suburbs — Wealthy Graying	Industrial
Exurbs	Retail
Rural	Hospitality
	Land

Figure 2

Real estate markets are defined by location and property type managers, building departments, police and fire departments, and brokers tend to be more involved with the real estate after it is built.

Owners of property include the following:

Corporations
REITS (Real Estate Invest Trusts)
Banks—REO (Real Estate Owned)
Partnerships/Joint Ventures (JVs)
Individuals

2.2 Property Type

Figure 2 provides a breakdown of the real estate industry by location and property type. Each location represents a different and distinct market. All property types may be found in all locations. Certain property types, however, such as major office buildings and hotels are more likely to be developed in the Central Business District (CBD) and wealthy suburban nodes—typically located at the intersections of major freeways whereas industrial buildings, apartments, and shopping centers are more ubiquitous.

The real estate industry is divided into six main property types: residential, office, commercial, industrial, hospitality, and land (see Fig. 2). Each property type is virtually a separate industry, serving different purposes, markets, and customers. Although industrial warehouses, for example, may have completely different development requirements from apartments, they share a common institutional framework with respect to land, financing, legal aspects, and even construction. Still, each product is distinct, and value is created from different features. Apartments and industrial both benefit from locations near major highways. Industrial developers, however, prefer to avoid residential areas where homeowners complain about truck traffic. And apartment developers are attracted to areas with good schools, good retail services, recreation, and other amenities that are much less important to industrial tenants.

Developers, lenders, brokers, professional service providers, and most suppliers tend to specialize in one property type. While there is considerable cross-over between property types, such as air conditioning subcontractors who work on both office buildings and apartments, professionals develop a network of relationships over the years that favor those who concentrate on a single property type.

2.3 For-Sale vs. Income-Producing Property

A critical distinction between property types is whether they are 'for-sale' or are 'income-producing.'

For-sale property	Income-producing property
Land	Apartments
Single-family homes	Office
Condominiums	Retail
	Industrial Hotels

For-sale property is sold to a buyer after it is developed whereas income-producing property is held for the cash flow it generates. For-sale property is valued based on how much buyers are willing to pay for enjoying the benefits of ownership—such as the consumption value of living in a home in a good school district near shopping and recreation.

Income-producing property includes five main property types. Values for income properties are based on the cash flow they generate from leases. Office buildings, for example, have tenants who sign 3 to 10 year leases. The developer uses the lease income to obtain long-term mortgage financing. When the office building is sold, investors pay a premium for leases signed by major corporations who have excellent credit ratings. A lease signed by a major corporation like IBM with a AAA credit rating is like purchasing a bond.

Income properties are valued by capitalizing their Net Operating Income (NOI). Capitalization rates are inversely proportional to prices. For example, if a building produces an NOI of $100,000 per year, it is worth $1.25 million on an 8 percent cap-rate ($100,000 divided by 0.08) vs. $1.0 million on a 10 percent cap-rate ($100,000 divided by 0.10). Investors may be willing to purchase a building occupied by a major corporation such as IBM using an 8 percent capitalization rate whereas they would use a much higher cap-rate, say a 10 percent, for the same property occupied by a small non-credit tenant. The rental payments of a major corporation are like a bond—carrying the same credit rating as the corporation itself. In fact, the owner can sue the corporation for lost rent if the tenant defaults on the lease payment.

2.4 Design and Density

In addition to for-sale vs. income property, the development industry may be subdivided by design and density—expressed in units per acre for residential and Floor Area Ratio (FAR) for commercial buildings. Densities for residential property range from one

Design

Hi rise

Low rise/garden

Single family attached

Single family detached

Density

80 + DUs/acre

30 – 80 DUs/acre

18 – 30 DUs/acre

8 – 16 DUs/acre

2 + acres/DU–

12 DUs/acre

Figure 3

Residential design and density unit/2+ acres for single-family detached homes to 80–200 units/acre for a high-rise apartment building. Residential developers tend to focus either on for-sale single-family homes or income-producing apartments. Figure 3 shows the range in densities for different types of residential construction.

3. The Development Process

Figure 4 shows the time line of development for income-producing property. The two main periods—development and operations—involve dramatically different risks, types of financing, and activities (see Peiser 1992).

The 'Development period' runs from the inception of the deal through stabilized occupancy (90–95 percent occupancy). This period is financed by a construction loan, which covers the construction and lease-up of the building. The building is technically placed in operation when the 'Certificate of occupancy' is received. Since lease-up represents a major activity of development and risk, however, it is shown in Fig. 4 as part of the development period. The 'operating period' runs from the point in time when the building reaches stabilized occupancy to the time of sale. Once stabilized occupancy is achieved, the developer is able to obtain a long-term permanent mortgage which is used to pay off ('take out') the construction loan (see Sect. 3.5).

3.1 Stages of Development

The development period in Fig. 4 includes predevelopment, construction, and leasing activities. The pre-development period runs from project initiation up to the start of construction. It includes feasibility studies, site acquisition, design, and finance.

Figure 4

Time line of development

3.2 Feasibility Studies

Many of the critical development decisions are made even before a developer acquires a site. Market feasibility studies help the developer identify the best location and site characteristics for a particular development (see DiPasquale and Wheaton 1996). Market feasibility differs for each product type. It includes demographic projections, income, employment, retail sales, and growth projections. The market study should conclude with estimates of demand for the product expressed in units or square feet/year in a particular location for a particular product-product type, as well as estimates of current and projected supply. The market study tells the developer how much space he can build, what rent to charge, and how quickly it can be absorbed by the market place. The market study identifies competitive properties, and helps the developer determine the best location in which to develop the product. It also tells the developer what the design features and amenities should be in order to attract the greatest number of customers.

For site selection, developers will often consider as many as 50–100 different sites in order to find five sites which they examine in detail. From the five they may pick one site to purchase. Development is said to be a local business because experienced developers will know information about most of the potential development sites, competition, rents, and costs in their market area.

3.3 Site Acquisition

Property acquisition occurs in three main stages: (a) putting the property under contract ('opening escrow'), (b) going hard on the earnest money deposit, and (c) closing. Purchase contracts typically run from 60 to 120 days or longer. When the buyer makes an offer, he places an 'earnest money deposit' of 3–5 percent of the total purchase price. Purchase contracts have a number of contingencies, which the developer wants to satisfy before he consummates the purchase. 'Closing' is the transfer of title to the buyer and the payment of all money to the seller.

After a site is placed under contract, the developer has a 15 to 30 day contingency period to do feasibility studies. The developer will hire consultants to determine the site's suitability for development. The analysis should cover site characteristics, environmental status, topography, drainage, utilities (water, sewer, storm, electricity, phone, gas, and cable), as well as neighboring properties, and the chance of obtaining necessary zoning and building approvals. Once the developer is satisfied that these conditions are suitable for development, he will go hard on the contract. 'Going hard' means that the earnest money becomes non-refundable—when the major contingencies such as good title and finding no environmental problems are satisfied. Since it may take longer than the typical 15–30 day contingency period for the developer to perform the full range of studies necessary for development, the developer will often need to ask for an extension. The developer may also do much of the investigation before the property is even placed under contract or while the purchase contract is being negotiated. In a hot market, sellers are usually unwilling to extend the contingency period because other buyers are waiting in the wings.

For a large project, the feasibility period can extend several years and cost millions of dollars before the developer receives all of the necessary approvals. In a large project, the developers almost always has to purchase the property before many of the feasibility studies are done and long before the public approvals are in place. Such projects carry full 'entitlement' risk and represent the most risky (and potentially the most profitable) form of development.

3.4 Design

Design includes land planning, architecture, engineering, and consulting services that go into producing completed working drawings from which the building is built. The developer will often perform considerable preliminary design work on a property even before 'going hard' in order to determine how much space can be built, and what it will cost based on preliminary construction bids. Design drawings are used by the developer to obtain financing and political approvals. The architect prepares working drawings after the developer approves the final design. The general contractor and the subcontractors use the working drawings to bid the project and to build it.

3.5 Finance

If developers have a distinct expertise, it is in their ability to raise equity and debt money to finance their development activities. Development financing has two main pieces—construction financing to build the project, and permanent financing for operating it. Developers obtain construction financing primarily from commercial banks. Construction loans have short terms—1–2 years—and higher interest rates—2–3 percent above 'prime'—than permanent mortgages. Permanent mortgages are long term—30 years, and have lower interest rates than construction loans because the completed property, especially if it has high-quality tenants, offers better security to the lender than one under construction. Historically, pension funds, insurance companies, and savings and loan associations provided most of the permanent mortgage financing, but today Wall Street is heavily involved in it through securitization, commercial mortgage-backed securities, and conduit lending. As a result, permanent financing is highly competitive in the market place and developers and owners of

Development cost		Annual operating income
Land	$ 2,000,000	Gross rent	$ 1,500,000
Building	$ 8,000,000	Vacancy	5 percent $ 75,000
Total	$10,000,000	Effecting gross income	$ 1,425,000
		Less operating expenses	$ 425,000
Financing		NOI	$ 1,000,000
Equity	$ 2,500,000	Less debt service	$ 660,388
Mortgage	$ 7,500,000	Cash throw-off	$ 339,612
Total	$10,000,000
		*Mortgage assumptions
		Mortgage amount	$7,500,000
		Interest rate	8 percent
		Term	30 years
		Annual debt service	$660,388

Figure 5
Development cost and operating income property have many more sources for permanent debt than they used to.

Equity financing is the most difficult and expensive money that developers raise. It represents the developer's own cash investment in a deal, or the money raised from 'equity investors.' It is much riskier than debt financing because equity investors receive cash flow only after the mortgage payments are made during operations and after the debt is paid off when the property is sold.

For example, if a building costs $10 million altogether, the developer would typically invest 25–30 percent cash equity and the rest would be covered by debt. Suppose the building at stabilized occupancy (90–5 percent occupancy) generates $1,000,000 in Net Operating Income (revenues minus expenses—$1,000,000 NOI divided by $10,000,000 purchase price equates to a 10 percent capitalization rate). Figure 5 shows the Development Cost, Financing, Annual Operating Income, and Mortgage assumptions for the sample building.

In Fig. 5 the simple return measures are the overall capitalization rate and the cash on cash return. The overall capitalization rate equals the NOI/Total Cost = $1,000,000/$10,000,000 = 10 percent. The cash on cash return equals the Cash Throw Off/Equity = $339,612/$2,500,000 = 13.58 percent.

Sophisticated investors focus on before-tax and after-tax internal rates of return (IRR) to determine whether or not they should invest in a particular real estate deal. IRRs represent annual rates of return on equity that are comparable to returns from investing in stocks or bonds. IRR requirements depend on risk. Investors require IRRs on equity that are higher than 20 percent for new properties under development whereas they may require returns as low as 10–12 percent for investing in a fully leased office building with high-quality tenants (see Brueggeman and Fisher (1997) for a detailed discussion of IRRs).

3.6 Construction

Developers hire general contractors to build most nonresidential buildings. Homebuilders and many apartment developers, however, often do their own construction. The general contractor (or homebuilder) hires subcontractors who specialize in constructing various parts of the building such as foundations, framing, glass, granite, electrical, plumbing, heating, ventilating, and air conditioning (HVAC). Legal arrangements between the developer and the contractor may take several forms depending on who bears the risk for delivering the completed building within budget and on time. Common contract arrangements include fixed price, negotiated bid, design-build, fixed-price with a savings clause (where savings are split between the general contractor and the developer), and time and materials. Larger contractors are often unionized while small contractors and especially those who work on residential projects and in certain 'right-to-work' states such as Texas are typically not unionized and tend to be lower cost. During the construction phase, the developer is most concerned about delivering the building on time and under budget. Since working drawings are often incomplete or have mistakes, a nonconfrontational relationship between the developer and contractor is key to success.

3.7 Leasing and Sales

Marketing for a new project begins even before the developer purchases the land. In order to obtain financing for office and retail projects, the developer often needs to demonstrate that tenants are interested in the property by obtaining letters of intent or signed leases on 30–50 percent or more of the property.

Developers may have in-house marketing personnel or use outside brokers to lease and sell their property. Exclusive brokerage arrangements are common, whereby a brokerage firm is the developer's primary agent. Brokers work on commission which ranges from 4–6 percent of the lease or sale value for smaller deals down to 1–2 percent for larger transactions in the millions of dollars. For leasing office or warehouse space, the developer will typically pay the broker who he has hired as the exclusive agent for his property a 3–4 percent commission for signing a lease if there are no other brokers involved. The tenant often has his own broker, in which case, a higher commission will be split between the two brokers.

Successful leasing involves more than having the lowest rent for the nicest space. The developer typically gives the tenant an allowance for tenant improvements (TIs) which covers interior finish. For law offices in which tenant finish can run $70–$80 or more per square foot (compared to standard finish of $15–$25 per square foot), the TI allowance can make the difference in getting the law firm to sign a lease.

3.8 Operations

Larger developers usually have their own property management departments to handle the ongoing leasing and management of a building after it is completed. Smaller developers may hire outside firms that specialize in property management. Property management activities include repair and maintenance of the property, leasing, relations with tenants, security, building and payment of all capital and operating expenses. Good developers give careful attention to property management because it sets the tone of relations with tenants and determines their firm's image in the marketplace.

The operating period ends with the sale of the property to a third party. Most real estate deals generate a significant part of their financial returns from appreciation in the value of the property relative to its development or purchase cost. IRRs are highly sensitive to the length of the holding period. The shorter the holding period, say 3 years or less, the higher the IRR. It is standard practice when preparing a financial proforma to assume a 7 or 10 year holding period. The actual holding period depends on the owner's personal or institutional cash flow, tax, and life-cycle issues.

4. Current Issues

The real estate industry is highly cyclical. Because development can take from 1 to 5 or more years to complete a new project, depending on the difficulty of obtaining public approvals, buildings are often started when the market is hot, and completed when it is not. The real estate industry collapsed in the late 1980s–early 1990s in the deepest real estate recession since the Great Depression. The collapse was caused by a number of factors including over-building, tax policy that contributed to over-investment, too much careless money, and a major recession in the general economy due to downsizing of many corporations and national defense. Developers and investors who bought property at bargain prices in the early 1990s have made fortunes as rents and prices have recovered and surpassed pre-recession peaks. At the beginning of the twenty-first century, real estate markets in the USA are relatively 'in balance'—the supply of new space is in balance with demand for new space. Cycles, however, are endemic to real estate (Grenadier 1995). Those who learn how to play them well are the ones who will be most profitable.

Sects. 4.1–4.5 detail some of the most important issues in real estate development at the beginning of the twenty-first century.

4.1 Institutionalization of the Industry

During the recession of the late 1980s–early 1990s, many developers went bankrupt, along with the Savings and Loan Industry and many other financial institutions. Two powerful forces emerged from the recession—a vast expansion in the presence of Wall Street in real estate financing, primarily through securitization and Commercial Mortgage-Backed Securities, and the re-emergence of Real Estate Investment Trusts (REITs) as a major owner of property (Sanders 1998). REITs grew to more than $140 billion in stock market capitalization—exceeding the 1 percent barrier of total market capitalization that represents the point at which Wall Street analysts pay serious attention to an industry. While REITs and other publicly financed companies, especially national homebuilders, will play a more important role in real estate development and ownership than before, entrepreneurial developers will continue to play a significant if less dominant role in the creation of new product.

4.2 Future of Cities

